THE LIFE

OF THE

REV. WILLIAM ROMAINE, A. M.

BY

THE HON. AND REV. W. B. CADOGAN, A.M.

PREFACE.

The following Life of the Rev. William Romaine, was undertaken at the request of his nearest relatives. It was promised to the public under the first impressions made by his death, and under an idea that such documents might have been collected from his own papers as would have furnished some of the best materials for his biographers. But nothing of this sort was found, excepting one memorandum upon his attaining the age of seventy years, which is given in the course of this work, though it does not appear to have been designed for publication. Great as is the loss of the survivors, it is much to the honour of the deceased, that though he had the pen of a ready writer, he employed it not upon himself, but upon his God and Saviour. Upon whose word, and upon whose salvation, he hath written largely with his own hand, and left considerable remains behind him.

Disappointed in my expectations of gleaning memoirs of his life from his own manuscripts, and having time to reflect upon an undertaking, in the execution of which I was not likely to satisfy myself or others, I would fain have resigned the task to those who were much better qualified for it than myself, as well by their superior abilities, as by their longer acquaintance with Mr. Romaine. But being pressed to it as to the performance of a promise, I could not resist the solicitation. I have therefore done the best I could—sought information from various quarters, and got it from others without seeking, for which I am thankful. I have given a detail of facts—a history, not a panegyric. Let Mr. Romaine be considered as having been a man of like passions with others, liable to mistakes, and compassed with infirmity. But let God be glorified in him through Jesus Christ, and his end in living, and mine in writing his life, will be fully answered.

W. B. C.

The Rev. William Romaine was born on the twenty-fifth day of September, 1714. The place of his birth was Hartlepool, a town in the county of Durham, situated on a small promontory stretching into the German ocean. It is now a neat fishing town, with a very good pier and harbour, as well as a place of resort for the purpose of bathing. It has risen from obscurity to eminence in that part of England, through the bounty of the neighbouring nobility and gentry, whose custom it has been to accept by turns the office of mayor, and to subscribe upon that occasion one hundred pounds towards the improvements of the town, and particularly for supporting and repairing the pier. The father of the Rev. Mr. Romaine was among the French Protestants who took refuge in England upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes; he settled in this place as a merchant, and became a member of the corporation, which is a very ancient one.

He was a dealer in corn, and a man fearing God, and hating covetousness, of which he gave a remarkable proof in the year 1741. This country was then at war with Spain, and, whether from this circumstance, or from scarcity, there was a considerable advance in the price of wheat, from six to fifteen shillings per boll, the bushel of that county containing about two of the Winchester measure. Upon this occasion the people rose, and came in great numbers, a formidable mob, to Hartlepool. Mr. Romaine went out to meet them, asked them their wants, and was answered that they wanted corn cheaper. He put an immediate and an effectual stop to these riotous proceedings, first by promising to sell all the corn that he had, at five shillings a bushel, and then by performing his promise; for he sold to all that came, while the other merchants refused to sell any.

Such traders, however singular, as he was, are no losers themselves in the end, and great friends to the public in the mean time; what is more, they are ranked among the friends of God; for, "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty. The liberal soul shall be made fat, and he that watereth shall be watered also himself. He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him, but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it." Prov. xi. 24—26.

This scripture was strictly verified in Mr. Romaine of Hartlepool; for the blessing of God and of the poor rested upon him. He brought up a family of two sons and three daughters, who were all comfortably and respectably settled in this world, and taught both by the precept and example of their parents, to look for permanent settlements, or mansions in the world to come. Their father was a man of God, and consequently of strict morals; a steady member of the church of England, a constant attender upon her services, and so exact an observer of the sabbath-day, that he never suffered any of his family to go out upon it, except to church, and spent the remainder of it with them in reading the scriptures, and other devout exercises, at home. In this manner he lived to the age of eighty-five, and to the year of our Lord 1757.*

The surviving widow and one unmarried daughter, continued in the business at Hartlepool, much respected and beloved, being noted for their attention, not only to the bodily wants, but to the spiritual concerns of their fellow-creatures; for it was their custom to read and explain the scriptures to their neighbours, which by some was called preaching; but it was probably no more than domestic instruction, to which they admitted all who wished to partake of it, with a view to the mutual comfort and edification of one another; and such are deservedly ranked among "those women who labour with us in the gospel, and whose names are in the book of life." Phil. iv. 3.

The Rev. William Romaine, was the second† son of these believing parents.‡ Viewed perhaps with the eye of faith, and seen to be a proper child: that is, as the original word signifies, possessed of a certain grace called urbanity, and, in its sacred use, describing one of a fair aspect to God and his people, which indicates a formation for usefulness in the city of the great King. His early discoveries of great talents, and an equal desire to improve them, induced his parents to send him to the grammar school at Houghton le Spring, in the county of Durham, founded by the celebrated rector of that parish, Bernard Gilpin.§ A

* For this account of the birth and parentage of the Rev. Mr. Romaine, we are indebted to Mr. Callendar, of Newcastle, who married one of his sisters.

† His elder and only brother was settled as a grocer in London, and died suddenly at the George Inn, at Buckden, in the thirtieth year of his age.

‡ I call his parents believers by his own authority, finding the following expressions in a letter to a friend, dated July 30th, 1784. "We hope next Monday to set out for the North. In all probability for the last time. I have three sisters alive, all in years as well as myself, and we are to have a family meeting, to take our leave, final as to this life. It has brought a great solemnity upon my spirits; and would be too much for my feelings, had I not all the reason in the world to believe that our next meeting will be in glory. Mr. Whitfield used often to put me in mind, how singularly favoured I was. He had none of his family converted; and my father and mother, and three sisters, were like those blessed people, And Jesus loved Martha and her sister, and Lazarus: and as they loved him again, so do we."

school which flourished much in the time of its founder; nor did it lose its credit after his decease, as a "seminary of sound learning and religious knowledge, from which many have gone to our universities and proved great ornaments to the church and nation." Among these surely may be reckoned that eminent person who is the subject of these memoirs: he was seven years at Houghton school, and, having acquired all the learning which that institution afforded, was sent to Oxford in the year 1730 or 1731. He was first entered at Hertford College, and thence removed to Christ Church. His tutor (as I think he has been heard to say) was the Rev. Mr. Fifield Allen, who was afterwards chaplain to Bishop Gibson, archdeacon of Middlesex, subdean of the chapel royal, a prebendary of St. Paul's, and editor of the three Electras used in Westminster school. His proficiency under his tutor, whoever he was, may be inferred from his early appearance as an author, and that not of the common sort, but as one who had read much before he wrote any thing; who had particularly studied the scriptures in their original tongues, as an essential preparative for that holy function to which he was destined, and in which he afterwards excelled so much to the edifying of the church.

As a proof of his employment in the seats of literature, and of the estimation in which he was held by his superiors in them, we have a remarkable anecdote, brought forward in the excellent sermon upon his death, preached and published by his late curate, and present successor in the church of Blackfriars: "Dress was never his foible, his mind was superior to such borrowed ornaments; and, immersed in nobler pursuits of literature, before consecrated to a still more exalted purpose, he paid but little attention to outward decorations. Being observed to pass by rather negligently attired, a visitor inquired of his friend, a master of one of the colleges, 'Who is that slovenly person with his stockings down?' The master replied, 'That slovenly person as you call him, is one of the greatest geniuses of the age, and is likely to be one of the greatest men in the kingdom.'"*

He resided principally at Oxford, till he took his degree of Master of Arts, which he did on the fifteenth day of October, 1737, having been ordained a deacon at Hereford a year before, by the then bishop of that see, Dr. Henry Egerton; whether by a nomination to a cure in his diocese, or by letters dismissory from some other bishop, is not certain. His first engagement, after he was in orders, was the curacy of Loe Trenchard, near Lidford in Devonshire. He went there upon a visit with one of his contemporaries at Oxford, whose father lived at Lidford; and upon the express condition, that his friend would find him employment in the way of his profession. This employment was accordingly found for him in the church aforementioned, which he served for six months, most probably, of the year in which he took his master's degree. In the year following, he was resident at Epsom, in Surrey, as appears by a letter, dated from that place, October 4th, 1738, and written to Mr. Warburton, upon the publication of his first volume of the Divine Legation of Moses; of which letter some notice shall be presently taken. And on the fifteenth day of December, in the same year, he was ordained a priest by the then bishop of Winchester, Dr. Benjamin Hoadly. His title for orders was most probably a nomination to the church of Banstead, which he served for some years together with that of Horton, in Middlesex, being curate to Mr. Edwards, who had both these livings. At Banstead, he became acquainted with Sir Daniel Lambert, who had a country house in that parish, an alderman of the city of London, and elected lord mayor in the year 1741. Mr. Romaine was appointed his chaplain, and so had a door of utterance opened to him in the cathedral church of St. Paul; where he delivered the second sermon that he printed on the 14th and 15th verses of the second chapter of the Epistle to the Romans; in which is to be found a critical and a Christian illustration of that difficult passage. Though we do not discover in this sermon the same fertile experience, use, and application of the truth, as are to be found in his latter writings; yet we discover the same truth itself by which he was then made free from the errors of the day, and in the knowledge and enjoyment of which he lived and died. We discover in it the reasoning of a logical head, the writing of a classical pen, the religion of a believing heart, and the preaching of a sound divine. The point evidently pursued in it is redemption from sin by the blood of Jesus, as it was revealed from God to Adam, and through him to the patriarchs; to Moses and the prophets, and through them to the Israelites; and as it was conveyed to the Gentiles, before the preaching of the gospel among them, by tradition; which is the only probable cause of their sacrifices, or appeasing the Deity by the shedding of blood, a custom so unnatural in itself, and yet so universally prevalent among them. In short, the object of this discourse, is to prove that a creature, whether upright or fallen, was never made to teach himself, but to learn from his Maker; and to hold forth to men the only religion which is suited to their fallen condition: not as the religion of nature, but as the religion of grace; not as a human device, but as a divine revelation. And let the author of it be considered as having attained only to the age of twenty-seven years, and he may be thought to have discovered in it a maturity of judgment, a proficiency of reading, meditation, and doctrine, to which few in so early a period of life have attained.

The truth is, he was a believer—possessed of that unfeigned faith which dwelt in his father and his mother before him, and we are persuaded that it was in him also. And that from a child he had known the scriptures, having studied them with that proper faculty, by which alone they are able to make us wise unto salvation, viz. faith which is in Christ Jesus. 2 Tim. i. 5; ii. 15.

The sermon which he printed prior to that just mentioned, was one preached before the University of Oxford, March 4th, 1739, entitled, The Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated, from his having made express mention of, and insisted so much on, the doctrine of a future state: whereby Mr. Warburton's Attempt to prove the Divine Legation of Moses from the Omission of a Future State is proved to be absurd and destructive of all revelation.

This was followed above two years after by a second sermon upon the same subject, and from the same text, entitled, "Future Rewards and Punishments, proved to be the Sanctions of the Mosaic Dispensation." This sermon was preached at St. Mary's in Oxford, in the end of the year 1741, and printed in the beginning of the next year.

Whoever wishes to know more of this controversy between Mr. Romaine and Mr. Warburton may get some information from the second volume of the History of the Works of the Learned, for August, 1739, where are to be found Mr. Romaine's original letter to Mr. Warburton, and a second to the editor of the General Evening Post, occasioned by the publication of the first, with Mr. Warburton's remarks in this paper.

There is nothing in them as to the main question then in agitation, but what is to be found in the sermons upon the same subject, of which they appear to be sketches. One of them was written in the spirit of irony and sarcasm, to a person who knew the use of those weapons much better than Mr. Romaine, and who needed them more in aid of his strange paradoxies than his opponent did in support of sound doctrine. In this should appear, as a good judge hath informed us, "incorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he who is of a contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you," Tit. ii. 7, 8. These are weapons with which they who are valiant for the truth may always contend lawfully. Nor is the want of them to be complained of in Mr. Romaine's sermons upon this controversy. Mr. Warburton's complaints against him were, that he professed admiration for a work and its author, which he did not mean, and put into the mouths of others, in a private letter, what he afterwards published as his own arguments against the plan of the Divine Legation. The whole account was inserted in the periodical history of letters before mentioned, at the request of Mr. Warburton, by his friend Mr. Birch, who was afterwards Dr. Birch, and librarian of the British Museum; and who has been pleased to enrich this famous repository with the manuscript letters which occasioned the insertion of it. Neither the printed account nor the manuscript letters will repay the trouble of reading them. The one is the representation of enemies, to whom Mr. Romaine laid himself open; the others are the most scurrilous effusions of malevolence, abusive language, and opprobrious names in the flowing style of Mr. Warburton. Both parties are dead, and their disputes forgotten. Nor could it answer any good purpose to revive them; unless this transient recollection of a period, in the life of an eminent man, may operate as a caution to young men to be sober-minded, to study godliness and a holy life, and to leave the arts of controversy till the wit or the warmth of youth have been corrected by the wisdom and temper of age.

Mr. Romaine was at this time engaged in preparing for the press a new edition of the Hebrew Concordance and Lexicon of Marius de Calasio, a work which employed him seven years, and the first volume of it was published in the year 1747.

Whilst he is justly celebrated as the editor of Calasio, he is perhaps no less justly censured for having omitted his author's account of the word which is usually rendered God, and having substituted his own in the body of the work. This is what no editor can have a right to do by any author. Had Mr. Romaine left Calasio's exposition of the word in its place, and given his own in a note or in the margin, he might have had the credit of having restored to light, without the charge of having depreciated, one of the best and most useful works that ever was published.

Though I agree with Mr. Romaine in the interpretation of the word, not only as it is a plural noun describing a plurality of persons in the divine essence, but as it is a derivative of a verb, which signifies to swear, and so describes those persons under the obligation of an oath, yet I do not undertake his vindication in this instance.

But he thought himself excusable, and made his own apology in an address to the reader, which he prefixed to the work. His words are these: "I have endeavoured to perform the office of a faithful editor; you have Marius himself not in the least diminished or added to, excepting only one place, and that of such great consequence, that I should have thought it a crime if I had neglected to amend it. This I have done with the best intention, and only this once; I hope therefore that it may be pardoned."* To which he adds, that he has marked this place with inverted commas, as he has many of his additions under the particles.

He has therefore warned the reader of what he is to expect, and has made his own excuse, by which he must stand or fall in the public opinion. He was a man, and in common with all others, liable to err: he was a young man when he was the editor of Marius, and still younger when he was the antagonist of Mr. Warburton. In both instances he may have fallen into mistakes, which days that should speak, and multitude of years that should speak wisdom, might have corrected or prevented.

But where there are so many shining qualities in a character, and so many excellencies in his life and writings, I will not take offence at a few blemishes, which incaution may have scattered here and there, or against which human nature is provided with no caution at all.

We leave, therefore, the controversial divine, and the laborious editor of the Hebrew Lexicon and Concordance, and proceed to the contemplation of a man, who, having acquired a degree of eminence from the fruits of his youthful studies, became still more eminent as a minister of the church of England; who, for the space of forty-seven years, from that period, preached and adorned the doctrine of God his Saviour, with a steadiness and consistency almost peculiar to himself; and who has left a testimony for the truth in his life and writings, which ranks him among the noble army of witnesses, who, having praised God upon earth, shall praise him for evermore in heaven.

It was certainly Mr. Romaine's plan, after he had finished his edition of the Concordance and Lexicon of Marius de Calasio, to have returned into his native county; and he had actually packed up his trunk, and set it on shipboard with that view. But God had other plans for him. For as he himself was going to the water-side, in order to secure his own passage, he was met by a gentleman, a total stranger to him, who asked him if his name was not Romaine. He replied that it was. The gentleman had formerly been acquainted with his father, and observing a strong resemblance to him in his son, was induced to make the inquiry. After some apologies for this abrupt address, and some little conversation concerning his family and himself, the gentleman told him that the lectureship for the united parishes of St. George's, Botolph Lane, and St. Botolph's, Billingsgate, was then vacant; and that, having some interest in those parishes, he would exert it in his behalf, if he would become a candidate for the lectureship. Mr. Romaine consented, provided he should not be obliged to canvass in person; a custom which he always thought inconsistent with the character of a clergyman, and against which he openly protested many years afterward, when he was candidate for the living of Blackfriars: so that his objection to canvass was not a hasty impression taken up in his youth, but a settled persuasion that continued with him: aud, as he was never backward to acknowledge the obligation when received, so (as Mr. Goode justly observes in his funeral sermon) it "was not pride, but principle."

It was in the year 1748 that he was chosen lecturer of St. Botolph's, and he is mentioned among the preferred in the Gentleman's Magazine for November, of that year, as the editor of Calasio's Dictionary.

It has been thought (and inferred from some expressions of his own in one of his letters published since his death) that his determination to leave London was the result of disappointment and disgust. That he had come to the metropolis "strongly intrenched in notions of his own exalted abilities, and flattering himself that he required no other recommendation to rapid preferment, where talent was always admired, and justly estimated."* He is supposed to have alluded to some circumstances of this kind in a letter to an intimate friend, in which he speaks of "having known a very vain proud young man, who knew almost every thing but himself, and was therefore very fond of himself; who met with many disappointments to his pride, which only made him prouder, till the Lord was pleased to let him see and feel the plague of his own heart. That, upon the discovery of this he tried every method that can be tried to give peace, but found none. In despair of all things else, he betook himself to Jesus, and was most kindly received. He trusted to the word of promise, and experienced the sweetness of promise. After this he went through various frames and trials of faith, too many to mention." All this and much more Mr. Romaine writes concerning himself, to illustrate by his own experience the truth of such sayings as these, that, "the Holy Spirit will glorify nothing but Jesus. He will stain the pride of all greatness and of all goodness, excepting what is derived from the fulness of the incarnate God."

I do not see how it can be inferred from hence, that pride of heart, issuing in vain expectations of preferment, was the leading feature in Mr. Romaine's character. It is well known how every Christian thinks, speaks, and writes of himself, each claiming a title, which none but Paul would have given to Paul, of the chief of sinners. It is well known also, that every young man is naturally conceited, and thinks more highly of himself than he ought to think, till he learns by experience to think otherwise. It was certainly with good reason that St. Paul advised Timothy to "exhort young people to be sober-minded."

Mr. Romaine, no doubt, had this lesson to learn; he had his share of pride and vanity, and (according to a common saying in the world) he had much to be proud of; a good understanding—a good education—great excellency of speech, and many enticing things of man's wisdom. He might raise from hence ideal prospects of worldly greatness, and had reason to be thankful, if he was disappointed; if, "walking by faith and not by sight, he could prefer the afflictions of God's people to the pleasures of sin, and the reproach of Christ to the treasures of Egypt." But as to being settled in the metropolis, many of his friends have heard him say, that it was the thing of all others which he last thought of, and to which he was the least inclined. It may be supposed, indeed, that from the bent of his genius to the study of nature, of minerals, fossils, plants, and the wonders of God in creation, that a country life, so favourable to these pursuits, would have been chosen by him. But God chose otherwise for him; and by a circumstance as trivial to appearance, as it was accidental, but in reality a turn of providence, such as decides the present condition of most men, called him to the lectureship of St. Botolph's, and so detained him in London, where he was kept to the end of his existence as a witness for Jesus Christ, with abilities as much suited to this meridian, as those of the Apostle Paul to the meridians of Ephesus, Corinth, or Rome.

In the year following, viz. 1749, he was chosen lecturer of St. Dunstan's in the West. In the person of his predecessor* two lectureships were united, the one endowed, and founded by Dr. White for the use of the benchers of the temple; the other a common parish lectureship, supported by voluntary contributions. Mr. Romaine was elected to both, and continued some years in the quiet exercise of his office, till the faithful discharge of it raised violent clamours and opposition against him. The rector then thought fit to dispute his right to the pulpit, and occupied it himself during the time of prayers, in order to exclude him from it. Mr. Romaine appeared constantly in his place, to assert his claim to the lectureship, as well as his readiness to perform the office. The affair was at length carried into the court of King's Bench; † the decision of which deprived Mr. Romaine of the parish lectureship, but confirmed him in that founded by Dr. White, and endowed with a salary of eighteen pounds a year. Lest this should be removed from the parish, the use of the church was granted him: but as Lord Mansfield's decision was, that seven o'clock in the evening was a convenient time to preach the lecture, the churchwardens refused to open the church till that hour, and to light it when there was occasion; so that Mr. Romaine frequently read prayers and preached by the light of a single candle, which he held in his own hand. The church doors being shut until the precise moment fixed for preaching the lecture, the congregation was usually assembled in the street, and there waiting for admission. The consequence was a concourse of people, collected indeed without noise and tumult, but not without great inconvenience to those who passed that way, among whom happened to be one evening the then bishop of London, Dr. Terrick who had been Mr. Romaine's predecessor in the lectureship. Observing the crowd, he inquired into the cause of it; and being told that it was Mr. Romaine's audience in these circumstances, he interfered with the rector and churchwardens in their behalf, expressed great respect for Mr. Romaine, and obtained for him and his hearers, that the service of the church should begin at six o'clock, that the doors should be opened in proper time, and that lights should be provided for the winter season. From this period Mr. Romaine was established in his ministry at St. Dunstan's, and continued quietly in the exercise of it, to the edification of many, until the end of his life. Here surely he might set up a way-mark in course of his pilgrimage, and say, "My soul, wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from Him. He only is my rock and my salvation, my defence, I shall not be moved." Psal. lxii. 5, 6.

In the year 1750, Mr. Romaine was appointed assisting morning preacher in the parish of St. George, Hanover square. This office has no settled establishment, but merely dependent on the will of the rector, and the person procured by him at his own option and expense. The rector, who both called him to this office, and removed him from it, was Dr. Andrew Trebeck. The first act originated not in personal friendship, but in the recommendation of his character; the latter arose from the popularity and plainness of his ministry. He preached Christ crucified among those who are least disposed to receive him. The church was filled with the poor, and forsaken by the rich; and that which (as a nobleman is said to have observed) was never complained of in a playhouse, was admitted as a just cause of complaint in the house of God. When notice was given him that the crowd of people attending from different parts caused great inconvenience to the inhabitants, who could not safely get to their seats, he received it in the most placid manner, and said, "he was willing to relinquish an office which he had faithfully performed, hoping that his doctrine had been Christian, and owning the inconvenience which had attended the parishioners." In this instance, therefore, as well as in many others, he suffered as a Christian, and had reason to rejoice: for the spirit of glory and of God rested upon him, endowing him with the meekness and gentleness of his Master, and enabling him to serve his cause by his conduct, when he could no longer do it by his sermons.*

Mr. Romaine entered upon this office in St. George's parish on the first of April, 1750, and retired from it on the twenty-eighth day of September, 1755, during which time he preached occasionally at Bow church, in exchange with Dr. Newton, (afterwards bishop of Bristol) then rector of that parish, and lecturer of St. George's, Hanover Square, and also at Curzon chapel, then called St. George's chapel, Mayfair, in exchange with Dr. Trebeck himself, who was morning preacher there.

The times in which he was called to the exercise of his ministry in the west end of the metropolis, were distinguished by some signal judgments of Almighty God; such particularly as were the earthquakes by which Lisbon was destroyed, and London threatened; two shocks having been felt in it, and a third expected. These judgments were preceded by great profligacy of manners, and its fruitful parent, licentiousness of principle. "As to faith," says one who preached on that occasion, "are not the doctrines of the Trinity, and divinity of our Lord and Saviour, without which our redemption is absolutely void, and we are yet in our sins, with the intolerable burden of the wrath of God lying upon us, blasphemed and ridiculed openly in conversation and print? As to unity of spirit, are we not distracted and torn to pieces with schisms and separations? And as to righteousness of life, are not the people of this land dead in trespasses and sins, idleness, drunkenness, luxury, extravagance and debauchery? For these things cometh the wrath of God, and disordered nature proclaims the impending distress and perplexity of nations. And O may we of this nation never read a hand-writing upon the wall of heaven in the illuminated capitals of the Almighty, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN: God hath numbered the kingdom, and finished it. Thou art weighed in the balances of heaven, and found wanting the merits of a rejected Redeemer, and therefore thy kingdom is divided and given away."†

Mr. Romaine was not wanting upon the present occasion, as appears from two sermons in print, entitled, "An Alarm to a Careless World," and "The Duty of Watchfulness enforced;" sermons which are not exceeded in any of his writings. In both, and particularly in the preface to the former, there are some valuable antidotes against the prevailing philosophy of the day, which ascribed every thing to second causes, and almost denied the existence of the first, excluding the God of nature from the works of nature, and refusing to acknowledge him as the author of judgments, and sin, committed against his divine Majesty as the cause of them. This, as he tells us in the preface before mentioned, was the philosophy of the year 1750, when the "learned accounted for earthquakes, by changing their name into airquakes, and then they were explained philosophically."

* For information upon these circumstances in Mr. Romaine's life, I am indebted to the present rector of St. George's, the bishop of Bristol, and to the clerk in orders, Mr. Trebeck, Dr. Trebeck's son, to whom his lordship was so good as to refer me. The latter, after having given the above account of Mr. Romaine's retirement from St. George's, adds the following words: "I shall be always ready to attest his zeal, and in conversation with him during that time, and occasionally afterwards, I found him mild and friendly."

† See a sermon preached before the university of Oxford on Sunday, February 15th, 1756; and at several other places, on occasion of the late earthquakes and public fast, by George Horne, M.A. and fellow of Magdalene college; afterwards dean of Canterbury, and bishop of Norwich.

It is a pity that this sermon was not reprinted among those which have been collected into one volume since his death.

Such was the state of religion and morals, when he was called to bear his testimony in the fashionable world. Having received the ministry of light and truth, he fainted not in the discharge of it, nor had recourse to the hidden things of dishonesty to recommend it: but used great plainness of speech, that by manifestation of the truth he might commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. He spoke freely of the manners of the great, and endeavoured to bring them to an acquaintance with their own heart, as the seat and source of all iniquity, and with Jesus Christ, as the great purifier of the heart through faith in his blood. With what judgment and clearness he brought these truths to the ears of the wise after the flesh, the mighty and noble of this world, may be seen in specimens of his preaching before them left in print, such as a sermon entitled, "A Method for Preventing the Frequency of Robberies and Murders;" and another "Discourse on the Self-existence of Jesus Christ;" both delivered at St. George's, Hanover Square.

It was in this period of his life that Mr. Romaine was called to the professorship of astronomy in Gresham college. He had not the highest opinion of the religion, morals, or wisdom of the age; and in the discharge of his duty in this new office he pursued a plan which ran counter to them all. He attempted to prove that God was best acquainted with his own works, and had given the best account of them in his own words. He disputed some part of the Newtonian philosophy, with a boldness and banter which were not likely to be well received, when derogating from the honour of a man who was held little less than divine. And as he observed in the mathematics, astronomy, and geometry of the day, "a difference in their demonstrations of no less than one hundred and twenty-one millions of miles," so he spoke of the "modern divinity as bringing you no nearer than one hundred and twenty-one millions of miles short of heaven." The only traces that I have ever met with of his conduct, in this professorship, are to be found in the Gentleman's Magazine for the month of March, 1752 The reader may have recourse to this account, if he pleases, and must judge for himself how far it is just and impartial.

If Mr. Romaine quitted this office in enmity with the world, he quitted it no doubt in friendship with God, for he had God's honour at heart, however he might not have consulted his own; he had therefore God's promise in hand, "They that honour me, I will honour." In proof of this, I cannot but observe, that whatever credit he lost in the city of London, as professor of philosophy in Gresham college, he retrieved it an hundred-fold in a business of a very different nature which happened about the same time; I mean the famous Jew Bill. By his opposition to which, both in preaching and print, he rose and increased in favour with God and man. His reasonings upon this subject, and answers to every thing that was attempted in vindication of a project so contrary to the decrees and declarations of heaven, and so injurious to the religious, civil, and commercial interests of this country, were collected by himself in a pamphlet, which was reprinted by the citizens of London in the year 1753, and it is a masterly performance, which will bear printing again.

Mr. Jones, in his life of Dr. Horne, late Bishop of Norwich, with which he has just favoured the world, has a passage so much to our present purpose, that I have taken the liberty of transcribing it. "In the year when the Jew Bill was depending, and after it had passed the house, he (Mr. Horne) frequently employed himself in sending to an evening paper of the time, certain communications which were much noticed, while the author was totally unknown, except among some of his nearest acquaintance. By the favour of a great lady, it was my fortune (though then very young) to be at a table where some persons of the first quality were assembled, and I heard one of them* very earnest on the matter and style of some of these papers, of which I knew the secret history, and was not a little diverted when I knew what passed about them. To the author of these papers, the Jew Bill gave so much offence (and the Marriage Bill not much less), that he refused to dine at the table of a neighbouring gentleman, where he was much admired, only because the son-in-law of Mr. Pelham was to be there; he was therefore highly gratified by the part taken in that perilous business by the Rev. William Romaine, who opposed the considerations dispersed about the kingdom in defence of the Jew Bill with a degree of spirit and success, which reminded us of Swift's opposition to Wood's Halfpence in his Drapier's Letters."

This honourable mention of one who is now literally a departed brother,† reflects equal honour upon him that made it, nor can it fail of giving pleasure to all lovers of peace and truth, as it brings two old friends and acquaintance together, who pursued the same path of study, though they have been cast into different habits of life, who have contended for the same faith, fought with the same weapons, worshipped the same God, and steadily adhered to the same communion. Why should a doubt be entertained of their happy meeting in heaven, and of their rejoicing together in the beatific vision of the Lord their God? Why should such a doubt arise even from their last meeting upon earth? which was indeed extraordinary, but of which no notice might have been taken in these memoirs, had it not made its first appearance in the Evangelical Magazine, under the signature of T. H. as an anecdote of Mr. Romaine, "more characteristic of the man" (as this writer is pleased to say) "than might be found in twenty lives of him." How far the trait, as he has drawn it, is lovely in the character of a "venerable saint," every one must judge for himself, who reads the extract from the Magazine for the month of March, as it is given verbatim in the note below.‡ The truth, as I have it under the hand of one present

* Lord Temple.

† A name was given to Mr. Romaine by certain gentlemen, whose apology was so ably written by one who rose to the bishopric of Norwich. They may all be ranked among the brightest ornaments and best friends of the church of England. They differed from Mr. Romaine only in the use, application, and enjoyment of the truths they held, which he sought personally for himself, and in the boldness and fervent zeal with which he endeavoured to propagate them to others. This happy, or unhappy turn (as the world is pleased to call it) led him into what some of his former friends called serious mistakes and irregularities. But the church of England had never a more dutiful, affectionate, and illustrious son than William Romaine.

‡ "If twenty lives were written of Mr. Romaine, they will, I am confident, produce nothing more characteristic of the man than the following anecdote. I insert the names, perhaps you will prefer the initials. T. H.

"About three weeks before the last illness of that venerable patriarch, Mr. Romaine, he was walking in the city, and followed close by Dr. G. of Islington, and Mr. J. of Pluckley, who had been formerly his intimate acquaintance, and, like many other old Hutchinsonian friends, had long forsaken and shunned him. His friendship, they knew, was not the road to Canterbury.

"Niger est hunc tu Romane caveto.

"Dr. G. said, 'There goes Mr. Romaine just before us.' Mr. J. replied, 'He is an old acquaintance of mine,' and, in his facetious manner, whipped by Mr. Romaine, and turning round, stopped him full; just then Dr. G. was at his elbow: Mr. Romaine looked at him. 'Do not you know me, Mr. R.?' said he. 'No,' said the venerable saint, 'nor my Master neither;' and turning round on his heel, crossed the way with contempt and indignation, leaving them confounded at this unexpected reception."

Such is the famous anecdote which is to supply the place of twenty lives! It impressed the present rector of Blackfriars as such a stigma upon his late venerable friend and predecessor, as well as such an undeserved reflection upon a great character now living, that he immediately sent to the editor of the Evangelical Magazine, the following letter:

Sir,—In your Magazine for the last month I observed an anecdote of my late venerable rector, Mr. Romaine, which, had it been true, I was at a loss to account for the reasons of its insertion. If meant as a compliment, it has generally been understood as a reflection; while it casts an undeserved odium also on two characters that are very worthily respected. But as the statement which has appeared is altogether erroneous, I have no doubt but you will be ready to counteract the effect which it has produced by publishing the circumstances, as I received them from unquestionable authority, not long after they took place.

at the interview, was simply this. A little while before the death of Mr. Romaine, Mr. Jones and Dr. Gaskin overtook him in Cheapside, and Mr. Jones very good-naturedly proposed speaking to his old acquaintance, and on getting up to him, he said with a cheerful countenance, "Mr. Romaine, I do not know whether you recollect one William Jones, but I do know that I do not forget you." To which Mr. Romaine made a laconic reply, which neither of the gentlemen distinctly heard, but the words impressed upon them at the moment were, "No, nor my Master, I hope;" and true it is, that Mr. Romaine, after having made this answer, turned upon his heel and crossed the street, leaving them not a little astonished at this unexpected reception. It might be unexpected to them, but it was not an uncommon reception for Mr. Romaine to give in the street to his most intimate friends. He had a natural quickness, and sometimes roughness in his manner, which were often mistaken, when not meant, for anger and rudeness. He was seldom in the street but upon business; and being intent upon his engagement, and as frugal of his time as he was prodigal of his labour, he seldom saluted any man by the way, neither was it his custom to fall out by the way. It is probable that he meant to cast no reflection upon his old friend, but to stir up his pure mind by way of remembrance, and to express a Christian hope that, as he had recognised the servant, he had not forgotten his Lord and Master. Nor is it likely that he should then treat one with contempt, with whom he had formerly lived in habits of friendship, and of whom he had always spoken to others with respect and affection. Mr. Jones could have had nothing in view but good will and good manners; and though he might have been hurt at this sort of reception from an old acquaintance, there is no reason to think that he is now ill-affected towards him, or that he designed any other than an honourable mention of him, after his decease, when he introduced his name into the life of Dr. Horne.

Just, however, as the comparison may be between the spirit and success of Dr. Jonathan Swift and Mr. William Romaine, the causes in which they were engaged will admit of no comparison. Permission to an individual to coin halfpence may be productive of mischief as injurious to trade, and as exciting to envy; but an attempt to naturalise the outcasts of heaven, who have filled up the measure of their iniquities in crucifying their King, was an attempt against

The Rev. Dr. G. and the Rev. Mr. J. were walking together in Cheapside, when the sight of Mr. Romaine at a distance gave rise to the following conversation.

Mr. J. There is Mr. Romaine—do you know him?

Dr. G. No. I have no personal acquaintance with him.

Mr. J. Does he know you personally?

Dr. G. I am not sure that he does; have you any knowledge of him?

Mr. J. Yes. Some years ago we were very intimate, and he has been at my house some days together; I will speak to him.

As Mr. Romaine came near, he was addressed by Mr. J. in this manner—"How do you do, Mr. Romaine? I do not know whether you forgot one William J. I do not forget you." To which Mr. Romaine replied, "No, nor my Master neither, I hope." Without waiting for a reply, he crossed the street and passed on. In whatever way Mr. Romaine's answer be understood, it implies no such reflection on Mr. J. as is so strongly marked in the statement you have given. I am rather inclined to think he meant it as a compliment, as I have heard him express himself in terms of great respect, as to the person he then spoke to.

No idea of disrespect need be attached to his immediately passing from them, for it was what Mr. Romaine would frequently do to his most intimate friends, as he had almost as great an aversion to stop talking in the street, as in the church, in the latter of which he was so remarkable, and so worthy of imitation. I conceive, sir, it is a justice due to all parties, to insert this, for the authenticity of which I am responsible.

I am yours,

Blackfriars, March 23, 1796. WILLIAM GOODE.

Why was not this letter inserted, or at least acknowledged? Should not a work, called "Evangelical," be careful to speak evil of no man? Should it not, if it accuse falsely, take the earliest opportunity of acknowledging its error? Is it fair to suppose that Mr. J.'s intimacy with Mr. Romaine should have been discontinued from an idea that it would obstruct his preferment in the world? Does not the character of Mr. J. as a scholar, a clergyman, and a Christian, stand too high to be soiled by a paragraph in the Evangelical Magazine? Or is it to be inferred, from the general tenor and tendency of his life and writings, that the Judge of quick and dead will deny him at the great day, and include him in that awful sentence, "Depart from me, I never knew you?"

the laws and authority of the Most High, no less daring than that of the apostate emperor to rebuild Jerusalem. It was an attempt which proved the infidelity of the times in which it was made, for had Moses and the prophets been consulted, they had informed the world ages before, that the Jews should be a proverb, an astonishment, and an hissing, among all nations, until their conversion to God, and their acknowledgment of that same Jesus whom their fathers crucified, as Lord and Christ. As no act of parliament can convert, so none can naturalise them. It is surprising that the fulfilment of the Scriptures, in the dispersion and disgrace of that extraordinary people, has not more effect than it seems to have upon sceptical minds. The veracity of the Bible we cannot dispute, but the contents of it we cannot receive, as long as we are influenced by the spirit of the world; nor will arguments or facts convince us, when our vices and inclinations oppose them.

It has been the opinion of those who have been best acquainted with divine truth and human nature, that the enmity of the one against the other is not so much in the head as in the heart of man. The apostle indeed represents the heart as the seat of faith, and of infidelity; for as he tells us in one place, that "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness," so he guards us in another against an "evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God." I have been told (and I think by Mr. Romaine himself) that the late Rev. William Grimshaw, minister of Haworth, in Yorkshire, used to be much with Lady Huntingdon, when she was in that part of the country; and had frequent arguments with her son, the late Lord Huntingdon, upon the subject of religion. In one of them he said, "I perceive that your lordship's quarrel with religion is not in your head, but in your heart." His lordship was so affected with the remark, that he never encountered that antagonist again.

As this Mr. Grimshaw was an eminently pious and laborious clergyman* (perhaps the most so for his own or any time), so he was among the particular friends of Mr. Romaine. Soon after his death, which happened in the year 1763, Mr. Romaine preached at Haworth. His text was that well-chosen passage, Acts xi. 23: "Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord." The distress of the people for the loss of so valuable a man, and their anxiety about a successor, were not to be described. The sermon was striking and impressive, and had the good effect of putting them upon fervent and united prayers for the continuance of their spiritual privileges, and the event answered their utmost wishes. The clergyman who succeeded was the Rev. John Richardson, a person of an excellent spirit, whose views of divine truth were remarkably clear and evangelical, and whose unaffected piety and exemplary conduct continued to be an ornament to the church of God, and a blessing to that parish, till the year 1791, when he was called to his everlasting rest.†

In February 1755, Mr. Romaine changed his condition by marrying Miss Price, who now sits as a widow to lament the loss of a most faithful, affectionate, and attentive husband; and to whom I take this opportunity of expressing my thanks for many authentic communications concerning him. Upon leaving his situation in St. George's, Hanover Square, or soon after, he became curate and morning preacher at St. Olave's Southwark, upon which office he entered in the beginning of the year 1756, and continued in it to the year 1759; and to this congregation he dedicated his sermon upon the parable of the dry bones in Ezekiel, preached in their church, and published at their desire. He resided the first year in the rectory house, and removed from hence into Walnut-tree Walk, Lambeth. Here he had a delightful retreat, in which he spent some of the happiest of his years. A little garden, which he dressed, kept, and planted; and as he viewed the productions of it with faith, and received them with thank-

* I am happy to hear that his life is coming before the public, from the pen of a well-known, a most able and useful writer.

† We are indebted for this account to Mr. Whitaker, now of Ringway, in Cheshire, who was born in the parish of Haworth. "And though," says he, "I did not hear Mr. Romaine preach, and was too young to have made any observations, yet I have often heard the people speak of it with the greatest satisfaction and thankfulness."

fulness, he converted it into another Eden. Here he received his friends, particularly serious candidates for orders, and his younger brethren in the ministry, admitting them to his early breakfasts, and feeding them with knowledge and understanding. An interview of this sort, with a clergyman now living, has been kindly communicated to me, and the following account of it drawn up by his own hand. "I breakfasted one morning with Mr. Romaine, somewhere I think in Lambeth parish, but it is now many years since. On taking the bread prepared, which I thought good, he mentioned the circumstance of the late Dr. John Fothergill's having in some cases advised the not giving to sick people, and especially to weakly ailing children, preparations from London bread, on account 'of the too frequent adulteration it underwent previous to baking.' I was then a young clergyman, and shall not easily forget the manner (for I still feel the impression) of his turning the subject to the ministeral administration of the bread of life to the people. He touched very clearly and forcibly on a variety of modes by which the word of God was perverted, and the ill-leaven and other ingredients too often mixed with that heaven-imparted sustenance, which was intended to be meat indeed; and this he did in such familiar, easy, and yet pointed terms, and with that paternal benignity of look, as left me equally pleased, and, I trust, improved by the interview. It rendered bread to me of more value, both as a support and as a sign. I have yet cause to thank him for the discussion it produced, and shall ever revere his memory for so well-timed and happy an allusion.

"The same morning I remember well his mentioning it as in his opinion a fault, to preach censoriously, sarcastically, or harshly of brethren in the ministry, or of others, however remote from ourselves in matters of sentiment and persuasion. My friend, Mr. George Whitefield, said he, one day told me very candidly, that there was a time in his life, when he thought he had never well closed a sermon without a lash of the fat, downy doctors of the establishment. At that period, said he, I was not lean myself, though much slenderer than since. I went on, however, and seldom failed to touch pretty smartly upon the objects of my dissatisfaction, till one day, getting up into the pulpit in Tottenham-court-road, I found the door apparently narrowed, and moved in obliquely. The idea then struck me, that I was becoming at least in appearance, a downy doctor myself; and from that time I never more made the downy doctors a subject of castigation. He acted wisely, finding it much more comfortable to himself, and more edifying to his hearers, to preach Christ, and let other things and other people alone."

Mr. Romaine, after he left the cure of St. Olave's, was morning preacher for near two years at St. Bartholomew the Great, near West Smithfield, and removed from thence to Westminster chapel, where he had the same office for six months, till the dean and chapter withdrew their patronage and protection from it, and refused him their nomination for a license to preach there. The place then fell into other hands, and Mr. Romaine, who was immovably attached to the established church, resigned that situation. Nor had he any stated employment in the church, excepting the lectureship of St. Dunstan's in the West, till he was chosen to the rectory of Blackfriars in 1764, to which, owing to a dispute about the election that was settled in the court of chancery, he was not admitted till the year 1766.

During the time in which he had no settled employment in the morning, he preached charity sermons in many churches in London—sermons, which had been the means not only of spreading the gospel, but of proving its efficacy; for whatever may be ignorantly said against it as inimical to good works, more good nas been done by it, and larger collections produced by the preaching of it, than by all the mere essays upon charity put together. He preached often likewise at the Lock Hospital upon the first institution of that charity, and the building of the chapel. Being honoured also at Lambeth with the acquaintance of archbishop Secker, he generally assisted in the parish church upon the first day of the month, it being the custom of that venerable prelate constantly to attend and to administer the sacrament of the Lord's supper.

In speaking of him as a preacher, we ought not to omit his frequent appearances in that character before the university of Oxford. He printed some of his discourses delivered there, such as those upon the "Divine Legation of Moses," upon "Jephthah's Vow," upon the "Sure Foundation," and upon "the Lord our righteousness." This latter he sent to the press, as being the last which he was permitted to preach, the pulpit being refused him in consequence of it, and he published it with the following dedication to the vice chancellor:

"To the Rev. Dr. Randolph, Vice Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and President of Corpus Christi College.

"When I delivered these discourses, I had no design to make them public; but I have been since compelled to it. I understand they gave great offence, especially to you, and I was in consequence thereof refused the university pulpit. In justice, not to myself, for I desire to be out of the question, but to the great doctrine here treated of, namely, the righteousness of the Lord Jesus, as the only ground of our acceptance and justification before God the Father, I have sent to the press what was delivered from the pulpit. I leave the friends of our church to judge, whether there be any thing herein advanced contrary to the scriptures, and to the doctrines of the reformation. If not, I am safe. If there be, you are bound to make it appear. You have a good pen, and you have great leisure; make use of them; and I hope and pray you may make use of them for your good and mine.

"I am, with my constant and hearty prayers for the university's prosperity,

"Mr. Vice Chancellor,

"Your humble servant in Christ,

"WILLIAM ROMAINE."

While there is nothing in these sermons that can impeach his character as a scholar, or as a divine, there is something in the dedication prefixed to them, that does him great honour as a gentleman and a Christian. Whatever reasons the university had for so stigmatizing a man, upon whose lips they had formerly hung, charmed by his eloquence, and edified by his doctrine, it is plain that he took the handsomest leave of them. He seems to have departed from them as the apostles did "from the presence of the council, which commanded that they should not speak in the name of Jesus, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name." Acts v. 41, 42.

That Mr. Romaine neither committed mistakes, nor betrayed infirmities, is what no writer of his life will affirm: nor would any reader of it believe: this would be to affirm and believe that he was not a man. But of his steady and uniform attachment to the doctrines and discipline of the church of England, no doubt can be entertained. It was an attachment which yielded to no discouragements on the one hand, to no allurements on the other; for though preferment was withheld from him in England, it was held out to him in America, from whence the most pressing invitations were sent to him to accept of St. Paul's church in Philadelphia, with a salary of six hundred pounds a year; and these were seconded by the most urgent and repeated entreaties of his friend Mr. Whitefield, who considered him as persecuted in one city, and therefore clearly called to go unto another. But Mr. Romaine loved his church and his king; and though he felt and professed that affection for Mr. Whitefield which every lover of Jesus Christ must feel for so able and faithful a preacher of his name, so useful an instrument in the hand of God of reviving the doctrines of the reformation in this country, yet he never could agree with him in any mode of propagating the truth itself, which he thought inconsistent with the line of conduct prescribed to a clergyman. As to America, where episcopacy was never likely to be established, nor monarchy to be long endured, it was a soil by no means genial to him; he expected therefore little from being transplanted into it; and he lived to see many, who had fled to it, as a Utopia of religion and liberty, return with no small delight to old England again.

As a proof of his unalterable regard for this church and nation, he first printed in 1757, the year of his dismission from the university pulpit, "An Earnest Invitation to the Friends of the Established Church to join with several of their Brethren, Clergy and Laity, in London, in setting apart one hour of every week for Prayer and Supplication during these troublesome Times." After having mentioned the motives and calls to prayer, he proceeds to the matter of it, and invites us to "pray for the peace of our established church, and for all orders and degrees of its ministers, beseeching God to give them his grace and heavenly benediction, that both by their life and doctrine they may set forth his glory, and set forward the salvation of all men. And to the end there may never be wanting such persons in the church, let us pray for all seminaries of Christian education, especially for the two universities," &c. As a proof of his good wishes to all Christian people, he adds, "May the God of love dispose us also to pray fervently for all the protestant dissenting congregations which love the Lord Jesus in sincerity. May he shed that love abroad in all our souls, which alone can effectually free us from party spirit," &c. This same tract he reprinted in the year 1779, and again in 1795, a few months before his death. And it is to be hoped that being dead, he will yet speak in it to many, and excite them to the practice of what he there recommends. If any additional arguments are wanting to enforce this good work upon Christians, besides those in this useful little tract, they are to be found in a sermon published at the same time with the first edition of it, entitled, "The Duty of Praying for others." It was printed indeed without a name, but bore such indubitable marks of Mr. Romaine's style and spirit, as to leave no doubt respecting its author, and indeed it may be ranked among the best of his writings.

That which he recommended to others, he practised himself, and found so much encouragement to pray always and not to faint, as to be induced a few years afterwards to send a circular letter to every serious clergyman, whom he knew, and whom he remembered at the throne of grace, inviting them to set apart one hour in the week for calling upon God; imploring his mercy upon the established church, that he would revive his work in it, and send forth more labourers into this part of his harvest. This letter will appear in the printed collection; but as it will bear a second and a third reading, as the subject is important in itself, and handled by Mr. Romaine in the choicest manner, as it is a true specimen of his zealous affection in a good thing, as well as of his particular love to this church and nation, as it shows his knowledge of himself, and contains much godly experience, which may be useful to others; it is here inserted as forming no inconsiderable part of his history; and may all the benefits that he wished, be the fruits of its publication.

My dear brother in our precious Jesus.—In the year 1756, a weekly hour of prayer was agreed upon by several religious clergy and laity, in order to humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, till he should be pleased to put a stop to the calamities of that time. He did hear us, glory be to a prayer-hearing God, and he turned our supplications into praises. About that period it began to be laid very near my heart to pray earnestly and often for the prosperity of our Zion, for which I never fail to make intercession in all my addresses to the throne of grace. But once a week, on Friday, I have what is called the clergy's litany. In which, after general petitions for the out-pouring of the Spirit upon all the ministers of our church, I make mention by name of those my fellow-labourers, whom God has highly honoured in making them faithful and useful in the ministry. As I go over their names recommending them to the care, and their people to the blessing of our glorious Head, it is my custom to ask particularly for them, such things as I know or hear they want. Your name has been long in my list, and you owe me many, many prayers, a lawful debt, which now upon demand, I hope you will repay me. I ask it in justice due to myself. I entreat it for the glory of our common Lord, and for the advancement of his own cause and kingdom, and for your own soul's prosperity. O that I may write any thing to stir you up to pray till you as far outstrip me herein, as to make it a point of gratitude for me to pray more and more fervently for you. I will mention some of the motives which moved me to this practice, and some of the advantages which I have found in it, and I beg of the Lord to make them the means of inducing you to join with me in this delightful exercise of brotherly love.

1. One of the first things which put me upon it was the frequent use of the hour of prayer, mentioned above. We are called upon in scripture to make supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks for all men; and we are very often exhorted to pray for the household of faith, and more particularly for the ministers of it, agreed together in this land to worship the same Lord in the same outward establishment, to which you and I are very closely connected, both in profession and principle. To us, as ministers, the command should be of great force—"Pray for the peace of Jerusalem."—This peace depends upon the Lord's sending and blessing his ambassadors of peace. They are his ministers, attending continually for this very thing. He raises them up; he fits them for the advancement of it; he prospers them for the sake of the prosperity of his church, as he says, "I will clothe the priests in Zion with salvation, and then her saints shall shout aloud for joy." For this reason we find St. Paul in all his epistles desiring to be prayed for—"Pray for us"—for grace, for gifts, for success. He puts the churches upon asking what their ministers wanted. Although God has promised it, yet he will be entreated for it. The prayer of faith never returns without a blessing, which I have remarked again and again to the praise of him who says, "Ask, and ye shall have," and this has been a

2. Second argument very powerful with me. The command given to pray for the peace of Jerusalem has a promise—"They shall prosper that love thee."—This has been fulfilled. I have seen manifest sensible answers to this prayer—clear displays of the faithfulness of the promise maker. He has vouchsafed to give the desired mercy—not for the merits of our prayers, but for the sake of his own great Name. He put it into our hearts to see what his church wanted: to ask the supply of him, and now having received it, to ascribe all the glory to his grace—"Worthy is the Lamb." His kindness hitherto is a mighty encouragement to go on, and is a

3. Motive for me to persevere, and for you to join with me. He says when the work is great and the ministers but few—"Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest field." This was our warrant to ask, and asking in faith according to his will, we had confidence in him that he would hear and answer; and he has been as good as his word; we have tried it, and found it cannot be broken. For these last eleven years we have been praying for more labourers, and every year he has sent forth some more. O that he may give the word, and greater still may be the company of the preachers. Have we not all the reason in the world to expect it? The promise stands sure—his hand is not shortened—his love is not abated—prayer has not lost its efficacy with him to engage his love and power to fulfil the promise. Doubtless more, more labourers shall be sent out, if more of us join in fervent prayers, nothing wavering. While we continue to pray, he will continue to answer. This is fixed as the throne of God—"I will not suffer my faithfulness to fail." O how has my dependence on his unalterable word been strengthened, by seeing it so constantly fulfilled; and how has my attachment increased to our established church, by his raising up more ministers among us! Indeed he owns our establishment at this day; and thereby he encourages us to pray on; and if we do, we may hope to see greater things than these. May you and I find reason to be asking the enlargement of Christ's kingdom in our land, until he remove us into his kingdom of praise.

4. These arguments are continually enforced by the constraining love of Jesus, which keeps the soul in a good frame to pray for the advancement of his honour and glory. While I find a warm heart to him, I cannot help wishing that others may be won over to the love of him. To set him forth, that they may behold his matchless glory, is our office. Every gospel minister is raised up to sound aloud the praises of the wonderful person, and of the infinitely perfect work of the divine Saviour, in whom all the perfections of the Godhead shine out in the richest display of their beauty, love, and power. The gospel-ministry was ordained for this purpose, and it is blessed to this day to the hearts of poor sinners, by bringing them to see, to admire, and to enjoy the love of the Father through the salvation of the Son, by the grace of the Spirit. This is the ministration, which exceedeth in glory. O what an honour is it that we should be called to partake of these blessings ourselves, and that by our means the Lord would, and does, convey them to our people. The sense of this is constraining. Under the influence of it we cannot but pray for his ministers, that they may spread his gospel and advance his fame. O, for more love to this precious Jesus! and to his cause in your heart; it will be as a thousand arguments to put you upon praying for an increase of labourers, and an increase of usefulness in those he has already sent out: and, if you do pray thus, and continue to pray, it will be the most likely means of your experiencing more of his love, for he cannot alter the word that is gone out of his mouth. His promise to them that pray for the peace of Jerusalem is, "They shall prosper who love thee," which is a

Fifth encouragement. It is good for our own souls. They prosper by it: while we are concerned for the honour of Jesus, for the advancement of his gospel, we are taking the best care we can of our own interest. The soul that watereth others, shall be watered itself; so it prospers. The prayer for blessings on our fellow-labourers brings a shower of blessings into our own bosom. I should be very unthankful, yea, beyond measure, if I did not acknowledge it. I have not prayed in vain for these eleven years. No. I have indeed prospered, and have received many mercies; some I will mention, not to set myself up for any thing, who am the very sink of hell, and feel in me to this moment indwelling corruptions enough to damn a thousand worlds; but I mention them to the glory of sovereign grace. There is in every one of us a desire to be great and esteemed, a bitter root of pride, which works in abundance of vile tempers, all dishonourable to Jesus and hurtful to our own souls; I have found this praying for my dear brethren, and always by name, has given many a blow at that bitter root, and has checked several of its branches, such as envy at their success, shyness to their persons, an evil eye at their gifts or their graces. That party spirit, under the bondage of which, no one ever laboured more than myself, has been in a good degree conquered; and so has the unwillingness to bear reproof, very hard to bear; and the will given to be thought less than the least, the sole work of almighty grace. And I ascribe it to my constantly praying for God's ministers, that he has enabled me in any degree not only to get the better of those vile tempers, but also to grow in brotherly love. I find my heart knit to those I never saw, and am glad of their prosperity in mind, body, or estate. My very soul rejoices in any good in them, or good done by them. Their present number (may the Lord add to them an hundred fold,) their being almost of one mind, and of one heart, their growth in grace, their usefulness among their own people, and their writings for the public benefit; these are become sweet subjects of thankfulness. My prayers are more in faith because I reap the fruit of them, and can join praise with them. To every petition I can say, thanks be to the Lord; I have good encouragement to pray on. Every year I see our Jerusalem prosper, and they also prosper that love it. Are not these advantages, and are they not sufficient to induce you to join your prayers with mine? As for me, God forbid, my dear brother, that I should cease to pray for you.—May the Lord the Spirit put it into your heart to pray for me, and for the rest of our fellow-labourers, until you find more advantages from your prayers than I have done. If you weigh these things with attention and God incline you to join us in prayer, there is a scripture which warrants this, and which contains some gracious promises to the practice of it; the consideration of it has been with me a Sixth motive. It is in Matt. xviii. 19, 20. "Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth."—We do agree to meet together in one place.—Where is there a better than the throne of grace? We do agree touching the thing we are to ask, namely, the blessing of him that sitteth upon the throne on his own ministers. What can be more pleasing to him, than to wish them well, to whom he has done so well, as to call them to, fit them for, and prosper them in his work? O it is not to be described nor conceived, how his heart is set upon this. To send out ministers to promote his glory through the salvation of his people, is the ruling affection in the head of the church; and when he intends to send them out, he gives his people the spirit of prayer, to desire of him pastors after his own heart; and to encourage them to ask, he promises, "Whatsoever ye ask, shall be done for you of my Father, who is in heaven: for the Father himself loveth you, and will give you whatsoever you ask in my name: and when any two of you agree to pray for more labourers, or for greater usefulness in them who do labour in the word and doctrine, I will then be in the midst of you, spiritually present, that you may have communion with me in prayer, and that you may be satisfied I do hear, and will answer." How inviting, how persuasive are these words! surely they ought powerfully to influence you and me. What may we not expect from meeting often in the presence of Jesus? Try, my dear brother. Be much in his company, and see what will come of it. Your heart will certainly be more knit to him, and he will knit you closer to his other ministers in the unity of the Spirit. He will bring us to be of the same mind in the Lord. This is as the three-fold cord which is not quickly broken, because it is a bond of the Lord's own making, and of the Lord's own keeping. He maintains it, and he ties it closer by giving us sweet fellowship in one another's prayers, and by enabling us to act and live, according as we pray for the good of our brethren. Thus he makes it appear that we are taught of God to love one another, for he only can teach us to love unfeignedly, and with a pure heart fervently. This is the most blessed union upon earth, because it flows from our being one with Christ, and proves that we hold the head, and are under him as living members in his body united together, having the same care one for another.—Hereby we know what the communion of saints is—we experience, and we rejoice in its blessings. O how will this strengthen the hands of each other—it will make us mighty through our God to do our work, to endure hardship, to fight our battles; yea, to the many antichrists of this our day, we shall become terrible, like an army with banners. May the Lord make you a good soldier in this noble army; and he will, if you will join with us. Your prayers will not return void into your own bosom. No, no. Every prayer for your brethren will bring down a blessing upon yourself, and you will find more arguments daily than I have room to mention. Only one thing more I must take notice of, which is my

Seventh motive, namely, the present necessity. Look round the island—examine the state of it. You cannot help seeing how things are going on. The prospect is alarming. Our national sins had been long crying aloud for vengeance, but the long-suffering of our God has withheld it; and to leave us, a people without excuse, he sent mercy instead of judgment. He revived his work—raised up ministers—sent them in his name to proclaim his grace in Jesus, and to call sinners to repentance. What has been the effect? O guilt, beyond that of Sodom and Gomorrah! The gospel is rejected. This one sin is filling up the measure of our iniquity fast. Judgment slumbereth not. It is abroad. The storm is gathering. A dark black cloud is hanging over us. It has not burst yet, but God knows how soon it may. If it should, what have we not to fear? The scripture character of the latter days is now fulfilled. We are in the dregs of time. The damnable heresies, as foretold, are brought in. Atheism, infidelity, and their poisonous fruits, harbingers of the great day, do abound, and security marks it to be near at hand. Thanks be to God there is a little light breaking through this dismal cloud, which affords us a ray of hope. Jesus has not left himself without witness. He has still a cause, and ministers to plead it, in our land. But how few are they! Blessed be God for any. He, who sent them, can send more, and he bids us pray for more. What he bids, the times press and enforce upon us. When was there, when can there be, greater need? Does not every thing precious in time and in eternity call upon us to pray for one another, and to pray, that the Lord may add to our number daily? Is not his glory blasphemed openly, his mercy abused, his gospel rejected, and therefore are not public and private virtues neglected, yea, despised? What can stop the deserved ruin? Only God, and he only in the way of his own appointment. The gospel is his saving ordinance, and ministers are the means which he uses to make the gospel the power of God unto salvation. O let us pray then for more of them. To this let the love of dear Jesus constrain us—the love of our king—and of our country—the love of our religious and civil liberties—the love of our families and children—the love of our own souls, and of our parishioners. O that God may put it into your heart by these, or any other motives, to join with us in praying him to send forth more labourers into his harvest. Amen, Amen, say I. Let all that love the Lord Jesus in sincerity say, Amen.

My dear brother, if God should incline your heart to this work and labour of love, there are two things earnestly recommended to you; the

First is to meet us at a set hour; that we may agree in our joint prayers, and may have the divine promise to depend upon for the blessing we ask. We have for some time met every Friday at noon, but it has been found inconvenient; and by consent it is now fixed from nine o'clock on Friday morning to ten. You will then meet a great deal of good company at our court—several dear ministers and fellow-labourers round the throne, besieging it with their prayers for each other, and for the increase of their number. Whatever be the general issue, it will be well with us supplicants. Our labour will not be in vain in the Lord. If our prayers do not remove the affliction of Joseph, yet we, grieving for it, have a promise of safety, when that affliction comes to be destructive, as you may read at large in Ezekiel, chap. ix. A Second thing is desired of you, namely, that you would pray for the brethren by name. This is not a trifling matter. Indeed it is not. Make trial of it, and you will find more advantages in it than I have mentioned above. It has been exceeding profitable to my own soul for several years, and I doubt not but experience will make it so to yours.

I leave all that I have said in the Lord's hand, that he may apply it to you, as seemeth him good. Whether you join with us or not, I will not cease to pray for you and yours, that the work of the Lord may prosper in you and by you. Only remember the time is short. The work is great. The Lord God bless you in it, that his harvest may be got in soon, and his labourers may go to rest. In this happy number may you and I be found. When our prayers are over may we continue our praises to Father, Son, and Spirit, three persons in one Godhead, to whom we shall be giving equal glory, worship, and thanks, through a long blessed sabbath. Hallelujah. Amen.

Such an epistle will bear, and indeed it requires, frequent reading. The business recommended in it should not be forgotten. A list might be circulated every year of such as call upon the Lord in every place, and labour in his word and doctrine. To their names might be added any particular circumstances, which call for praise or prayer. And an hour or more, might be well spent in making mention of each severally before God, without vain repetitions. An anniversary sermon might be preached, giving a short account of the progress of the gospel in the kingdom, and published, as a history of the church, for the benefit of the present and future generations. It was Mr. Romaine's custom to preach a sermon of this sort every year upon the second day of March, being the day of his election to the living of Blackfriars. "In one of these discourses he mentioned that himself and three others agreed to spend one hour in the week, at a stated time, in prayer for the revival of the power of godliness in the established church."* What an increase did he live to see! from units to hundreds! And what encouragement did he hold out to the ministers and people of God, to devote a small portion of their time to prayer, supplication, intercession, and giving of thanks, for the extension of the kingdom of Jesus Christ! for the revival of that work of the Lord which shall stand for ever in a people whom he forms for himself, and of whom it may be observed, that in proportion as they are formed for the Lord in the next world, they are formed for good in the present one; the increase of them therefore is a great public concern.

We have now followed the object of these memoirs through some of the changes and chances of this mortal life, as well as through some of the trials and tribulations of the Christian life, to his final settlement as to this world in the rectory of St. Andrew Wardrobe, and St. Ann's, Blackfriars. Nor were the leadings of Providence less wonderful in this circumstance of his life, than they had been in most of the preceding ones. The right of presentation to this living is vested in the crown and in the parishioners alternately. Mr. Romaine's predecessor was Mr. Henley, a nephew of the then Lord Chancellor Henley. He enjoyed this preferment only about six years and a half, and died young, of a putrid fever, in consequence of visiting one of his parishioners in that disorder. He was a man of an excellent spirit, and of great piety, and promised to be very useful in the church; but it pleased God to remove him, and to incline the hearts of some in the parish, upon his decease, to propose Mr. Romaine as his successor. This was done without Mr. Romaine's knowledge or consent: the first intimation which he received of it was from a newspaper, which he took up by accident, when upon a journey. His friends, who first started the idea of nominating him as a candidate for the living, entertained little or no hopes of success; but, upon sounding their fellow parishioners, they found that at least two-thirds of them were in his favour. In order to check their progress, a rumour was spread that he was above soliciting their votes and interest. But upon the day being fixed for each candidate to preach his probation sermon, Mr. Romaine was apprized of it, came immediately to London, and made his appearance among them. The day appointed for his preaching was the 30th of September, 1764, upon which occasion many absented themselves who had been in the habit of hearing him, lest they should crowd the church, and occupy the seats of the inhabitants; and, by giving them offence, throw obstacles in the way of his election. The sermon, which he preached upon this occasion, does him infinite honour as a Christian preacher, and an honest man. It contains truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as it is in Jesus, with a very plain and close application of it to each particular hearer. He thought fit to assign his reasons in it for not having behaved towards them in the common way of soliciting their favour. "Some have insinuated that it was from pride that I would not go about the parish from house to house, canvassing for votes; but truly it was another motive, I could not see how this could promote the glory of God. How can it be for the honour of Jesus, that his ministers, who have renounced fame, riches, and ease, should be most anxious and earnest in the pursuit of those very things which they have renounced? Surely this would be getting into a worldly spirit, as much as the spirit of parliamenteering. And as this method of canvassing cannot be for Jesus' sake, so neither is it for our honour: it is far beneath our function: nor is it for your profit. What good is it to your souls? What compliment to your understandings? What advantage to you in any shape, to be directed and applied to by every person, with whom you have any connexion, or on whom you have any dependence? Is not this depriving you of the freedom of your choice? Determined by these motives, when my friends of their own accord put me up as a candidate, to whom I have to this hour made no application, directly or indirectly, I left you to yourselves. If you choose me, I desire to be your servant for Jesus' sake; and if you do not, the will of the Lord be done."

This sermon operated greatly in his favour; it was well received by the parishioners, and published at their request.

There were two other candidates for the living besides himself, and a scrutiny was demanded in favour of each at the close of the first day's poll. This scrutiny was entered into, but produced no decision, the proper qualifications not being settled which entitled an inhabitant to vote at the election of a rector. A second election was agreed upon by the friends of the several candidates, which ended in favour of Mr. Romaine, who had a great majority of votes, and was declared duly elected. But this did not satisfy the other candidates; each put in his claim, and the business was transferred into the court of chancery. It continued there for more than a year, and, in the end of January, or beginning of February, 1766, a decree was given by Lord Chancellor Henley, in favour of Mr. Romaine. He was instituted and inducted accordingly, but was observed to tremble much during the whole ceremony of his admission. His feelings have been expressed by himself in a letter which he wrote upon the decision in chancery. "My friends are rejoicing all around me, and wishing me that joy which I cannot take. It is my Master's will, and I submit. He knows what is best both for his own glory, and his people's good; and I am certain he makes no mistakes in either of these points, but my head hangs down upon the occasion, through the awful apprehensions which I ever had of the care of souls. I am frightened to think of watching over two or three thousand when it is work enough to watch over one. The plague of my own heart almost wearies me to death; what can I do with so vast a number?"

Such were the methods by which he obtained the living of Blackfriars, and such the views with which he entered upon it. His aims were directed to the glory of God, the profit of his parishioners, and the edification of the church in general. They cannot be better represented than they have been by himself in two letters kindly communicated by a respectable clergyman, to whom he gave a title for orders the year after his admission to the church of Blackfriars. As these letters are not to make a part of the printed collection, they are here rescued from oblivion; and such parts of them produced, as express the writer's ideas of his own situation, as well as of the duties incumbent upon a person who is offering himself a candidate for holy orders. The expressions alluded to are the following:—"In this whole affair I have desired simply to follow what was right, and to aim at the divine glory; and if I know my own heart, (which is not easily known) my eye is single in your coming to me. I desire your good, and not mine own; your being with me may be the means of much edification to your own soul, and may tend greatly to your future usefulness. I would have my church a nursery, where such as you may grow, till you are fit to be planted out, and when fit, I would not keep you a day, but rather use my interest to provide some preferment for you. This is my plan, my title, and my pulpit, and what I have in consequence of the Lord's sending me to Blackfriars. I have them for the Lord, and I beg grace of him that I may employ them so as shall be most for his glory. I shall receive you on this footing when you come. May the Lord the Spirit unite your heart to me as mine is to you, and may we be taught of God to love one another.

"I hope you will not forget me in your addresses to the throne of grace, and if I may give my advice, it is needful for you at present to be much in prayer for these graces:

"First, For the right knowledge of yourself—your vileness.

"Secondly, For the right knowledge of Jesus—his glory.

"Thirdly, For a single eye to his glory in your taking upon you to be his minister and servant in holy things.

"Fourthly, For a love to souls; when you know much of his love in saving your soul, that will make you labour much for Jesus, in trying to set forward the salvation of others. And,

"Lastly, You should beg of God, and be always begging as long as you live, for an entire dependence upon the Lord to bless you in his work. We toil all night and day, and catch nothing, till the Lord bless the gospel net. The Lord bless it in you and by you, so prays your real friend and servant,

"WILLIAM ROMAINE.

"Lambeth, August 4th, 1767."

This same gentleman expected to have been ordained upon Trinity Sunday, but was disappointed. He gained by this loss a second letter from his friend Mr. Romaine, equally expressive with the first of his views of the Christian ministry.

"Dear Mr. ——. It was not without good reason that the Lord would not suffer you to be ordained last Trinity. He had much to teach you in these months, and I hope you have been a good scholar. He wanted to teach you your absolute unfitness for the work of the ministry, and thereby to bring you to an entire dependence upon him. You cannot love the work, nor be successful in it, nor, upon succeeding, give Him all the glory, but through his grace. He laid you by a little to make you more perfect in this lesson. It is very hard to learn, for I am still at it every day, and get but little ground. Self, proud self, is such a dull scholar, and has such a bad memory, that though I am satisfied to-day Christ must do all for me, and all in me, and all by me too, yet I soon forget, and soon want to be something in the work myself; but I do know, and blessed be the name of Jesus, I do experience that his grace is sufficient for me chiefly in the pulling down of my pride, and in making me willing to be nothing, that Christ may be ALL. May he pour out upon you and me more of his Spirit to lay self very low, and to exalt the Saviour."

These letters speak for themselves, being the language of a person who had determined to know nothing among his people, but Jesus Christ and him crucified. A determination which being generally made in the Spirit, is generally pursued with steadiness; at least it was in the instance before us unto the end of his life.

He entered upon his living not only in the faith and patience of Jesus Christ, but also with a decided preference to the church of England, in which he was called to preach his name. He therefore adhered to her discipline, and explained her doctrines, with a view to enforce upon his hearers conformity to both, and a regular continuance in her communion. In pursuance of this plan, he declared his intention of preaching a course of sermons upon the thirty-nine articles of religion, and in the process of this service he received from his parishioners the following petition:

"To the Rev. William Romaine, Rector of the united parishes of St. Andrew by the Wardrobe, and St. Ann, Blackfriars.

"Reverend Sir, As you have been pleased to intimate an intention of preaching a course of sermons upon the thirty-nine articles of the church of England, and have actually proceeded in a manner that has given general satisfaction—We, the churchwardens, parishioners, and inhabitants of the above-mentioned parishes, whose names are hereunto subscribed, reflecting how many Christians are unhappily deprived of reaping any benefit from them, owing to their being confined within the narrow limits of a single church, do, for the interest of religion in general, and for our benefit in particular, join in requesting you (if agreeable to yourself) to print and publish the same; and we are the more prompted to make this request, as we are informed that there is no work of the kind now extant.

This petition was found among Mr. Romaine's papers, but the request contained in it was not complied with.

Nor was he less attentive to the temporal than to the spiritual concerns of his situation. He found the parsonage-house wholly unfit for the residence of a pastor, it having been turned unto warehouses, and being wholly out of repair. He took down the old premises, and built a handsome rectory-house close to the church, for himself and his posterity. The church also when he took possession of the living, was surrounded with a dead wall, and the avenues leading to it very narrow. His parishioners, with whom he lived from the first in peace and harmony, were prevailed upon to repair the church, and to erect a gallery at the west end of it for the accommodation of his numerous hearers, to pull down the high wall that inclosed it, so as to give it light and air, and to make all the avenues to it wide and commodious; by which means it is become one of the best places of worship in London. Mr. Romaine, who never asked any favour for himself, but always acknowledged the smallest, solicited his friends that attended the church to present the united parishes with a token of their gratitude. This request was cheerfully complied with, and the sum collected towards defraying the expenses of erecting the gallery, and other improvements amounted to five hundred pounds, which the parishes have handsomely acknowledged by an inscription over the west door.*

Whilst he promoted the improvement of the Lord's house, he laboured much to obtain decent behaviour in those who came there to worship. He too justly complained of that which with all his influence he was scarce able to remedy, the disgusting and irreverent custom of coming into church during the time of service—as if confession of sin—the praises of God in his own psalms—the reading of his will in his own word—and prayers founded upon the scriptures, and extracted from them, were a mere nothing: or as if we were to assemble ourselves together for no other purpose than just to hear a sermon. Whatever excuses may be made for such conduct upon a week-day, none can be made for it upon the Lord's day, the great business of which is his public worship, and of course our gathering together in places where he has chosen to put his name. If our place of residence is at a distance from our place of worship, we should act in this case as we do in every other, and consider that the further we have to go, the sooner we should set out. If we are to go to market, or on a journey, or on any worldly business or pleasure, we can rise, we can dress, we can set out in time, and think an apology necessary if we are not punctual: but, as to church, it seems a matter of perfect indifference, when we go, or whether we go there at all. But why are we more diligent in things which are temporal, than in those which are eternal? Why do we presume to insult the Creator, in a way in which we would not insult a fellow-creature? How can we expect a blessing from one part of the service, when we have despised and neglected the other; or indeed, how can we expect a blessing from any part, unless we have seriously and devoutly attended the whole?

There is also another custom too prevalent in and about places of public worship, which was peculiarly offensive to Mr. Romaine, and which was often reproved by him in more ways than one. The custom alluded to is that of people's conversing together either in the church, or churchyard, in a vestry, or in a board-room, as soon as the service is over. He not only spoke against such conversations from the pulpit, but frequently interrupted them, when he came out, by tapping the shoulders of those who were engaged in them; and once, if not oftener, by knocking their heads together, when he found them particularly close, and whispering in their ears, that they had forgot the "parable of the sower." He himself studiously avoided every thing of the kind, being always in church some time before service began, and retiring from it to his own house as soon as the service was over, without ever speaking a word, except to his curate, his clerk, or parish officers, upon necessary business in the vestry. A woman, it is said, once saluted him, as he came down the pulpit stairs, by telling him, that "he had been greater that night than ever." And he answered her by saying, that "the devil had told him so before he left the pulpit." If Mr. Romaine uttered these words, he took them out of the mouth of the celebrated John Bunyan, who is supposed to have been their original author, and to have uttered them upon a similar occasion. The zeal of the good woman, which provoked this saying, seems to have been somewhat like that of another in the company of our Lord, who cried out to him, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked." And the answer of the servants might have been given in the spirit of their Master, "Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it."† These certainly are the Love as Brethren.

† We cannot but admire the meekness and gentleness of Christ, as they were entirely free from that roughness and severity which often cleave to the expressions of the best great ends for which we assemble together, and were they kept always in view, they would regulate our behaviour in the use of the means which lead to them.

Mr. Romaine was a great benefactor to his parishes in another respect, and that is, as a promoter of charity. There was seldom any occasion of distress on which he did not call upon his hearers to contribute to the relief of the sufferers; and the sum raised was generally proportionate to the motive urged, viz. the love of Christ constraining himself and those that heard him. The annual collections for the schools in the ward, and the poor of the parish, made in the church, at the weekly sacraments, which he instituted, and after the charity sermons, which he preached, amounted on an average to three hundred pounds a year. On his first coming to the living the pew-openers employed in the church were two in number; when he died, they were increased to eight, and each capable of getting a comfortable livelihood from what was given them by the congregation, without any assistance from the parish. When the dreadful fire happened in Blackfriars in the year 1793, by which a number of houses were consumed that had a poor family in each story, Mr. Romaine was an eye-witness to the distressing scene. He called upon one of his parishioners at half-past three in the morning during the time of the fire, and again at nine o'clock, anxious to know what could be done for the poor sufferers. He commissioned his friend to give them something for their immediate relief; and accordingly two guineas were given to each sufferer, to the amount of about ninety guineas in the whole. Mr. Romaine made himself responsible for this sum, and on the mornings of the Sunday and Tuesday following he pleaded from the pulpit for his poor parishioners, who had been burnt out of their houses, and lost their all. The sum raised upon this occasion, added to a donation of fifty pounds from his royal highness the Duke of York, amounted to upwards of three hundred pounds, which, together with a collection made by the inhabitants of Ludgate-hill, enabled Mr. Romaine to distribute to the poor sufferers from ten to eighteen pounds a piece. He was no less zealous for every good work which came in his way. When the clergy were called upon to collect in their respective parishes for the French emigrants, he was not a whit behind the chiefest of them in this business; for which he had the honour of being noticed in an anonymous pamphlet; as if to relieve the distresses of a papist were to encourage the errors of popery. We may surely, and ought to separate the mistakes from the miseries of any man; not perhaps as causes and effects, but as to their respective influences upon our minds. We may be guarded against the one, without being hardened against the other. We may remember how the papists persecuted us in times past, but we have protested against them to very little purpose, unless we have learned to "love our enemies, to bless them that curse us, and to pray for them who despitefully use us and persecute us." And I cannot but think, that the asylum afforded them in this country, in their present distress, is to be ranked among the many acts of benevolence which reflect infinite honour upon the English nation.

There are also many of the public charities which have lost a great friend and benefactor in Mr. Romaine. None will miss him more than the Royal Humane Society. From a conviction of the usefulness of this institution, he preached a voluntary sermon for them at Blackfriars, in the year 1777. He observed that not only the lives, but the souls of some of his parishioners had been saved by the means of it; that their miraculous recovery made them serious; that their seriousness brought them to church; that the Lord of the church met them there, and gave them the spirit of faith while they were hearing of his name. Mr. Romaine preached annually for this society for seventeen years, latterly at St. Dunstan's on the Sunday after his course of lectures was ended, and his sermon generally procured thirty pounds, besides two or three new annual subscribers.*

Christians. He does not treat this woman, as though she was a messenger of Satan, sent either to flatter or to buffet him, but advises her to get more from his company than a mere transient impression, which might be soon effaced without producing its effects in her religious conduct.

* These anecdotes were communicated by Dr. Hawes, register of the Humane Society.

There is also another pious institution which has reason to regret in him the loss of a valuable friend; an institution known by the name of the Bible Society, for the purpose of distributing bibles amongst his Majesty's forces, both sea and land. Much good has been done by it, and Mr. Romaine had it much at heart; he preached for it in his own and other churches in London, and in different places in the country, during his summer excursions, by which means he was a great benefactor to it every year. I am sorry to hear that it has been on the decline, and involved in debt; but it is to be hoped that God will raise up advocates to plead its cause, and that there will be a revival of so good a work, at a time when we not only want soldiers and sailors, but when we want them to fight in the cause of God and truth, against the most daring spirit of error and innovation that was ever yet in the world.

The life of Mr. Romaine upon earth was the course of a man who pursued the even tenor of his way in the service of Christ, and in the ministry of the church of England. It had little or no concern with the men, the politics, or the fashions of this present evil world; it had therefore no great variety as to its outward appearances among men, except in his removals from one situation to another, till he was established first in the lectureship of St. Dunstan's, and afterwards in the living of Blackfriars. These were the theatres in which he acted his part, and exerted his talents to the glory of God, and the good of men. His time then was most regularly disposed of. He resided in London, or near it, from the commencement of the law-term in November, until the long vacation after Trinity-term, when he generally set out upon a summer excursion, which was always into the north as long as his mother lived, and afterwards chiefly into the west of England; where he had many friends, who were always refreshed by his company, and many churches open to him, which were always benefited by his preaching. He seldom passed a silent sabbath, and never by his own inclination; being desirous, as he expressed it, to say a word for his Master in every place. His Bible was his companion both in travel and at home, and regularly read through every year. He lived more with God than with men, and in order to know his real history, or the best part of it, it would be requisite to know what passed between God and his own soul. Much of this has been brought to light in his "Life, Walk, and Triumph of Faith;" and more will appear in his private letters, which are now collecting for the public view, and which are to be received as the effusions of a good man, full of faith and the Holy Ghost, and as a little history of heaven upon earth.

He was a man naturally close and reserved, irritable to a certain degree, short and quick in his replies, but frequently mistaken as being rude and morose, where he meant nothing of the kind. Had he paid more attention than he did to the various distresses of soul and body, which were brought before him, he could have had no time left for reading, for meditation, for doctrine, for prayer, and, in short, for what every man must attend to in private who would be useful in public. It was not uncommon for him to tell those who came to him with cases of conscience, and questions of spiritual concern, that he said all that he had to say in the pulpit. These people might be hurt for the moment by such a dismission, but they had only to attend upon his preaching the next opportunity, and they found that their difficulties had impressed him as well as themselves, that they had been submitted to God, and been the subjects of his very serious and affectionate consideration. This circumstance contributed much to make his sermons particularly useful; as they were first explanations of the text, and then particular and personal applications of it to the case and condition of every hearer. They were, without appearing to be, studied discourses; not aiming at excellency of speech or wisdom, but at that manifestation of the truth by which he might commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

Not that he shunned conversation in its place and season, and the mutual intercourses of a steady and constant friendship, which he kept up with many for a series of years. In company he was polite, affable, and instructive, without wishing them to be made public, and thinking very justly, that it reflects no small honour upon an institution which he has so much at heart, to have had its cause pleaded by so good a man as Mr. Romaine.

affectation; and in domestic life, where the tempers of most men are tried and discovered, he had none superior to him as a master, a father, and a husband. So that he was a man who improved upon acquaintance, and they who knew him best were they who most respected him.

As a family man he had his comforts and his trials. Of the latter none more severe than the loss of his second son, who died in the East Indies, of which event he received the following account in a letter from his commanding officer.

"Sir,—It gives me great concern to be under the disagreeable necessity of communicating to you a melancholy event, in which you are nearly interested. Captain Romaine was seized about a fortnight ago with a disorder in his bowels, which terminated in a flux. I am sorry to add that the consequences have been fatal to him. Every attention has been paid to his memory which our situation permitted. I will not add to the distress which this misfortune must occasion, by describing how much he was beloved, and how much was expected from him by every person in the regiment.

'I have the honour to be
"Sir,
"Your most obedient and very "Faithful servant, &c.
"Trincomaley, June 4, 1782." ——."

He received this letter upon a Thursday, and being much affected with it, was pressed by Mrs. Romaine not to go to St. Dunstan's that evening; but he answered that he must not leave his Master's concerns unattended to on that account, and he went and preached as usual.

In nothing was Mr. Romaine more to be admired than in the management of his time. His hour of breakfast was six in the morning, of dinner half-past one at noon, and of supper seven in the evening. His family were assembled to prayer at nine o'clock in the morning, and at the same hour at night. His particular friends were admitted occasionally to his morning service, and found it a most profitable and precious occasion: for his previous meditations had been upon the Lord's word; his Hebrew psalter was his constant companion at breakfast, and he has been often heard to say, how much his first repast was sanctified by the word of God and prayer. From ten o'clock to one he was generally employed in visiting the sick and his friends: he retired to his study after dinner, and sometimes resumed the exercise of walking, which he deferred till after supper, in the height of summer. After the evening service in his family he retired again to his study, and to his bed at the hour of ten. From this mode of living he never deviated, except when he was a guest in the houses of his friends, and then he breakfasted at seven, dined at two, and supped at eight. His adherence to rule in this respect was never more strongly marked than in a circumstance which befel him during the last years of his life. He was invited by a great dignitary in the church to dine with him at five o'clock; he felt respect for that person, and wished to show it; instead therefore of sending a written apology, he waited upon him himself, thanked him for his invitation, and excused himself by pleading his long habits of early hours, his great age, and often infirmities. Here was plain truth united, as it may be, with polished manners: it rendered honour to whom honour was due, and it supported the character of a man who walked by the same rule, who minded the same thing, and who lived the life that he now lived in the flesh by the faith of the Son of God.

Mr. Romaine derived many advantages from this regular disposition of his time: he redeemed it from many idle visits, much vain conversation, and from all conformity to the world. His plan of life precluded all these things, and great must have been his gain in a pilgrimage of fourscore years. His chief arts of health were rule and temperance, and they were the means of preserving to the end of his days the soundness of his mind, the health of his body, and the prosperity of his soul.

His natural temper, like that of most other people, might have given him

plague enough; but it was subject to divine grace, and therefore furnished him with matter of praise as well as humiliation. In his latter years it was scarce discoverable; and whatever defects of it had appeared in the former parts of his life, he was not backward to acknowledge them. One proof of this may supply the place of many—the anecdote is authentic—it may be useful to many—it can be offensive to none; for it reflects no little honour on the parties concerned in it, of whom our departed friend was one, and a dissenting minister, now alive, the other. This minister had often attended Mr. Romaine's lectures at St. Dunstan's, till hearing some very severe things thrown out against the dissenters, and which he thought not justifiable, he determined to wait upon Mr. Romaine for an explanation. He did so accordingly; and having made his observations and complaints, Mr. Romaine replied, "I do not want to have any thing to say to you, sir."—"If you will hear me, sir," added the other, "I will tell you my name; I must, sir, acquaint you with my profession, I am a Protestant dissenting minister."—"Sir," said Mr. Romaine, "I neither wish to know your name nor your profession." Upon which Mr. Towle (who is the gentleman here alluded to) bowed, and took his leave. Some time after Mr. Romaine, to the great surprise of his hearer and reprover, returned his visit, and after the usual salutation,—"Well, Mr. Towle, I am not come to renounce my principles, I have not changed my sentiments, I will not give up my preference to the church of England, &c.; but I am come as a Christian to make some apology. I think my behaviour to you, sir, the other day, was not becoming, nor such as it should have been," &c. They then shook hands, and parted good friends. The substance of this relation, when it was made to me, I immediately communicated to the surviving party concerned in it, requesting to know the truth of it, with any additional circumstances he might recollect, as well as his permission to make it public. The following is part of his very handsome answer to my letter. "Without any hesitation, and with the greatest cheerfulness, would I instantly comply with your request, but really, sir, it is not in my power. I cannot recollect the particular circumstances of the affair you refer to, or the particular expressions used by Mr. Romaine and myself in our first interview, or afterwards by Mr. Romaine when he called on me. So far do I remember the substance of what passed both at his house and mine, that I am certain the account given in your letter contains the general outlines of the whole matter. Although at the close of the last conversation Mr. Romaine and I positively disavowed the least idea of renouncing our respective principles, or being indifferent towards them; united in our abhorrence of that temporising which is too fashionable in our day, each expressed a sincere esteem for the other, a friendly intercourse was kept up between him and myself to the day of his death, and I have not the smallest suspicion but that, as long as I live, I shall remember him with veneration, as an eminently consistent and respectable character."

This testimony is true, and worth a thousand stories; it neither discredits the pen of the survivor, nor the memory of the deceased; nor ought it to be without its use to the reader. We are prone to judge others, though we can seldom do it without condemning ourselves; and if we are partakers with one another in faults and infirmities, we shall do well to be followers of those who have shewed a consciousness, and made confession of them.

Among other friends and admirers of Mr. Romaine, was the unhappy Dr. Dodd. When he began the world he was a zealous favourer of Hebrew learning, and distinguished himself as a preacher. From a professed similitude in studies and principles, he cultivated an acquaintance with Mr. Romaine; but when he forsook such companions, having loved this present world, he told Mr. Romaine that he should be glad to see him at his house, but hoped not to be acknowledged by him, if they should happen to meet in public company. All intercourse therefore ceased between them, till the love of the world, and the things that are in it, brought its victim to prison. At this time a particular friend of Dr. Dodd, who, much to his honour, stuck close to him in all his disgrace and adversity, met Mr. Romaine, in his way from Newgate, at the bottom of the Old Bailey. Their conversation naturally turned upon the unhappy person whom he had just left; and after usual inquiries, Mr. Romaine said, he was sorry to hear that Dr. Dodd in prison was visited by light and trifling company. The doctor's friend was equally surprised and hurt at the report of such an untruth; and particularly that it should have been carried to one, of whom Dr. Dodd had ever expressed a high opinion, and with whom in former years he had lived in a degree of intimacy. He told Mr. Romaine that indeed he was sadly misinformed; that by himself he might fairly estimate the society of Dr. Dodd's room; that none resorted thither but they whose minds were duly and deeply impressed like his own; and that, even as to others, he conceived that the surrounding circumstances of horror were sufficient to preclude all levity and impertinence. Mr. Romaine expressed himself as glad to hear this, gave up his authority upon which he made his former assertions, and promised to do all in his power to set right so injurious a business. He then left Dr. Dodd's friend at the door of St. Dunstan's, where he was going to preach his evening lecture.

Whether his prejudices were removed by this interview, or whether his pity was excited by the circumstances of the prisoner himself, Mr. Romaine afterwards visited him at his particular request. A gentleman one day met him there, and, wishing to know his sentiments, took care to leave Newgate at the same time; when, walking out together, he asked him if he, who knew so much of the human heart, thought poor Dodd a real, sincere penitent. Mr. Romaine answered, I hope he may be a real penitent, but there is a great difference between saying and feeling, "God be merciful to me a sinner." This saying, as the lady who communicated it justly observed, deserves to be written in letters of gold. The same lady has favoured us with another anecdote of Mr. Romaine, which equally proves his abhorrence of sin, and his pity for the sinner. He was walking in the street with a gentleman, when he overheard a poor thoughtless man solemnly calling upon Jehovah to damn him for ever to the bottomless pit. Mr. Romaine stopped, took half-a-crown out of his pocket, and said, "My friend, I will give you this, if you will repeat that oath again." The man started, and said, "What, sir, do you think I will damn my soul for half-a-crown?" Mr. Romaine mildly replied, "As you did it just now for nothing, I could not suppose that you would refuse to do it for a reward." The poor creature, struck, as Mr. Romaine meant he should be, replied, "God bless and reward you, sir, whoever you are; I believe you have saved my soul. I hope I shall never swear again as long as I live."

It were to be wished, for the sake of posterity, that a man whose heart was so whole with God, and whose very soul was in the work of Christ, had kept a diary, or committed more of his thoughts and the occurrences of his life to writing. But among all his papers only one of this sort has been found, entitled, "An Old Man," and written on the day when he attained to the age of threescore years and ten. A happier day was never spent upon earth. Take the description of it in his own words.

"Through the gracious hand of my God I have this day arrived at the age of man; I have therefore set it apart for meditation, prayer, and praise. May the Holy Spirit help me to improve it, that I may spend the little of my remaining time with more faith and unceasing gratitude. When I look back, I would be all adoration. As a creature I worship the Creator. Once I was nothing, and He brought me into being. O, what distinguishing favour to make me a rational creature! And as I was a ruined man, a sinner guilty, helpless, miserable! O, what sovereign grace to make me a new man! Who can tell (I cannot) how great the love was which provided a Saviour for such a rebel! What patience, how infinite? To spare me through childhood, through youth, through manhood, when every day, and every thing in the day, were calling aloud for vengeance. I might have been many years ago in hell, and most justly; and now I adore the long-suffering of God, which kept me out of it. He had purposes of love toward me, which he made known in his own time and way. It was sovereign love which brought me to know myself, and to know Jesus. His own holy Spirit begun and carried on the work. He opened mine eyes to understand the scriptures. He gave me to believe their truth, and to feel their power; and now I set my seal to every word in them; finding God to be true and faithful, true in the promise, faithful in the fulfilment. Rec. Christ—one with him—live by him—live on him—worship him—do all on earth as well as I can, till he enable me to do it better in heaven.

"In this believing view of things, I acknowledge that I have lived to a blessed time. All that is worth enjoying has been freely given to me. By the quickening grace of the Spirit, brought into oneness with Jesus, and to partake of the Father's love in Him, all is mine. Glory be to Father, Son, and Spirit in the highest, the covenanting 3ty.* is mine. These are the prospects which faith, looking back, opens to the Christian with delight; and thereby renders my present condition a subject of praise and thankfulness. My time is almost run out, and what is short is now also but labour and sorrow. So says the Oracle. And I feel it. The infirmities of age, the decay of the faculties of mind as well as body, consequently usefulness in one's place and station dying daily, these are always giving warning that the house made with hands must soon be taken down. It begins to be very troublesome to keep it up. One prop falls after another, and repeats the lesson—You must soon be turned out. Look after the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Blessed be God for giving us the earnest of his Spirit, to enable us to look forward with a pleasing hope, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life.

"It is by this same faith that God has reconciled my heart to his providence. He is my Father, Jesus my portion, and my exceeding great reward; my God, and my Keeper. It is my privilege that he is to manage for me. He knows what is best for me, and to him I leave it. To be richer or greater, in more health, or in more honour, would be no addition to my happiness. I have enough of this world's goods. I am content with my place and station, and ask for nothing but more thankfulness for what I have. O what a calm does this bring upon my mind! Looking back I can see his gracious dealings with me in all the events of my life. And he has brought me and settled me in the very condition in which I ought to be. What has God done? What has he not done to make me satisfied? Indeed I have all the reason that ever man had to adore him for his providence, and to bless him for his dealings with the children of men.

"This day such are my views of his goodness to me in the time past, both in temporal, and also in spiritual mercies. All is well; and blessings on his name, the prospect before me, notwithstanding the infirmities of age, is comfortable. The promises in the word afford exercise for faith, and never-ceasing dependence; not only general promises, but also particular, suited exactly to my present circumstances. Our God has made gracious provision for old age, and has enabled me to make use of it, that through patience and comfort of the scriptures, I might now have hope. He has given me a general warrant for my security. I have committed myself into his care and keeping; and he has declared, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." This is a continual cordial, and extends its heart-felt influence to the special promises, such as Isaiah xlvi. 3, 4. This is spoken to the whole Israel of God, who have not only the life of the body from him, but chiefly the life of the soul. He creates them anew by the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. He is the Author—He is the carrier on—He brings that life to its full perfection. It is every moment supported by his power, and blessed with his paternal affection. Age may come, hoary hairs may appear, the vigour of the faculties may decay, but his love is the same. He reveals it. He applies it. The old man feels it, and he turns it into the prayer of faith. O my Father, I do hearken unto thee; Thou hast supported, Thou hast carried me from my birth to this moment; and I doubt not but now in mine old age, and in my hoary hairs, Thou wilt still carry me and bear me, until Thou hast finally delivered me. Amen—I believe, Lord, it shall be done unto me according to thy word."

The last years of his life seem to have taken their turn from this day. His

"hoary head was found in the way of righteousness, and it was indeed a crown of glory." There appeared to be little but heaven in his sermons, and in his life. He was "an example to believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith and purity." It has been observed to me of him, that he was a diamond, rough often, but very pointed, and the more he was broken by years, the more he appeared to shine. There was indeed a light upon his countenance, and particularly when he preached, which appeared like the dawn, or the faint resemblance of glory. If one met him by the way, and asked him how he did, his general answer was, "As well as I can be out of heaven." He made this reply a little before his death, to a friend and acquaintance older than himself, and of a different communion; and then added, "there is but one central point, in which we must all meet, Jesus Christ and him crucified." This was the object which he kept always in sight—this the subject which dwelt upon his heart and tongue—the wonderful God-man, whom, according to his own expressions, he had taken for body and for soul, for time and for eternity, his present and his everlasting all.

He has drawn his own character when describing the "Triumph of Faith" over the infirmities of age. He was a cheerful pleasant old man. He walked in the steps of the faith of Abraham, and "brought forth more fruit in his age till he died an old man and full of days," satisfied with all that was past, all that was present, and all that was before him. He pursued his ministerial labours, and his summer excursions (which he frequently denominated his summer and winter campaigns) to the last, keeping the field as a good soldier and servant of Jesus Christ, till it pleased his Master to call him to an honourable retreat, and soon to give him his final discharge. The decline of his mortal life was gentle in itself, and rapid in its progress; but so protracted as to enable him to show, that the "Lord his strength was true, and that there was no unrighteousness in him." The same faith, which employed him so well and so happily in his health and life, was his support in sickness, and his joy in dissolution.

His fatal illness attacked him on the sixth day of June, and put a period to his mortal life on the twenty-sixth day of July—a season of seven weeks, in which he was exercised as a patient instead of a preacher. As the presence of God had been with him in one state, so it did not leave him in the other. The last sermon which he preached, was on the preceding Thursday evening at St. Dunstan's; it was an exposition of the eighteenth chapter of St. John's Gospel; he remarked to his curate, that he must get on as fast as he could, lest he should not get through the Gospel, as it was his intention to do, before the lectures were over. He complained of languor after preaching, and returned to Mr. Whitridge's house at Balaam-hill, beyond Clapham, where he was then upon a visit. His concluding sermon at Blackfriars was on the preceding Tuesday morning from the thirteenth verse of the hundred and third Psalm, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." He was going through the Psalm, and though he did not preach upon the following verses, he practised them in a very remarkable manner, and left his dying testimony to the truth of them. "For he knoweth our frame, he remembereth that we are but dust. As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more. But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting, to them that fear him: and his righteousness unto children's children. To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them." The mortality of man and the mercy of Jehovah, here so pathetically described, met together in the person of Mr. Romaine, and formed a most delightful union. The one released him from all misery, the other introduced him to all happiness. But how sad is the case when these things are separated? What a wretch is one, subject to mortality, and not at the same time an object of the mercy of the Lord?

Mr. Romaine, from the moment that he was seized with his illness, considered it as his last; and though at intervals he had faint symptoms of a probable recovery, yet he never attempted to resume his ministerial functions. He spoke of himself as a dying man, but always in the language of one who was living and believing in Jesus. On the morning of his seizure he came down to breakfast at six o'clock as usual, presided in family devotion, and prayed most earnestly to God, that "He would fit them for, and support them in, their trials that day, which might be many." Such they were to his friends, if not to himself; for he received his summons "to depart, and to be with Christ." He returned the same day to London, and conversed most profitably and comfortably in the way, on the approach of death, and near prospect of eternity. "O! how animating is the view which I now have of death, and the hope laid up for me in heaven full of glory and immortality!"

The next day was the sabbath, and he was expected to preach as usual. The feelings of his congregation, when he did not appear among them, and the painful office to which his fellow-servant in the ministry was called, when he stood up in his place and assigned the cause of his absence, are more easily conceived than described. Lamentations more sincere never were excited, and prayers more fervent never ascended from earth to heaven.

He continued three weeks in London under medical advice, and made use of the means which his physician thought fit to prescribe to him. "You are taking," said he, "much pains to prop up this feeble body: I thank you for it; it will not do now." His Hebrew psalter lay close by him, and out of it he frequently read a verse or two, not being able to attend to more. The nature of his disorder was such, that he could speak but little; and being once asked if he would see some of his friends, he replied, "he needed no better company than he enjoyed." The Lord his God was with him, and so blessed him with faith and patience that no one fretful or murmuring word ever escaped his lips.

Soon after he was seized, a friend called upon business, and took the opportunity of saying, he hoped he was better, and happy in his views. "Yes," replied he, "upon that point I have no doubt, for I have much of the presence of Jesus with me." He sent a message by this person to his curate, being unable to converse with him, to desire his prayers; and that his friends, and all the congregation, would remember him at the throne of grace. This he frequently afterwards repeated to his curate. At other times he said, "he had been in the deep waters, but had enjoyed much support; that he waited to enter into the courts of the Lord; that his soul was athirst for God, yea, even the living God."

On the twenty-sixth of June he left town, and went to a friend's house at Tottenham, for a fortnight, where he was so much better, as to be able to walk about the garden. Upon his return to town, he was again visited by his curate, and thought to be a little revived. He said, that he had long laid at first in the arms of death, and, if recovering, it was very slowly. "But this," says he, "is but a poor dying life at best; however, I am in his hands who will do the best for me," and added with a peculiar energy, "I am sure of that. I have lived to experience all I have spoken, and all I have written, and I bless God for it." After much the same expressions he added to another friend, "I have the peace of God in my conscience, and the love of God in my heart; and that, you know, is sound experience"—and again—"I knew before the doctrines I preached to be truths, but now I experience them to be blessings." Thanking another friend for a visit, he said, "that he had come to see a saved sinner." This, he had often affirmed, should be his dying boast, and that he desired to die with the language of the publican in his mouth, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

In this frame of mind he continued a few days in London, and returned on the thirteenth day of July to his friends at Balaam-hill, where he had been originally seized. His strength from that time rapidly decayed. He had frequent spasms at his heart, and shortness of breath, attended with degrees of pain and convulsion; but his faith and patience never failed him. He was frequently saying, "O how good is God! What entertainments and comforts does he give me: What a prospect do I see before me of glory and immortality! He is my God in life, in death, and throughout eternity." On the twenty-third day of July, as he sat at breakfast, he said, "It is now near sixty years since God opened my mouth to publish the everlasting sufficiency and eternal glory of the salvation of Christ Jesus; and it has now pleased him to shut my mouth, that my heart might feel and experience what my mouth hath so often spoken." On the twenty-fourth day of July, after he had been helped down stairs, he said, "O! how good is God! with what a night has he favoured me!" requesting, as he had often done, that prayers without ceasing might be made for him, that his faith and patience might not fail. He expressed exceeding great kindness and affection for his partner Mrs. Romaine, and thanking her for all her care of him, he said, "Come, my love, that I may bless you; the Lord be with you a covenant God for ever to save and bless you." He addressed himself with the same tenderness and affection to his son; of whom also he spoke much and oft during his illness, expressing his hope of him as a son in the faith as well as the flesh. The lady who was cherishing in her house such a dying guest, upon seeing and hearing him bless his wife, said, "Have you not a blessing for me, sir?" "Yes," he said, "I have; I pray God to bless you," and so he said to every one that came to him. On Saturday the twenty-fifth day of July, he was not down stairs at all, but lay upon the couch all day, in great weakness of body, but strong in faith, giving glory to God.—The power of Christ was resting upon him, and keeping him in the continual exercise of prayer and praise. This was the last day spent upon earth, and in the close of it he was thought to have said, "Yea, though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." About an hour before he died, his friend and host went up to him, and said, "I hope, my dear sir, you now find the salvation of Jesus Christ precious, dear, and valuable to you." His answer was, "He is a precious Saviour to me now." These were the last words which he uttered to man. To the Lord he said, "Holy, Holy, Holy! Holy blessed Jesus, to thee be endless praise!" And in the first hour of the next day, which was the sabbath-day, he resigned his spirit to God who gave it.

So lived and so died the Rev. William Romaine.

It was the design of his surviving relations to restore his dust to the earth with a plain and private burial; but every intention of this sort was prevented by the affection of his numerous friends, who were all importunate to show the last respect to his person, by attending his remains to the grave. On Monday, the third day of August, 1795, the corpse was removed from Mr. Whitridge's house, at Balaam-hill, in order to be interred in the rectory-vault of Blackfriars church. The funeral proceeded about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and was joined on Clapham-common, by nearly fifty coaches, filled with the lamenting followers of their revered and beloved pastor. It was attended by many more on foot, who surrounded the hearse, or followed it weeping. By the time that the procession reached the Obelisk in St. George's Fields, the multitude collected was very great indeed; but silence, solemnity, and decorum, universally prevailed. At the foot of Blackfriars bridge, the children of the charity-school, together with the parish beadles, were waiting to attend. The city marshals on horseback with their men, and with black silk scarfs, and hatbands, rode before the hearse to the entrance of the church. These had been ordered out by the lord mayor, as his token of respect to the memory of a man who had sustained so great and so useful a character in the city of London. The constables of the ward also attended to preserve order, lest any evil-minded people should take advantage of such an opportunity to raise a disturbance; but nothing of the kind appeared: there seemed to be but one mind in the vast multitude, and but one impression made by the loss of an able minister of the New Testament, and a faithful steward of the mysteries of God.

Excepting the space left for the entrance of the corpse and its attendants, the church was previously filled with people, who were clothed in black, and were inwardly mourning over their departed minister. The funeral service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Goode to a very numerous and affected audience, weeping not for him who was at rest from his labours, but for themselves and for their children, who had lost the benefit of them.

The church was hung in black, as was also the church at St. Dunstan's, and three funeral sermons preached on the Lord's day following. The same tokens of love and esteem were shown in different places of worship, and the same testimonies borne by different ministers to the excellencies of a man who deserved so well of them all. He lived and died in the communion of the English church, and in most cordial fellowship with all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

There remained to be paid but one tribute more, and that was a monument, which is now erected in the church where his body is laid. A monument inscribed, not with the virtues of a statesman or a hero, but with the heavenly virtues of a man whom God "called out of darkness into his marvellous light," whom he permitted to shine for a season in his church upon earth, and has now gathered to his people in heaven; where "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.

TWELVE DISCOURSES

ON

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

Preached at St. Dunstan's in the West, London.

PREFACE.

MANY are the mistakes at present about religious matters; but none are more destructive than those which concern the law and the gospel. The generality of our people confound them, and put one in the place of the other. Some suppose they are to be accepted of God for their works, and that they can be justified by the law in the sight of God. Others make their keeping of the law the condition of their receiving the blessings of the gospel, as if these were to be the purchase and reward of their partial obedience. Some are persuaded they must do all they can, and keep the law with all their might, and wherein they come short of the perfect demands of the law, Christ will, out of his merits, atone for their failings. And others again think that Christ has abated the rigour of the law, and that the gospel is nothing more than a new law dispensation, in which the Lord has been pleased to declare that he will accept of sincere obedience instead of perfect. These and many more such like mistakes prevail in our times, and they are exceedingly dangerous, tending to the utter ruin both of body and soul. In the following discourses I have endeavoured to distinguish, and precisely to settle the difference between the law and the gospel. Some of the principles upon which I have proceeded are these:

1. The Lord God, the Almighty Creator of all things visible and invisible, has an unalienable right to make laws for the government of his creatures. This right is founded in his absolute dominion on and sovereignty over them. They are his property, the work of his hands. He hath created and made them, and not they themselves. Their life, and all things belonging to it are his, coming from his gift, and continued by his bounty: and therefore he has a most indisputable claim to their obedience. What he requires, they must perform; because they are his creatures. The relation between the Creator and his creatures puts them under a necessity of obeying his law and will, or else of suffering whatever he shall threaten to inflict upon their disobedience.

2. The law of the Lord God, the almighty Creator, is unalterable. It changeth not; for it is the copy of God's most holy mind and will, in which there can be no variableness, neither shadow of turning. If the mind and will of God were to change, then God would be a changeable being, and whatever is changeable is imperfect, but God is perfect, therefore his mind and will change not. His word will he not break, nor alter the law that is gone out of his mouth. His infinite wisdom, and his almighty power, stand engaged to maintain its dignity, that it may be always an holy, just, and good law, which he will not break or alter.

3. The moral law, which the Lord God revealed to Adam in Paradise, required of him perfect uninterrupted obedience. The whole moral law is summed up in one word, namely, love; love to God for the blessings of creation and providence, and love to man for God's sake. This love was the indispensable homage due to the Creator. It could not be alienated from him, and given to any other object without idolatry: for which reason the moral law is unalterable. If a man withdraw his love in the least from God, he breaks that law which positively enjoins him to love the Lord his God with all his heart, with all his soul, with all his mind, and with all his strength.

4. The law given to Adam being unalterable, all his descendants are bound to keep it; for they are all under the law, as God's creatures. His will is the indispensable rule of their obedience. He requires their love, and if they refuse to give it him, then their will is opposite to his, which is rebellion against their sovereign Lord, and which must bring upon them swift destruction.

5. All mankind have sinned and broken the moral law. The authority of God's word is positive and express. "We have before proved," says the apostle, "both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin, as it is written, there is none righteous, no not one. There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are altogether become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no not one." Rom. iii. 9, 10, &c. And after the apostle has proved these truths from various arguments, he sums up the evidence thus: "Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and that all the world may become guilty before God; therefore, by the deeds of the law, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight." Rom. iii. 19, 20. It is evident from these authorities, that all have sinned, and are transgressors of the law.

6. The law has made no provision for the pardon of the least transgression. It requires perfect unsinning obedience in thought, word, and deed. This is its just demand. And in case of the least failing, it immediately passes sentence and condemns. It will not accept of sorrow or tears, of repentance or amendment, as any satisfaction; but its language is, "Do this, or thou shalt die." There is not a word said about sorrowing for what was past, and reforming for the future, as if the style of the law was, "Be sorry for thy sin, and reform, and then thou shalt not die:" but it is positive and express, "Keep the law, and thou shalt live; transgress it, and thou shalt die: for cursed is every one, who continueth not in all things, that are written in the book of the law to do them."

7. From these premises it follows, that the law being unalterable, and all men having broken it, and there being no provision made in the law for the pardon of the least transgression, but a punishment threatened to the least, they are therefore guilty before God. The law brings them in guilty, and condemns them, and divine justice is bound to inflict the deserved pains and penalties; so that there can be no possibility of justifying them by the law. By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified: for the law is expressly called by the apostle, the ministration of condemnation, and the ministration of death.

8. Since the law is thus unalterable, and punishment is threatened to the least breach of it, and since all men have broken it, and all the world is guilty before God, and condemned by the law to death and hell, and without strength to do any thing for their deliverance, it follows that there can be no salvation by the law.

From these particulars we may be able to state the true nature of the moral law. It is the revealed will of God discovering to his creatures what obedience he requires of them, namely, perfect unsinning obedience, an absolute conformity to the law in thought, word, and deed. It is an unalterable law, founded on God's unalterable will, and therefore it requires this perfect obedience of all men, and at all times. It has made no provision for partial obedience, or for sincere obedience, but insists upon man's continuing to do all things that are written in the book of the law, if he hope by the deeds of the law to be justified and saved.

If this be the true state of the case, how widely do these men mistake the nature and demands of the moral law, who expect to be made righteous before God, by their partial obedience. The law knows nothing of any righteousness, but what is perfect. If you put your trial at God's bar upon this issue, that you have kept the law in most instances, having failed only in some few, this is pleading guilty. It is owning your transgression, and confessing that you have not such a righteousness as the law demands: for a part is not the whole. And the law insists upon the whole, and, in case of failure, passes sentence, and condemns you; for it is written, "Cursed is every one, who continueth not in all things," &c.

But some may ask, Will not the law accept of sincere obedience? Nay. It will abate nothing of its demands. It will have absolutely perfect obedience, if by the works of it a man be justified before God. There is not one word in the law about sincerity; no, not a single hint, as if a man might be pardoned, who kept the law sincerely, although imperfectly. The law says—Do all things which God has commanded, and continue to do them with all thy heart, mind, soul, and strength, and then thou shalt be justified by thy works; but if thou offend in one instance, thou comest under the curse; for he that offendeth in one point is guilty of all, and consequently sincere obedience failing in one point, leaves a man guilty, and under the curses of the broken law.

It highly concerns those persons to consider this matter well, who fancy that Christ came as a great lawgiver, to publish milder terms of acceptance than the moral law had required. They have a notion of Christ, as if he were only the publisher of some new remedial law, which abated something of the demands, and mitigated some of the rigour of the moral law: whereas he came not to publish any new law, but to save his people from their sins committed against the old law. He came to be a Saviour, and not a lawgiver. Indeed, he preached the law, but it was to bring men to the knowledge of sin, and to see and to feel their want of his salvation. But he preached nothing new. He only enforced the law in its spiritual nature, and in its full extent, showing the length and breadth, the depth and height of the commandment. He would not have his people so much as entertain a thought of his coming to make a change in the moral law. "Think not," says he, "that I am come to destroy the law; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil it:" and he did fulfil it; for he was born under the law, and was obedient to it even unto death. The law was unalterable. It could not change, unless God's most holy mind and will could change, which is impossible, and therefore the law being broken, could not remit the deserved punishment, unless some infinitely perfect obedience should be paid, and some infinitely meritorious sufferings should be undergone in the sinner's stead, by which the law might be magnified and made honourable. And the Lord Christ undertook to do this. He vouchsafed to obey and to suffer for his people; to obey the precepts, and to suffer the pains and penalties of the law. The law had indicted them, and found them guilty of disobedience. Christ came to obey for them, as it is written, "By the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." The law had put them under the curse, and he came to redeem them from the curse of the law. The law threatened to punish them, and he came to bear their sins, and the punishment due to them in his own body upon the tree. So that Christ came not to publish a new remedial law, but to glorify the moral law, and to demonstrate the unchangeable nature of it, since no obedience, and no sufferings, but his, which were absolutely perfect, divine and infinite, could work out such a righteousness for any one sinner, as the law required, in order to his being justified in the sight of God.

As these arguments show that the sinner cannot of himself attain the perfect righteousness which the law demands, so do they prove that he cannot by any means in his own power escape the punishment which the law threatens. The law requires unsinning obedience, and enforces it upon those sanctions,—"Do this and thou shalt live." "In the day that thou transgressest, dying thou shalt surely die." These sanctions of the law are as much the mind and will of God, as the rule of the law itself: and his will is unalterable; consequently upon transgression the sanction took place, and the transgressor became subject to the first, and to the second death, which justice was bound to see inflicted upon him. What could he do in this case to deliver himself? Could he offer any thing to divine justice, to save himself from receiving the wages of sin? No. They are his due, and he must receive them. Say, he is sorry for his sin, and weeps and mourns bitterly. What does this avail? This is only an open confession of his guilt, and an acknowledgment that he deserves punishment. Suppose he amends and reforms his life. What atonement is this for his former bad life? The law will not be satisfied with such partial obedience. But he promises never to sin for the future. If he could keep his promise, it would not satisfy the law; for what becomes of his past disobedience? One single sin cuts him off for ever from being saved by the law; and since all have sinned, consequently by the works of the broken law can no man living be justified.

This is the true state of all men by nature. They are all sinners, and they cannot be saved by the moral law. It can neither altogether nor in part justify them, and therefore it shuts them up under guilt, and leaves them without remedy and without hope. As soon as man was fallen into this state, it pleased God to reveal that rich plan of grace and mercy, which is contained in the gospel, of which this is a short sketch.

1. The gospel is salvation from the law. It brings glad tidings for poor convinced sinners, discovering to them how their sins may be pardoned, and they may be redeemed from the curses of the broken law. It reveals to them what Christ has done and suffered to satisfy the law, and how he endured the pains and penalties of it, dying the death, to which the law had sentenced them. And the gospel calls upon them to receive the benefit of what he did and suffered as his free gift, proposing to them, without money and without price, all the graces and blessings which the Saviour purchased with his life and death.

2. The gospel sets forth to the convinced sinner salvation from guilt and punishment, by giving him freely as perfect a righteousness as the law demands. It invites him to receive the righteousness of Christ, against which the utmost rigour of the law can make no objection. Because it is the righteousness of God, a divine, infinite, and absolutely perfect righteousness. When this righteousness is imputed to the sinner, he is pardoned; the law ceases to accuse; conscience no longer condemns: he has peace with God, and the love of God reigns in his heart.

3. In order to receive this righteousness the gospel requires no previous qualification. The sinner is not regarded, as fit and meet to receive Christ's righteousness by any thing he himself can do. Christ freely wrought it out, and he freely gives it. The works of the law have no merit to purchase it: for it is written, "We are justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." And if it be by grace, then it cannot be by any works or qualifications.

4. But how is Christ's righteousness received, and the sinner made righteous by it at God's bar? By faith and not by works. "For to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay, but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law."

5. With respect then to the sinner's acceptance and justification before God, the law and the gospel ought to be distinguished in these as well as in other respects.

According to the law, salvation is by works, according to the gospel, it is by grace.

The law says, Do this; but the gospel says, Believe this, and thou shalt be saved.

The law threatens to punish the sinner for the first offence, but the gospel offers him pardon for many offences.

The law leaves him under guilt and condemnation, the gospel invites him to receive pardon and salvation.

The law sentences him to death, the gospel offers him justification to life.

By the law he is a guilty sinner, by the gospel he may be made a glorious saint.

If he die under the guilt of the broken law, hell will be his everlasting portion; if he die a partaker of the grace of the gospel, heaven will be his eternal inheritance.

6. But if the law and the gospel are distinct in these and several other respects, some persons may think the law is totally repealed by the gospel: for they cannot see wherefore serveth the law, unless it be to justify a sinner. The law is unalterable. It cannot change any more than God can change. To this day it stands in full force, and not one tittle of it is repealed. It is still the revelation of God's most holy mind and will, concerning the obedience which he requires of his creatures. And if they disobey, the law immediately passes sentence and condemns them to death. While they continue careless and secure in sin, they consider not the law as the ministration of death and condemnation; and none of them see it in this light, until the Holy Spirit awaken them. It is by his preaching of the law to their consciences, that they are alarmed with fearful apprehensions of their guilt, and of their danger. He brings them to see the exceeding sinfulness of sinning against the holy, just, and good law of God, and convinces them that the broken law can never make them legally righteous. This puts them upon seeking such a righteousness as the law requires, and disposes them to receive gladly the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ: for he is now the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

7. Thus the Holy Spirit convinces sinners that the law is not repealed by the gospel, and when he gives them the righteousness which is of God by faith, and they have justification to life freely by grace, does he teach them to make void the law by faith? God forbid. Yea, they establish the law: for they consent unto it that it is good. They delight in the law of God after the inward man, and they keep it in their outward life and conversation. It is the rule of their holy walking. They are free from the law as to its condemning, killing power, but they are under the law to Christ. They know, that if the law had not been unalterable, and of indispensable obligation, Christ had lived and died in vain. And he did not come to give his people liberty to break the unalterable law; that would be a contradiction in terms. But he came to establish the law, by restoring it to its honour and dignity, by his obedience to its precepts, and by his suffering its pains and penalties, and then by making it honourable in the confession of convinced sinners, and in the lives of his redeemed people.

These are some of the principal points treated of in the following discourses; in which I have endeavoured to follow scripture closely. This has been my guide; and I have constantly desired his teaching who inspired it. And I now pray him to shine into the heart of every one who reads these discourses. May he always accompany the perusal of them with his divine grace and blessing; and if they be made useful to the church of Christ, may his be all the glory. Give it him, reader; for it is his due; and pray for thy hearty well-wisher,

DISCOURSE I.

THE NECESSITY OF DIVINE TEACHING.

It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God.—John vi. 45.

This is a sweet promise, full of comfort to the children of God. So soon as he has given them a desire to be taught, the Lord has spoken it by the mouth of his holy prophets, that they may come to him to receive instruction. He, the all-wise God, will be their teacher.

He will open the eyes of their understanding clearly to discern spiritual things, and will make them wise unto salvation. In the book of Psalms we find frequent prayers for this divine teaching; and among the high and honourable titles of God, this is used to describe his goodness to the children of men—"He that teacheth man knowledge;" and not man considered merely as ignorant, but also as guilty. "Good and upright is the Lord; therefore will he teach sinners in the way," Psal. xxv. 8; which shows the wonderful condescension of our divine teacher. He vouchsafes to be the instructor of sinners, in order to bring them out of darkness into light, and out of misery into happiness: "for blessed is the man," says the Psalmist (xciv. 12.), whom thou teachest out of thy law." He is blessed because he is taught of God, and taught by him out of the law, to know his guilt and misery; and taught also to know the remedy provided for both. Blessed surely is he whom God thus teaches; and yet how few among us seek this blessedness! Even among those who profess their belief of it, its importance is not sufficiently valued. The privilege is great, inestimably great; but they are too apt to neglect it; while others proudly fancy they can teach themselves, or they think it no honour to be taught of God; they disbelieve the reality, or they neglect the importance of divine teaching. Some of these reasons prevail with the generality of nominal Christians, and hinder them from being convinced of the truth of what is written in the prophets: "And they shall be all taught of God." But he that teacheth man knowledge can, and, glory be to his rich grace! he does, convince him of the necessity of being taught of God. He does enlighten the darkest; he does humble the proudest mind, and bring it earnestly to pray for instruction—"Lord, what I know not, that teach thou me." May this be the prayer of all your hearts, while I am explaining the nature of the promise in the text, and may God fulfil it to you at this time, that you may be convinced,

First, Of the necessity of being taught of God!

Secondly, Of the manner in which God teaches his people;

Thirdly, Of the proper disposition of mind which he gives them, in order to their receiving and profiting from his divine teaching.

First. Divine teaching consists in opening the eyes of the understanding to perceive spiritual and divine objects, and to see their value and importance in disposing the will to choose them, and the heart to love them. The divine teacher is the Holy Spirit. He prepares the mind to receive his instruction, and then fills it with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. The necessity of his doing this is founded in the present state and circumstances of fallen men: for through sin all the faculties of the soul were lost, and the understanding, which is the eye of the soul, was left in the same condition as the bodily eyes would be if they had no light. Hence the Psalmist declares, that there is none who understandeth the things of God; and he represents God as looking down from heaven to see if there were any who did understand and seek after God; but he found none, no not one. They all had their understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart. The prophets give us the same character, and speak of men as if they were all blind, and describe the Messiah to be the sun of righteousness; the light who was to arise to lighten the Gentiles, and was to be the glory of his people Israel. Thus Jehovah says of his beloved son, "I the Lord will give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles, to open the blind eyes," Isa. xlii. 6, 7. And again—"I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the ends of the earth," Isa. xlix. 6. How did our Lord fulfil these prophecies? He did not, while he was upon earth, open the bodily eye of any blind person among the Gentiles, but he has fulfilled them, and, glory be to his great name! he is daily fulfilling them in the Gentile world, by opening the blind eyes of our understandings to see and to discern the things of God. In this sense the Psalmist, speaking both of Jews and Gentiles, says, Psalm cxlvi. 8. "The Lord openeth the eyes of the blind," that is, the Lord Christ: for we read, Isaiah xxxv. 4, 5. "Say unto them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not; your God will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened: for in that day (Isa. xxix. 18,) shall the deaf hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind see out of obscurity, and out of darkness." All these scriptures had their happy accomplishment, when God, who was to come and save us, spake with his own mouth, and said, "I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness," John xii. 46.

From these authorities it is certain that fallen man is in darkness, and cannot see the things of God. The eyes of his understanding are in the same condition as his bodily eyes would be without light. He cannot see any spiritual objects; and how, then, can he come to the knowledge of them, unless he be taught them of God? By what other way or means can he discern them? Has he any powers or faculties of his own, which can help to enlighten him? No, he has none: for since the eyes of his understanding are in darkness, all his endeavours to enlighten them, without divine teaching, will be like those of a blind man, who only makes his blindness more manifest the more he labours and strives to give an account of those objects which he never saw nor felt.

But cannot the arts and sciences enlighten his blind eyes? No. They cannot help him to discover one single spiritual idea. The arts and sciences treat of the objects of sense; to these they are confined, and cannot get beyond the bounds of nature; for it is a certain truth, and indeed it is at present a received opinion, that all our ideas come from sense. We are not able to form an idea of any thing, unless it fall under the observation of some of our senses. If any one of the senses be destroyed, the man is not able to form an idea of any object peculiar to that sense. A man born deaf has no idea of sounds, nor a blind man of colours. Since, then, the arts and sciences treat entirely of the objects of sense, how can they give us any ideas of those things which are not objects of sense? for was it ever known that the stream rose higher than the fountain head?

From hence it appears, that if the understanding be ever so greatly refined and enlarged with the knowledge of arts and sciences, yet it stands in as much need of divine teaching as the most ignorant peasant does; because the things of God are not discoverable by the arts and sciences. Let matter of fact speak to this point. Has there not been a total ignorance of divine things, whenever the light of revelation has been extinguished? Look into the learned ages of Greece, and you find the several sects of philosophers inquiring, What is the chief good of men? and none of them could discover what it was, and disputing about the origin of evil, and never coming near the truth. Look into the times when Rome was raised to its highest glory, and was as famous for its learning as for its conquests, and you will not find one learned Roman who can tell you what God is. Tully has written a book upon the nature of the gods, and it is one of the most valuable of his writings; for therein he gives us the opinions of the philosophers upon this subject, and shows his own and their exceeding great ignorance of it. From these instances, not to mention others, it is evident that a man may have all the knowledge which arts and sciences can give him, and yet be totally ignorant of God, and of the things of God.

This has appeared from undoubted matter of fact. We know from the experience of the Greeks and Romans, that arts and sciences never did lead them to the knowledge of any spiritual and divine objects; and we are assured, from the testimony of God's word, that they never can. Man, in his natural state, blinded by sin, and under the power of it, cannot attain to any such knowledge. The apostle has decided this point for us. Speaking of the politest classical age of Rome, he says of her great philosophers and celebrated authors, that they were without understanding; that they became vain in their imaginations; and their foolish hearts were darkened. What! was Tully without understanding? Was the imagination of Virgil vain, and the heart of Seneca foolish? Yes, in the things of God; "for the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." 1 Cor. ii. 14. While he remains a natural man, it is absolutely impossible that he should know them; "neither can he know them," because he has no spiritual discernment, by which alone spiritual objects can be discovered; and therefore he must remain for ever ignorant of them, unless God should open the eyes of his understanding, and bring him out of darkness into his marvellous light.

This is a very humbling, but it is a real view of human nature, and I need not to have gone to distant ages and countries for proof. We have it near enough at home, if men's pride would but let them see it; but their pride arises chiefly from their ignorance of it, and helps to keep them ignorant. If they had but a little humility, they would discover how imperfect their knowledge is, even of the things about them, and they would therefore see the necessity of being taught of God in these things, which were out of the reach of their senses: such are all spiritual and divine things; and in these they want divine teaching, and the promise is, concerning these, "All thy children shall be taught of God." Now, God never acts in vain. Unless his children wanted teaching, he need not be their teacher: but in what belongs to the spiritual world they are entirely ignorant, and they have no means of discovering, unless they be taught of God, what state they are in by nature, and if it be a state of guilt and misery, how are they to be delivered from it. God has revealed in his holy word the knowledge of what belongs to these two states; but sin has so blinded men's understandings, and depraved their judgments, that they will not assent to what is revealed, nor be determined by it, until the Holy Spirit convince them what they are by nature, and what they may be by grace. Accordingly, the scripture declares, that the Holy Spirit is the inspirer of every good thought, and word, and work. He enlightens the children of God with saving truth, and subdues the opposition which was in their wills to it, and that enmity which was in their hearts. From the first moment he awakens them, and opens the eyes of their understanding; until he bring them safe to glory; he is their teacher. He teaches them to look upon sin, as it is in itself, exceeding sinful; he alarms the conscience, and makes it feel the guilt and danger of sin; he leads the humbled and convinced sinner to Christ for pardon; he gives him faith, and hope, and love; and, by grafting him, like a living branch, into the true vine, enables him to bear much fruit to the glory of God. And since every thing good in him comes from divine teaching, is it not absolutely necessary that he should be taught of God?

If you will consider all these authorities together, I hope they will convince you, my brethren, that there is a necessity for your being taught of God: for by nature you are ignorant of all spiritual and divine things; and you cannot, by any means in your own power, attain to the knowledge of them: the arts and sciences can give you no assistance. It is a matter of fact, that they never did, and the scriptures declare that they never can, help any man to discern the things of the Spirit of God. The natural man, while he remains such, be he ever so learned, cannot know them. And how, then, can he ever attain any ideas of them, but by divine teaching? If this evidence has convinced you, you are prepared to follow me in my second inquiry, which relates to the manner in which God teaches his people.

His established method is by the word, and by the Spirit. In all divine teaching, these two go together; the word, and the Spirit explaining and applying the word. The word is the whole will of God, which he revealed to be the means of bringing sinners from darkness to light, from sin to righteousness, and from the power of Satan unto God, and unto the kingdom of his dear Son, here in grace, and hereafter in glory. These great things are spoken of the written word; for it is able, according to the apostle, to make a man wise unto salvation: but then the quickening Spirit must accompany the hearing, or reading of it, or else you will never find in it this saving wisdom. It is only a dead letter, unless the living Spirit animate it: for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life. The word is the means in the hand of the Spirit, of beginning, carrying on, and perfecting, the life of God in the soul. When the Spirit works in it, and by it, he makes it effectual, through his mighty operation, to build up and to perfect the man of God. He works in the word; for the Spirit is received in it, as the apostle shows, 2 Cor. iii. 8, where he calls the preaching of the gospel, "the ministration of the Spirit," that by which the Spirit was administered and given, and he says to the Galatians, that, by this hearing of faith (which hearing was of the word of God) they received the Spirit; Gal. iii. 2. And being received, he enlightened their minds and opened their understandings, that they might understand the scriptures; and thereby he wrought that faith in them which cometh by hearing; for faith is his gift. It is called, Gal. v. 22, "the fruit of the Spirit;" one of the fruits produced in the heart by his grace; upon which account he is called "the Spirit of faith;" 2 Cor. iv. 13. And when he has thus wrought in the word, he then works by it, and helps the believer to act faith upon it. The Holy Spirit puts it into his heart to desire the sincere milk of the word, that he may grow thereby. And he does grow, and is nourished up, as Timothy was, in the words of faith, when he is enabled by the same Spirit to act faith upon the word; for then the word preached profits him, when he can mix faith with it—when faith and the word, like two fluids of the same properties, readily mix together, and closely incorporate. Thus the word nourishes him in the inner man, and he grows thereby. The Spirit applies it, and renders it effectual to the promoting of every gracious purpose for which it was revealed: and by its means he makes the man of God wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Jesus Christ.

This is the usual andcommon way in which God fulfils the text. He teaches his children spiritual and divine things by his word, as explained and applied by his Spirit: which two cannot be put asunder. The word is the eye, and the Holy Spirit is the light shining upon it. Now, a man cannot see without eyes; and, having eyes, he cannot see without light. So, if you have the word without the Spirit, you have eyes without light; and if you have the Spirit without the word, you have light, but no eyes to see it: the word and the Spirit, therefore, must go together. To expect that the Spirit will teach you without the word, is rank enthusiasm, as great madness as to hope to see without eyes: and to expect that the word will teach you, without the Spirit, is as great an absurdity as to pretend to see without light; and if any man says, that the Spirit teaches him to believe, or to do, what is contrary to the written word, he is a mad blasphemer. God has joined the word and the Spirit; and what God has joined together, let no man put asunder.

Convinced of these things, have you, my brethren, reduced them to practice? Do you go with humility to the word of God to be taught? And do you find that instruction from it of which you stand in need? Perhaps you say, you do read it, but you find it very difficult: it is so hard to be understood, that it is for the most part to you a sealed book. This is a very general complaint; but what is the cause of it? Certain it is that this scripture cannot be broken—"All thy children shall be taught of God." The fault is not in God, nor yet in his word. Surely, then, it is in yourselves. Either you have not been deeply convinced of your own blindness in spiritual things, and therefore are not practically persuaded of the necessity of the word; or you have not looked up to the Holy Spirit for his divine teaching, praying him, in the prophet's words, "Lord, open thou mine eyes, that I may see wondrous things out of thy law:" for until he open your eyes and enlighten them, you cannot see any of the wonders contained in the book of God. Consider these points, then, and examine them closely. Be faithful, my brethren, to your own souls, and be not afraid to discover the true ground of your complaint. Have you been led to read and to hear the word of God under a strong sense of your darkness and blindness without it? And do you always seek the grace of the Holy Spirit to explain and to apply it? The first of these is absolutely necessary; because you will not ask wisdom of God, until you be convinced you lack it. And you will ask it with more or less earnestness in proportion to the sense you have of your want of it; so that, when you are made deeply sensible of your great ignorance, then you will become very humble and teachable. This is the proper disposition of mind which the Holy Spirit must work in you, both before and under divine teaching, and the consideration of which was the third particular I proposed to speak to.

Divine teaching is absolutely necessary for the learning of divine things, and God teaches his children by his word and by his Spirit. You may be convinced, my brethren, of these truths in speculation, but it is very difficult to bring them into practice. For such is the pride of the natural man, that he will not submit to be taught; no, not of God. He will exalt his own reasoning faculties above the wisdom of God's word, and above the teaching of God's Spirit. Although he has nothing to be proud of, being a creature made up of ignorance and sin, yet he is excessively proud; for pride is interwoven in his very frame and constitution. Our Lord says, pride proceeds from within, out of the heart, Mark vii. 21. It comes from a corrupt principle that is within us, in the heart; there it has taken deep root, and grown luxuriant, bringing forth a vast crop of proud looks, words, and works. Nothing but the almighty grace of God can pull down the high opinion which this proud creature entertains of himself, and which he will continue to entertain, until he be well disciplined into the knowledge of himself. He must be brought to see his ignorance, and to feel his guilt and misery, before he will be humble enough to apply to God for instruction. And this is the work of the Holy Spirit. It is through his gracious operation that the proud self-sufficient sinner is made thoroughly acquainted with his ignorance and his sinfulness. The Holy Spirit gives him a view of himself in the glass of the law, and shows him, and makes him feel, the entire corruption of his nature, the blindness of his understanding, the depravity of his will, and the rebellion of his heart. The natural man is a bad scholar at this humbling lesson. He learns it very slowly, and with great pain and difficulty. The practice of it is like plucking out a right eye, or cutting off a right hand: for his inbred sins are as dear to him as any member of his body. But the Holy Spirit so alarms him with his guilt, and with his danger, that, by degrees, he is brought heartily to wish for deliverance from his ignorance and from his sins; and thus he is made teachable. He becomes simple, and is willing to be taught of God. He is brought into a proper frame of mind to sit with Mary at the master's feet, hearing his word, in order to be enlightened with saving wisdom, and to be blessed with the comforts of saving faith. To persons of this humble, teachable temper, the scripture has made many sweet promises, both when they at first go to the school of Christ to learn his will, and also when they afterwards sit at his feet hearing his words, that they may do them. In general, it is said, that God giveth grace to the humble, and particularly grace to learn his will, as Psalm xxv. 9: "The meek will he guide in judgment, and the meek will he teach his way." The meek are they who, with an humble and lowly spirit, receive the word of God, according to the apostle James, i. 21: "Receive with meekness the ingrafted word, which is able to save your souls." They shall be taught of God, whom he has disposed to receive his word with meekness: he will ingraft it inwardly in their hearts, and will enable them to bring forth the precious fruits of it in their lives; and thus he will teach them his way. And then they will be able to keep up the words of Christ, gratefully acknowledging what God has done for them—"We thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." The things of God are still hid from the wise and prudent, from the wise and prudent ones of this world, who seek the knowledge of them by mere human learning, which, without grace, only puffs them up, and hinders them from seeing their want of divine teaching: from all such he hides the knowledge of spiritual things; but he reveals them to those whom the Holy Spirit has made humble and teachable. When such persons come with a meek temper to be taught of him, then he manifests to them the secrets of his kingdom: for he reveals them unto babes: unto them that blessed promise of the New Testament is fulfilled: "If any of you lack wisdom, and is humbled under the sense of his want of it, let him ask it of God, who giveth unto all askers liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him," James i. 5.

This, then, is the proper disposition of mind with which the Holy Spirit prepares the children of God for divine teaching, and by which he helps them to profit under it. He makes them humble, meek, and lowly in their own eyes, and desirous of being taught of God. To such persons he giveth grace to understand the word, to apply it, and to be edified by it. To those whom he has humbled he giveth his grace, because they will take no merit to themselves, but will ascribe the glory of what they learn to their divine teacher, and use it to the praise of the glory of his grace. You are, I hope, convinced of these great truths, but perhaps some of you do not see clearly how you are to attain this humble, teachable disposition. Are you convinced of your own want of it? If you are, this is the work of the Holy Spirit. He has begun to make you sensible of your ignorance; and he must prepare you to receive instruction, as well as give it you. The desire to be taught of God cometh from him, as well as the teaching itself. He must work in you, both to will and to do: for it is written, Prov. xvi. 1. "The preparations of the heart in man are from the Lord." If there be any preparations in your heart to be taught of God, this is not from yourself; it is from the Lord, and is expressly ascribed to him, Gal. v. 23, where meekness is mentioned among the other fruits of the Spirit: that meekness whereby we receive the ingrafted word, is the fruit of his grace in the heart. Apply to him for it, and he will make you an humble, teachable scholar in the school of Christ; and when he has thus disposed you to give him all the glory of teaching you, then to you his promise shall be fulfilled, and you shall be taught of God.

From what has been now offered, the doctrine of the text is, I hope, made plain and clear: if scripture authority can convince, and if matter of fact can determine the point, they give in full evidence for the necessity of divine teaching, which is further confirmed from the established method in which God teaches his children. He revealed his word for their instruction; and his Spirit still accompanies the hearing or reading of it, and renders it effectual to the purposes for which it was revealed. He still, by his grace, prepares the sinner's mind to receive it, by convincing him of his ignorance of the things of God, by bringing him with an humble, teachable temper to learn them from the word of God, and then he works faith in the sinner's heart by the word, and helps the believer to act faith upon the word of God's grace, which is able to build him up, and to give him an inheritance among all them which are sanctified. These particulars have been established upon express passages of holy scripture; and what effect, my brethren, has our present consideration of them had upon you? Has it been the means of showing any of you how much you stood in need of divine teaching? Has it stirred up fervent desires in any of you for the teachings of God's Spirit? If neither of these good effects followed, what is the cause which hindered? If you believe the scripture to be the word of God, you cannot deny the doctrine. No words can be plainer than these written in the prophets: "They shall be ALL taught of God." If all are not to be taught of God, how do you understand the words? Do you think they speak only of the apostles and primitive Christians, to whom they were fulfilled, but we are not now to expect their accomplishment? This is the opinion of many persons, but it is quite unscriptural. The 54th chapter of Isaiah, as explained by an infallible interpreter in the New Testament, treats of the Gentile church in the last days, of which it is said, verse 13, "And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord;" ALL, without exception; all God's children among the Gentiles in every age shall be taught of the Lord. To the same purpose the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xxxi, speaking of the new covenant which was to be established in the last days, declares, from the mouth of God, ver. 34: "And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, saith the Lord." This promise belongs to the new covenant, under which God himself engages to teach his people, and they all, from the least to the greatest, shall know the Lord. And when our blessed Saviour, in the text, referred to these and such-like promises, which are written in the prophets, he made no limitation, but said, "they shall be all taught of God;"—all, in every age of the church, who are made sensible of their want of divine teaching, and look up to heaven for a divine teacher, shall be taught of God. Certainly these passages cannot be so far wrested and tortured as to make them speak for divine teaching in one age of the church only. How can you, with any appearance of truth, fix a limited sense to these universal propositions—ALL thy children shall be taught of the Lord—they shall ALL know me, from the least to the greatest; for they shall be ALL taught of God—All were to be taught by him—all his children; therefore his children now have the same promise of divine teaching which the primitive Christians had; for the promise is to us, and to our children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.

Since, then, the scripture so clearly confutes this absurd and wicked opinion, do you, my brethren, give it up, and acknowledge the necessity of divine teaching? If not, what other objection have you against the doctrine? Have you been used to think that it carried with it an air of enthusiasm? I know many persons look upon it in this light. If any of you do, pray tell us what you mean by enthusiasm? For it seems to us only a bad name given to the best thing. At this day the knowledge of vital and experimental religion is so far lost, that whenever the generality of our people hear it spoken of, they do not understand it; and what they do not understand, they reject under the odious name of enthusiasm; so that this name does not stand for any bad properties in the thing to which they apply it, but only signifies their dislike of it. And if they express their dislike by a hard name, what hurt can that do? Can it really turn the words of truth and soberness into enthusiasm? Can that be enthusiasm, which believes God to be a faithful promise-keeping God, and that his word cannot be broken? What! is it enthusiasm to desire to be taught of God, and to ask wisdom of him, after he has commanded his children to ask it, and has engaged to teach it to them? Surely, no. God's promises must be fulfilled, and they who seek their accomplishment cannot be disappointed. He hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets, that all his children shall be taught of God; and heaven and earth shall pass away, before one tittle of these words shall fail. Men and brethren, what do you think now of this objection, which wants to make God a liar, for promising to teach his children, and which treats them as enthusiasts who expect to be taught of him? Certainly you cannot defend such a blasphemous opinion. Well, then, the way is farther cleared for a favourable reception of the doctrine; and do you indeed receive it? Perhaps you assent to it. But what sort of an assent do you give? Is it active and operative? If not, what will it avail? You will learn none of the things of God, by simply believing that God does teach them to his children. You must ask, if you would have: you must seek, if you would find that wisdom which cometh from above. And you must ask with earnestness, and seek with diligence, not as if you could thereby merit, but to express your wants and your humility. The divine direction in this case is, Prov. ii. 3, 4, &c., "If thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding;" not asking faintly, but crying aloud, and lifting up the voice through the fervency of the desire after wisdom; and "if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures;" seeking with as great pains, and searching with as constant application, as ever worldly man took to enrich himself; "then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God: for the Lord giveth wisdom:" he giveth it to every one who seeks with humble diligence.

These are words of comfort to you who desire to be taught of God, and who are seeking of him the knowledge of divine things. Seek, as he has directed you, and you shall find. He will teach you, because he has made you teachable. He has already taught you one lesson, which is, perhaps, the hardest you have to learn. He has convinced you of your entire ignorance of divine things. You no longer take up your rest in the fancied abilities of nature, but are consulting the word of God, and praying for the teachings of the Spirit of God. This is the appointed way to receive instruction. And if you wait in his way, he who directed you to the way will meet you and instruct you in it. Only remember, that his glory, being the motive and end of all his dealings with men, must be your motive and end in learning divine things. You must have a single eye to his glory in asking knowledge of him; and what he gives, you must use to his glory. His glory must be promoted by all that he teaches you: and therefore you must come to learn of him humble, under a continual sense of your ignorance and unworthiness, and meek, disposed like a new-born babe to receive the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby; and you must be a diligent scholar: you must read much, and pray more; yea, you must watch in prayer with all perseverance, and then the promise, which wisdom itself has made, shall be fulfilled to you, Prov. viii. 34: "Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors." He that watches and waits thus, is blessed: for God, who commanded light to shine out of darkness, will shine into his heart, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

What thanks can we render unto God for his exceeding grace, who still shines into the hearts of his children? Glory be to his great name! there are many among us who have reason to praise him for his divine teaching. They have found him faithful to fulfil his promises: for he has opened their blind eyes, and has led them into the knowledge and belief of the truth. Daily are they magnifying the riches of his infinite love, which has brought them out of darkness into his marvellous light, and has translated them out of the kingdom of Satan into the kingdom of his dear Son. These persons are witnesses for God, and can set to their seal that he still teaches his children by his word, and by his Spirit: for they have been illuminated with the true knowledge and understanding of his word, and by their living they set it forth, and show it accordingly.

This is the happy state of so many of you as are real Christians. You have experience of the truth of the text, and know it to be an undoubted matter of fact. My Christian brethren, what return will you make to your divine teacher for the comfortable lessons which he has taught you? What less can you do, than praise him with your lives, as well as with your lips? Praise him for what you have already learnt, and continue humbly to wait on him for your growth in knowledge. Remember that the new man which you have put on is to be renewed in knowledge day by day. The spirit of wisdom is to help you to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of your Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This is your privilege; and it is your interest to make a constant use of it. The wisest of us know but little of what is to be known, therefore you should be diligent in your attendance upon the means appointed of God for your teaching. Read the word, and meditate in it day and night; and when the Holy Spirit explains and applies it, then it will be a lantern unto your feet, and a light unto your paths. Pray over the word. Prayer will digest it; and the prayer of faith, mixed with it, will make it nourishing and strengthening to the inner man. And thus you will grow in grace, and be renewed in knowledge; the understanding will be renewed with still clearer views of spiritual things; the heart, no longer prejudiced against them, will be renewed with a more determinate choice of them; and the affections will be renewed with a more hearty love, and a fuller enjoyment of them. Hereby your sanctification will be carried on, and you will be renewed, day by day, in true holiness, after the image of him that created you.—Having therefore these privileges, dearly beloved brethren; having such a teacher, and such things to learn of him; having the Spirit of the Most High God to teach you all things, which belong to your present peace, and to your eternal glory; oh, what diligence should you use in attending upon the means, by which your divine teacher has promised to instruct you! In them be ye constantly found waiting—waiting with humble, teachable tempers—and praying for the blessing of God upon the use of his appointed means. And while you thus continue to wait upon God, he will continue to teach you. He has promised it to his children: and he cannot lie. He will make you wise unto salvation.

Having thus exhorted you, my Christian brethren, to make a diligent use of the great privilege of the new covenant, I have nothing further to offer, but my prayers. May he that heareth prayer send down his blessing upon what has been now spoken. May "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, give unto you the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him, that, the eyes of your understanding being enlightened, ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to usward who believe." Oh may our God manifest these great truths to your understandings, and give you the sweet experience of them in your hearts, that you may be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, and that ye may walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God, until you see him face to face; and then shall you know, even as also you are known. To this perfect knowledge and ever-blessed fruition of God may the Lord Jesus bring you all by the ministry of his word, and by the teachings of his Spirit, that you may be for ever happy in giving thanks and praise to the three divine persons in one Jehovah, to whom the church in earth and heaven ascribes all glory in time and in eternity. Amen, and Amen.

DISCOURSE II.

UPON THE MORAL LAW.

Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good:—Romans vii. 12.

THE great Creator and possessor of heaven and earth hath an indisputable authority to make laws for the government of his creatures, and to require their obedience. Since every thing that they have is received from his hands, and held under him at his pleasure, it therefore behoves them to inquire upon what terms they hold it. And if God has given them any laws, it is their duty to study them, and their interest to obey them. If there be any sanctions to enforce these laws, any rewards or punishments, they should inquire where these things are to be known, and by what means discovered, that they may obtain the reward and escape the punishment.

Whenever a serious unprejudiced person desires to be satisfied in these points, which so nearly concern his present peace of conscience and his future happiness, he will soon be convinced that God has made a gracious provision for his instruction. God has opened his mind and will in this matter. He has recorded his laws, and published them. The sacred volume of divine statutes is in our hands, and in our mother tongue. It is so very short, that none can want time to peruse it; and it is so very plain and intelligible, as to the rule of duty, that none can plead ignorance. He that runs may read it, and the simple may understand it, and learn knowledge; for, upon a very cursory view of this divine treatise, it will appear, that there are three distinct bodies of law mentioned in it; namely, the moral law, the ceremonial law, and the law of faith. We are all highly concerned to inquire into the nature of these laws; and therefore I purpose, through God's assistance, to inquire into the scope and design of each of them. At present I shall confine myself to the moral law, which alone is spoken of in my text. The apostle is treating of its usefulness to discover the sinfulness of sin: "I had not known sin," says he, "but by the law;" the law must first lay down a rule before it can be known what sin is, which is the transgression of that rule: "For I had not known lust," and that the very first rising and motion of evil in the heart was a sin, "unless the law had said, thou shalt not covet." This is the law of the tenth commandment: from whence it is very evident that St. Paul is here treating of the moral law, which is of such perfect purity, as to reach to the desires and covetings of the heart, and which, by restraining them, makes them appear more sinful, and grow more outrageous. "But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence: for without the law sin was dead," although it be in us, yet it is not perceived, until it be held before the holy spiritual law of God, and then it begins to stir and rage: for as it follows, "I was once alive without the law," says the apostle; when I knew not the law I thought myself alive, my conscience never troubled me, nor did I apprehend the deadly nature of sin; "but when the commandment came," when I began to understand the commandment in its spiritual nature, and it came to my conscience, and was applied with a divine power to my heart, "then sin revived, and I died;" I found myself dead in trespasses and sins: "for the same commandment which was ordained unto life was found to be unto me unto death; but sin took occasion by the commandment," not through any fault in the commandment, but entirely through my own fault, "deceived me, and by it slew me. What shall we say, then? Is the law and the commandment sin? God forbid. The law is holy," all the fault is in us, who abuse the law, "and the commandment is holy, and just, and good." The occasion of the words and the context, thus in part opened and explained, may help us to determine,

First, What the moral is.

Secondly, Whether it be still in force.

Thirdly, Whether we have all kept it; and if not,

some practical inferences from these particulars. And may the Spirit of the living God apply what shall be spoken. May he enlighten all your understandings with a clear view of the spiritual nature of the moral law, that by it you may be brought to the knowledge of sin, and to see and to feel your want of a Saviour. Under the teachings of this good Spirit let us consider,

First, What the moral law is. I define it to be the holy, just, and good will of God made known and promulged to his creatures in all these particulars, wherein he requires their perfect obedience, in order to their happiness. The law is the discovery of his will: for the almighty Creator and sovereign Lord of heaven and earth governs all his works and creatures according to the good pleasure of his own will. His will is the absolutely perfect law of the natural world. He hath given to the inanimate works of his hands a law which shall not be broken. The active powers in nature shall work, and passive matter shall obey by an unalterable rule, until the heavens be folded up like a scroll, and the earth and all the works therein shall be burnt up. And his will is as absolute a law to his rational creatures as to the natural agents; because he can enact no laws but what partake of his own adorable perfections. His law is his will made known. It is a copy of his infinitely pure mind. It is a fair transcript of his holiness, justice, goodness, and of every other divine attribute; for by the law he discovers to his creatures what it is his will they should be and do, in order to preserve his favour. He would have them holy, just, and good, and the law makes known to them the rule of their obedience; by an exact conformity to which they are holy, just, and good. The will of God revealed in the law is holy, and conformity to it is holiness. Holiness, in the Old Testament language, signifies a separation from impurity, and when applied to the divine nature, it rather expresses what God is not, than what he is. It is a negative idea, denoting an entire separation from every thing which can defile. Holiness in God excludes all possibility of pollution. In him there neither is, nor can be, the least impurity. He is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity. He cannot even look upon any thing which is in the least unclean: for without holiness no man shall see the Lord. Now, the law is an exact copy of God's holiness. It is the outward discovery of his most holy mind and will, informing his creatures how perfectly pure they must preserve themselves, if they would preserve his favour. The law discovers to them what God is, and shows how like him they ought to be in holiness. And since God cannot behold the least impurity, consequently his law cannot, because it is his mind and will revealed concerning this matter. He will not suffer any deviation from his law, no, not in thought; for the language of the law is positive and express out of the mouth of the supreme lawgiver himself—"Be ye holy, for I am holy." And are you, my brethren, thus holy? This should be a matter of close examination. Are you what the law requires you to be? Do you look upon the law as perfectly, infinitely holy in itself, even as holy as God is; and have you considered sin as an offence against the holiness of God and of his law, even such an unpardonable offence, that you could never make the least satisfaction for it? It is very evident these things are not well understood, because the practice of mankind shows what low ideas they entertain of them. What makes sin appear light and little, and some offences small? Is it not because sinners are ignorant of the absolutely perfect holiness of the law? And after they have broken it, how mean an opinion have they of its holiness, when they think that a little sorrow, and some few tears, that repentance and amendment can make them holy, and satisfy the demands of the broken law? If any of you entertain these unworthy ideas of God and of his law, you should consider that, although God require you to be perfectly holy, yet he can require nothing of you but what is just. The law is just, as well as holy; just in all its demands, and just in the rule of its process in rewarding obedience and punishing transgression. The scripture word for justice is taken from human affairs, and from thence is applied to divine. In the first ages of the world, money was paid and received by weight; and he who kept an even balance in paying and receiving was a just man. His justice consisted in keeping the scales even, in weighing all things with an equal balance, and in giving and taking only what was lawful and right. Now, the law holds this balance of justice in its hands, that it may prove the Judge of all the earth does right, and will be glorified in all that he requires of his creatures; for the holy obedience which he demands of them is a just obedience. He had a sovereign authority to require it, and he gave them power to pay it him, and therefore they could not complain of any injustice, if he should inflict the punishment threatened to the disobedient, any more than if he should bestow the reward promised to the obedient. Thus the law is just. It is the exact copy of God's justice, and is as perfectly just as God is. It can no more require or do an unjust thing, than God can; for the law only discovers what is the infinitely just mind and will of God concerning the behaviour of his creatures. The law says, "Do this, and thou shalt live. Transgress this, and dying thou shalt surely die." This is the will of the supreme lawgiver, and his justice is engaged to see the honour of his law maintained, as well in punishing transgression with death, as in rewarding obedience with life. The law cannot possibly do any injustice, because it is directed by the unerring will of God. God, and his will, and his law, are alike just; for it is written in the law, Deut. xxxii. 4: "The Lord's work is perfect; for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he."

All his ways and dealings with the children of men are perfectly just, and they are also good. His law is good. It partakes of the goodness of its divine author, inasmuch as it tends to promote the welfare and happiness of his creatures. The creature was made to show forth the glory of its great Creator, and the law was the rule by which it was to walk, in order to promote his glory; and in this holy walking there was all good to be met with. It was the way of pleasantness, and the path of peace. It preserved the assurance of the divine favour, afforded a perpetual feast of conscience, and gave sure and certain hopes of a glorious immortality; for Moses thus describeth the righteousness which is of the law, that the man who doeth these things shall live by them. If he do all the things written in the book of the law, he shall live unto God, and shall live with God. He shall enjoy a life of happiness here in the love and communion of God, and he shall enjoy an endless life of glory. Surely then the law is good; since the keeping of it would have produced all good, and since the transgressing of it has brought all the evil upon man which he can suffer in time and in eternity. Consider, my brethren, how good the law is from that deluge of evil which came in upon the breach of it. When the Lord God, at the end of his six days' works, surveyed all that he had made, behold it was very good. There was then no evil of any kind to afflict either body or soul; but by sin the body became subject to sickness, pain, and death, and the soul to guilt and misery; and in the next life, both body and soul were subject to the worm that never dieth, and to the fire that never shall be quenched.

Such is the goodness of the law. It is the all-wise provision which God has made for his own glory, and for the happiness of his creatures to whom he has published it. He made it known to our first parents in paradise. It was their rule of action, while they stood in the likeness and image of God. They had no opposition, then, to his good and acceptable and perfect will; but the understanding had a clear view of it; the will chose it, and the heart loved it, and they were able to do it with all their mind, and with all their strength. And when sin entered into the world, the will of God was not changed, nor his law repealed. The law was in full force from Adam to Moses, in whose time the Lord God recorded it with the most awful majesty on Mount Sinai, and engraved it with his own hands upon two tables of stone. And it stands unrepealed to this day; promising life to obedience, and threatening death to transgression.

Since, then, the law has been properly promulged, a holy, just, and good law, that altereth not, let us hear what it requires. It is the will of the lawgiver, that he who doeth the things written in the book of the law shall live by them. But then he must do all things, without exception. He must not fail in any one point. If he will enter into life, he must keep all the commandments. He must be universally holy, just, and good, as the law is. If he ever receive the promised reward, he must perform the condition; that is, he must pay the law perfect uninterrupted obedience with every faculty of soul and body, in their utmost strength and vigour; for it cannot suffer any transgression; but for the least inflicts the threatened punishment.

This is an essential property of the moral law. Upon the very first offence it cuts the sinner off from all claim to the promised reward, and, as to any thing that he can do, cuts him off for ever. It is not in his power to make himself innocent again. Having once failed in his obedience, the law knows nothing of mercy, cannot accept the greatest repentance, nor be satisfied with the deepest sorrow for what is past; but immediately passes sentence according to what is written: "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." If you fail in one single instance of obedience, you do not continue to perform all things, but fall under the curse of the broken law, and are as much liable to punishment, though not in the same degree, as if you had failed in every instance. In which sense the words of St. James are to be understood: "He that offendeth in one point, is guilty of all."

I have now gone through the several parts of the definition before given of the moral law, and it appears to be the holy, just, and good will of God made known and promulged to his creatures in all those particulars wherein he requires their perfect obedience, in order to their happiness. Since this is the case, it highly concerns every one of us to inquire whether we be under an obligation to keep this law; which is the second particular I proposed to consider; namely,

Whether the moral law be still in force, and still requires of them who expect to be saved by it perfect unsinning obedience. And upon the first proposal of this question, it would occur to every attentive person, that the law, being as holy, just, and good as God is, can no more admit of any variableness, or shadow of turning, than God himself can. He says, "I change not:" and how, then, can his law, which is the discovery of his mind and will, be changeable? Man may change; but the law is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. It altereth not. If man does not keep it, it will lose none of its honour. Justice will be glorified by supporting the holiness of the law, and by inflicting the deserved punishment on the transgressors of it. But let us consult the law and the testimony. The Psalmist says, Psalm cxi. 7, 8: "All his commandments are sure: they stand fast for ever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness." ALL his commandments, not excepting one, are fixed upon a sure, immovable foundation: for they stand fast for ever and ever in full force, established by the unchangeable will of God, and are ordained in perfect harmony with all the divine attributes; being done in truth, which cannot lie, and uprightness which cannot err. To the same purpose, he says in another psalm, cxix. 160, "Thy word is true from the beginning; and every one of thy righteous judgments endureth for ever." These righteous judgments are the decrees of the moral law, and there is not one of them that can be repealed; but they shall all endure in full force for ever. Our blessed Saviour has thrown great light upon this subject. The whole moral law is summed up in the ten commandments, which he has reduced to these two—the love of God and the love of our neighbour: on these two commandments, says he, hang all the law and the prophets; for love is the fulfilling of the law, and love never faileth; consequently the law of love can never fail, but its debt of gratitude will be paying, and happy is he who shall be paying it to all eternity.—Thus the moral law stands established by the authority of our divine teacher. In his sermon upon the mount he reforms the abuses and false comments which the scribes and pharisees had put upon the moral law; and he begins with this remark, Matt. v. 17: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil;" to fulfil the law by paying it infinitely perfect obedience, and by being obedient unto death, even the death of the cross: and by this active and passive obedience he showed that it was easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than that one tittle of the law should fail. If the law could have abated any thing of its demands, there would have been no necessity for Christ's fulfilling it by his obedience and death. But the law was unalterable. It could not be satisfied with any obedience, but what was absolutely holy, just, and good; and as all men had failed in paying it this obedience, they must therefore have been punished in their own persons, unless God, out of the riches of his wisdom and grace, had found out a way, by which the honour of his law might be advanced, and yet the sinner might be saved: and that was by sending his Son to fulfil the law. He was equal to this work; because he was God, equal with the Father, and he took our nature, and God and man were united in one Christ, that he might be capable of doing and suffering, and meriting in an infinite degree. Accordingly, in the fulness of time, he stood up in the place of sinners, and therefore he became liable to do and to suffer whatever law and justice demanded, that, having magnified the law, by obeying its precepts, and made it honourable by suffering its penalties, the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in them who should believe on him to everlasting life: but the law is still in force to condemn every one who does not savingly believe on him, and will be for ever in force to inflict the deserved punishment.

It is evident, then, that the moral law stands to this day unrepealed. Although man may be changed from what he was at first, yet the law is not. It is still the holy, just, and good will of God requiring perfect obedience. And when the holiness of the law is violated, the justice of God is bound to see the sanctions of the law executed upon the disobedient; and the divine goodness cannot plead an arrest of judgment, because it is a good law which is broken, and therefore it is a good thing to see that the transgressors of it be paid the wages of sin.

My brethren, are not these very alarming truths? and ought they not to suggest to every one of you such reflections as these? What, am I under the law, bound to keep it with a perfect unsinning obedience? Can the law abate nothing of its demands, but must I love God always, and with all my mind, heart, soul, and strength, and my neighbour as myself, if I hope to enter into life by keeping the commandments? Surely then I ought to examine, whether I have always loved God and my neighbour, as the law requires. If these be the thoughts of your hearts, then you are prepared to follow me to a serious consideration of the third head of discourse, namely,

Whether we all have kept the moral law. Its demands are very great. It will not accept of any obedience, unless it be continual. You must continue, without the least interruption, to do all things that are written in the book of the law. And have any of you walked with a steadfast course in the way of the commandments, without once turning aside? Consult conscience. Does it not accuse? Consult scripture. Does it not say, "ALL we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way?" leaving the way of God's commandments.

The law also requires spiritual obedience. It reaches to the inmost thoughts and intents of the heart. You must never have one sinful thought in you, if you expect life from your keeping the law: for the law is spiritual. It searches the heart and the reins, and strikes at the very first motion or rising of sin. One sinful desire cuts you off from legal righteousness, as much as ten thousand sins: for it is written, "Thou shalt not covet;" and he that covets offends in one point, and therefore is guilty of all.

Besides, the law is perfect, perfectly holy, just, and good: for it is the will of God, and can no more suffer the least iniquity in its sight, than God himself can. It will abate nothing of absolutely perfect obedience. All the strength and all the mind, every faculty of soul and body is to be exerted, and with their utmost vigour, in the observance of the law. The heart too is to love it, and the affections are to be delighted with obeying it.

This is what the law demands of every one of you. It will have a continual, a spiritual, and a perfect love of God, without one thought ever arising in opposition to his holy will; and the love of your neighbour must be like the love of yourself. And does any man or woman keep the law in this manner? Do any of you? Certainly you cannot suppose that you have never broken the law, because you have just now declared the contrary out of your own mouths. You have confessed, this day, and on your bended knees, before God, "We have offended against thy holy laws. We have left undone those things which we ought to have done: and we have done those things which we ought not to have done." And when you spake these words, did not your consciences assure you that they were true? For have you not offended against the holy law of God? and have not you left undone what it required, and done what it forbid? Surely you did not prevaricate with God when, in another part of the service, you confessed that you had broken all the commandments. The rubric says: "Then shall the priest, turning to the people, rehearse distinctly all the ten commandments; and the people, still kneeling, shall, after every commandment, ask God mercy for their transgressions thereof for the time past, and grace to keep the same for the time to come;" and accordingly, after every commandment you prayed God to have mercy upon you for breaking it, and to incline your hearts to keep it. And have you not all sinned, and come short of the glory of God, by robbing his law of its due obedience?

What! would you make me a breaker of all the commandments? says some self-righteous formalist: I never murdered any body, nor committed adultery. No? Had you never one angry thought or word against your neighbour? This is murder. Or did not one impure and unclean thought ever arise in your mind? This is sin, according to the spiritual law of God. You look at your actions in the glass of man's law, and, because you have not outwardly offended, you think you have kept the law of God. There is your mistake. Look at Matt. v. 21, &c., and at 1 John iii. 15, and you will see that anger and hatred are murder in the eye of God; and read Matt. v. 27, 28, where our Lord teaches you that one lustful look is heart-adultery. God regards the heart; and heart-sin is as much sin against his spiritual law as outward transgression: and when the formalist sees his heart naked and open, as God sees it, he will not pretend that he has not broken all the commandments, but will rather desire God to have mercy upon him, and to incline his heart to keep his laws.

If any of you refuse to be determined by these authorities, hear what the Lord God has declared concerning you; and his decree will, I hope, be decisive. He is represented, in the 14th psalm, as looking down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand and seek after God. But they were all gone out of the way; they were altogether become filthy; there was none that did good, no, not one; there was not one of the children of men that did good and sinned not. We have, in the third chapter of the Romans, the apostle's comment upon this psalm. After having proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin, and transgressors of the law, as it is written, there is none righteous, no, not one, legally righteous, he says, ver. 19: "Now, we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God." Thus God himself has declared that you have not done good, that you are under sin, and in his sight guilty. And what can you object to these scriptures? Sirs, are not you greatly alarmed at hearing them? for they come home to every one's case, and ought to reach every one's conscience. And what are the present apprehensions of your minds concerning them? Have you broken the holy law of God, and you know you have, and do you not dread the consequence of your transgression? What can tempt you to hope that you shall escape the threatened penalty? Has your sorrow for breaking the law, or your repentance, or your amendment, merit enough so far to undo the sin committed, as that law cannot demand, nor justice inflict punishment for it? Or have you some blind notions of absolute mercy in God, as if he would cease to be just, rather than not be merciful to you? Men and brethren, if any or all of these false notions tempt you to be secure under the breach of the law, and under the wrath of the almighty lawgiver, let us bring them to the standard of scripture, and inquire, Fourthly, What is the penalty due to the breach of the moral law?

When God published his law, he enforced it with proper sanctions. He promised reward to the obedient—"Do this, and thou shalt live." And he threatened punishment to the disobedient—"In the day that thou transgressest, dying thou shalt surely die." This is the rule of God's process If you keep the law, you shall have the life promised. But if you trangress, you shall be alienated from the life of God, and subject to death, to the first and to the second death, to a death of nature, and to a death of grace; for both these kinds of death are the punishment of sin: "For as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." And besides this death of the body, there is a death of the soul—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die," Ezek. xviii. 4: it shall be alienated from the life of God for ever and ever, and shall suffer the vengeance of eternal fire; so that the broken law not only cuts you off from the fountain of life, but also pours out its curses, and inflicts real torments upon the unholy, the unjust, and the evil, according to the description in Rev. xxi. 8: "The fearful and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."

These are the penalties which every transgressor of the law deserves, and these God has threatened to inflict. His will herein is unchangeable. His truth requires the performance of his threatenings. His justice is bound to see them inflicted. His holiness and goodness call upon justice for the immediate execution of the penalties due to sin. And how can the sinner escape? What can he do to deliver himself? He has nothing in his own power wherewith to satisfy the demands of law and justice. Suppose him sorrowful for his sin; that sorrow proves him guilty, and leaves him so. Say, he tries to repent; the law knows nothing of repentance; its language is, Do this, or thou shalt die. Grant, he amends his life for the future; yet, what becomes of his past sins? Is his doing part of his duty any satisfaction for neglecting part of it? The law makes no provision for any such groundless pleas, but insists upon perfect obedience, and for the least failure puts the sinner under the curse and under the wrath of God, and there leaves him to suffer the just punishment of his sin.

But some persons, perhaps, may object, if this be the case, What flesh can be saved? None; no, not one can be saved by keeping the law; for all have sinned and transgressed the law of God: therefore, by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.

But still some may ask, Why then do you preach the law? Because it is a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ. It teaches them the nature of sin, and convinces them of their want of a Saviour. "By the law is the knowledge of sin," Rom. iii. 20. and vii. 7. Men are secure and careless in sin until the law, that worketh wrath, reach their consciences; then they begin to know sin, and to feel the exceeding sinfulness of it: for it is the ministration of condemnation," 2 Cor. iii. 9. The law, spiritually understood and applied, convinces the sinner that he is a condemned creature, shows him in God's word the sentence past upon him, and makes him dread the execution of it. And thus it becomes to him "the ministration of death," 2 Cor. iii. 7; proving him to be guilty of sin, and to be deserving of death. The apostle's case is very common. I thought myself alive, says he, without the law: he had no doubt but he was alive to God, while he was a strict pharisee, but when the holy spiritual nature of the law was made known to him, he found himself to be dead in trespasses and sins. This, then, is the office of the law. It brings transgressors to the knowledge of sin, condemns them for it, and puts them under the sentence of death; and when the law has thus convinced them of their guilt and of their danger, they then find their want of a Saviour. But without this work of the law, they would not have been sensible that they stood in any need of him. If they were never sick, they would never send for the physician. If they were never brought to the knowledge of sin, they would never desire the knowledge of a Saviour. If they never found themselves under guilt and condemnation, they would never sue for his pardon, and would never ask life of him, unless they found that they deserved to die the first and the second death. For these reasons the law must be taught. It is the schoolmaster appointed of God to bring sinners unto Christ; and when the schoolmaster comes in the name and power of the divine Spirit, and convinces them of their distressed state and condition, and makes them sensible of their guilt and of their misery, then he brings them to Christ, earnestly to ask and humbly to receive mercy from him, who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

And now, men and brethren, let us hear this schoolmaster, who is sent from heaven to teach us a divine lesson. He speaks to you, ye careless and secure in sin, and denounces the anger of the almighty lawgiver against you. Oh! with what a terrible voice does he reveal the wrath of God from heaven against all your ungodliness and unrighteousness. There is nothing dreadful in earth or hell, nothing to be feared in time or in eternity, but what is included in this most awful sentence, "Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them," Deut. xxvii. 26. Have you done them? Have you done ALL that the law required? and in the perfect manner required? I dare appeal to your consciences. You may try to stifle their evidence, but they will speak; and do they not at this very time charge you with sin? You know that you have not kept all the law; and what then is the consequence? Why, the law pronounces you cursed; and it would make your ears tingle, and your heart melt within you, if you were to consider what is to be under the curses of the law, and to have the wrath of God abiding upon you for ever and ever. Have you no sense of these things, and no fearful apprehensions about your present condition? Is not conscience alarmed at the greatness of your danger? and do not the terrors of the law stir you up to flee from the wrath to come? If not, if all be quiet therein, while you hear the law of the most high God, which ought to convince you of your guilt, and to make you apprehensive of your misery, then you are indeed sleeping the sleep of death. O may the God of all mercy take pity on you, and awaken you! lest you should sleep on until the curses of the law be actually inflicted, and wrath come upon you to the uttermost.

Some persons may think it happy for them that they are not careless and secure in sin; for they endeavour to keep the law as well as they can; and God is a merciful God; he will forgive them when they do amiss. This is a common, but it is a very dangerous mistake: for it supposes that the law can abate something of its demands, and can accept of an imperfect obedience: whereas the law is the holy, just, and good will of God, which altereth not. It requires perfect and universal obedience, and, in case of the least transgression, condemns the sinner and passes sentence. If he plead that he never offended but in this particular instance, that is pleading guilty. If a man be indicted for murder, and the fact be proved upon him, and he be found guilty, and the judge pass sentence, what would it avail him if he should make this plea, that he had never been guilty of high-treason? The judge would observe to him that he was not accused of high-treason, but of murder, of which he was found guilty and condemned, and his not being a traitor was no reason why he should not be executed for being a murderer. So your not having broken this or that commandment cannot save you from the just sentence of the law, if you have broken any of them. Suppose you are not an adulterer, yet, if you are a murderer, you deserve to die, and to receive the wages of sin: "For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now, if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law," James ii. 11.

But some will say, Shall we not be accepted, if we endeavour to keep the law as well as we can? No. The style of the law is, Do. It does not say, Endeavour to keep the commandment, but it speaks with authority, Do it, and do it perfectly, and in every point, and with all the mind, and with all the soul, and with all the heart, and with all the strength. Here is no room left for good resolutions, or good endeavours, but an actual performance of the whole law is demanded. The least failing or short-coming is a transgression, and therefore is an absolute forfeiture of legal righteousness, and of every blessing promised to the perfect keeping of the law.

Some persons go a little further than good endeavours, and think God will accept them for their sincere obedience: whereas the law has nothing to do with sincerity. When you come to be tried by the law, the only question will be, whether you have broken it, or not? If not, the promised reward is yours. You may claim it as your due: for to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of death. But if you have broken the law, your sincere obedience cannot be accepted in the place of perfect obedience; because the law has made no provision for your case. It requires a continual performance of all its commands, and in a perfect manner; and if you fail, and then plead your sincerity in your favour, that is owning your guilt, and is a confession of your not having continued in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them; and therefore, as your sincere obedience is not perfect, it leaves you still under the curse of the law, and under the wrath of God.

There are other persons who think that there is some kind of absolute mercy in God, and that, although they have sinned, yet he is ready to forgive. But this is not the character of God as drawn in the law; for the law considers him as the sovereign Lord of heaven and earth, having absolute authority to enact laws for the government of his creatures, over whom he presides with unerring justice, to see his laws carried into execution. Justice is the ruling attribute of the supreme lawgiver. As his laws are just, so are its sanctions. It is equally just in him to punish transgressors, as to reward the obedient; for the judge of all the earth cannot but do right, and distribute impartial justice. Whether he can show mercy to the guilty, is not the question; but whether he has made any provision in his law for showing them mercy: and he certainly has not. God is not described in the law as a God of mercy, but as a sovereign judge, whose wrath. and not whose mercy, is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.

But if the lawgiver has made no promise in his law, that he will show mercy to sinners, yet will he not be prevailed on by their sorrow and tears, their repentance and amendment? There is not one word in the law to encourage a sinner to hope for mercy, because he is sorry for his sin. It is full of threatenings against the least offence, and for the least cuts the offender off from all claim to legal righteousness. When he is in this state, what merit is there in sorrow, that it should change the laws of the most high God, or what efficacy in tears, that they should cause him to be reputed innocent, who is in fact guilty? He has forfeited all right and title to the happiness which the law promised to obedience, and when he sees this, he grows sorry for what he has done amiss. So does a murderer, when found guilty, and condemned to suffer; but does the judge pardon him because he is sorry for his crime? By no means. But he gives signs of true sorrow. He weeps bitterly. Suppose he does, yet the law demands obedience, and not tears for disobeying. These tears flow from a sense of guilt; and if there were rivers of them they could not wash the stain of guilt out of the conscience; because the law has not ascribed any such virtue to them, as to accept of many tears for having offended, instead of unsinning obedience. And, granting he goes a step farther; he repents and amends. But what becomes of the broken law, and of the deserved penalty? Can simple repentance undo the sin committed? or can amendment for the future avert the penalty already deserved? No, these are things impossible. The law will have obedience or punishment; and justice is engaged to see that the law be obeyed, and the threatened punishment inflicted; and therefore, after you have disobeyed, the law can allow no place for repentance, nor no way to escape punishment, although you seek it carefully with tears.

But if the law cannot show the offender mercy, does it leave him without hope? Yes. It can show him no mercy, nor does it give him any hope. It convinces him of sin, condemns him for it, and sentences him to the first and to the second death.

What! must he despair, then! Of being able to attain mercy by any means in his own power, he must despair—despair of working out for himself such righteousness as the law demands—despair of escaping, by any sorrow or repentance or his, the punishment which justice is bound to inflict. And when he finds himself in this guilty and helpless state, then will he be glad to hear of a Saviour. Blessed be God, there is salvation for him who despairs of being saved by the law. To him the gospel offers a free pardon. When he flies to the gospel, seeking to be saved by free grace, then there is mercy for him, and plenteous redemption. When he cries out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the curses of the broken law, and from the justice of an offended God? The gospel points out unto him the victorious Saviour, who hath redeemed his people from the curse of the law, being made a curse for them, and hath satisfied all the demands of his Father's justice, having made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness. And therefore he can save to the uttermost. If there be any of you whom the broken law accuses, and whom justice is pursuing to inflict the threatened punishment, fly to this almighty Saviour, and you will find in him a safe refuge. He can save you from the condemnation of the law; for there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. And he can deliver you from the stroke of justice; for who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect, since it is God himself that justifieth them?

This is the great salvation set before you, who despair of being saved by the law. It is a free, full, and eternal salvation. He who has it to give, has graciously convinced you of your want of it, and has made you willing to receive it as a free gift. Ask it then of him, deeply sensible of your unworthiness, and of your helplessness, and he will incline his ear unto your petitions: for he never cast out the prayer of the poor destitute. Ask, and ye shall have the precious gift of faith, and great joy and peace in believing that you are redeemed from the curse of the law, and that you are enriched with the blessings of the gospel. You will be made the children of God, and will receive the adoption of sons through faith in Christ Jesus, and if sons, then you will be heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ of an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you; which may the Father reserve for you all, for the sake of his beloved Son, through the effectual grace of the Holy Spirit, that to the three persons in one Jehovah you may be happy in ascribing equal honour and glory, and blessing, and praise, for ever and ever! Amen.

DISCOURSE III

UPON THE CEREMONIAL LAW

Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense.—Song of Solomon, iv. 6.

After man had broken the moral law, and had fallen into a helpless state of guilt and misery, it pleased God to reveal the covenant of grace. As soon as the way to salvation was stopped by the law, he opened a new and living way by the gospel. The Messiah was promised, and the rites and ceremonies were instituted, which were to represent what he was to be and to do for the salvation of men. "Which things were a shadow, but the body, or substance, was Christ." They were expressive figures and shadows of his actions and sufferings, and in them the religion of the gospel was delineated to the senses of the believer. This law of ceremonies was revealed upon the fall, and afterwards republished in writing by Moses. It had God for its author, and was established by his divine authority, and therefore it deserves our particular consideration.

In my last discourse I endeavoured to explain the scope and design of the moral law, and to prove that, by its works, no flesh can be justified in the sight of God. The next body of law is the ceremonial, which preached salvation from the pains and penalties incurred by the breach of the moral law. It held forth this doctrine under a great variety of types and figures, and taught it in many plain passages. The words which I have read contain the Messiah's own sentiments of the subject. The commentators allow him to be the speaker, and he is addressing himself to the believer, with whom he holds sweet and spiritual discourse in this divine treatise. He particularly informs them where he vouchsafed his presence, and would be found of them that sought him, so long as the ceremonial law was in force. Until the day break, says he, until the day of my first coming in the flesh shall dawn, and the shadows flee away (the types and shadows of the law shall vanish), I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense, to the mountain of the Lord's house, even to the holy hill of Sion; and there I will be spiritually present in the temple service; I will there give my blessing to the ordinances, and will make them the means of grace: whatever your wants may be, apply to me in these instituted means, and you will find an abundant supply: for, until the day break, and the shadows flee away, &c.

The consideration of this passage will, I hope, by the assistance of God, help us to comprehend the scope and design of the ceremonial law. And may the Holy Spirit, who inspired these words, accompany our present meditation upon them, that we may,

First, Clearly understand their true sense and meaning; and Secondly, May be established in the doctrine which they contain.

There are many parts of the Song hard to be understood, especially by the unlearned and unstable, who wrest it, as they do also the other scriptures, to their own destruction. But the passage which we have now before us is very easy. There is no difficulty in it to persons who have a little acquaintance with the scripture manner of writing, which constantly uses and accommodates natural things to explain spiritual, suiting its instructions to man's present embodied state, in which he cannot see the things of grace but through the glass of nature. The language of the Old Testament is entirely of this kind. Every Hebrew word has a literal sense, and stands for some sensible object, and thereby gives us a comparative idea of some spiritual object. As this is the nature of the language, so is it also of the subject-matter of the book of Canticles. It is drawn up in the manner of a dialogue, in which outward and material things are used to represent inward and spiritual things. This way of writing is very abstruse to those who have not the senses of their souls exercised to discern the things of God, but to those who have, it is an easy book. He who runs may read it, if he has but a little acquaintance with the scripture language, and some of that love in his heart, of which this book treats: for it is a song of loves, setting forth the mutual affection between Christ and the believer, who is united to him by saving faith. And in the words of my text, Christ informs the believer where he might at all times find his presence. He would be spiritually present in the services and ceremonies of the temple. By these he would convey grace and strength to his faithful people, until his coming in the flesh.

Until the day break. The scripture mentions two days, by way of eminence, and distinguishes them by two of the greatest events which the Redeemer's love and power are to produce—the day of Christ's first coming, and the day of his second coming. The day of his first coming in the flesh is here spoken of—the day which Abraham earnestly desired to see, and which is often mentioned in the prophets under the expressions "of the day of the Lord, or the day of our God;" and sometimes it is very emphatically styled "that day;" that day's wonders raising it above all days from the beginning to the end of time. And, in the New Testament, our Lord calls it my day, the day of my incarnation, when I, Jehovah, should take a body of flesh, and God and man should be one Christ. This day many prophets and kings desired to see; for God manifest in the flesh was the foundation of their faith and hopes. They longed to see this day break, and to behold the sun of righteousness, with his saving and healing influences, arising upon the earth; and, when he did arise, we find those who were then looking for redemption singing his praises with grateful hearts: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, through whose tender mercy the day-spring from on high hath visited us:" they blessed God, because the substance was now to take place of the shadow, and all the legal ceremonies were to be succeeded by gospel realities. When the glorious day of Christ's appearance in the flesh was come, and the light of life was risen upon the earth, then

The shadows were to flee away. The legal ceremonies are called shadows in scripture, because they were the outward and visible signs of inward and spiritual objects. St. Paul says, the ceremonial law "had the shadow of good things to come," Heb. x. 1; of the good things which are now come to us by the advent of Christ; and it had the patterns and examples of heavenly things; every one of which had God for its author, and was instituted by him to be an apt figure, and to raise a just idea of some spiritual object; as Moses was admonished of God, when he was about to make the tabernacle. "For see," saith he, "that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount." Every rite and ceremony was a pattern of some heavenly object, the real existence of which the pattern proved, as a shadow proves the reality of the substance from which it is cast, and the resemblance and likeness of which is set before the eyes, as the shadow of a body is a representation of it. The scripture has expressly determined what all these shadows were to represent: for the apostle, speaking of them in Col. ii. 17, declares, "that they were the shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ." Christ is the reality of all the shadows of the law; he is the body, and the substance, of whom they are the pictures. If you take away their reference to him, they cease to be examples and shadows of heavenly things; but if you suppose them to represent him and his actions, and sufferings, &c. then they answered many noble purposes, until he came in the flesh to fulfil them; for then these shadows were to flee away; one great end of their institution being answered. The observance of them was to be no longer in force; but they were to be entirely repealed and abrogated. However, until this blessed day should break, and these legal shadows should thus flee away, the text says, they were to serve a double purpose: they were, first, to be the outward and visible signs of the inward and spiritual grace given unto us, and ordained by Christ himself, to be, secondly, a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof. This is plainly implied in the last words of the text, in which Christ declares that, until the ceremonies were fulfilled by his coming in the flesh, he would be spiritually present in them.

I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense. Where was this mountain of myrrh? Was it not the place in which the Lord was present, until the shadows were fled away? And where was he present, but in the services of the ceremonial law, which could not be performed any where, when the text was spoken, but in the temple? There the Lord had put his name, and had sanctified the house by the presence of his glory. "I have chosen," says the Lord, 2 Chron. vii. 16, "and sanctified this house, that my name might be there for ever, and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually:" there will I receive the sacrifices which I have forbidden to be offered anywhere else; there will I accept of the prayers of the faithful offerer: and there will I dwell between the cherubim, with visible tokens of my divine presence and glory. As he chose the people of Israel, out of all the nations of the earth, to be his people, so he chose his sanctuary in Judah, and the holy hill of Sion to be his dwelling-place, manifesting his presence there in such a manner as he did nowhere else in the world; and therefore we may infer that, when Christ says, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, until the shadows flee away, he certainly means the mountain of the Lord's house. And the Hebrew word justifies this inference; for the word rendered myrrh is the very same root with Moriah, the mount upon which the temple stood. I will get me, says Christ, to the mountain of Moriah, and there will I dwell, because I have a delight therein. So that we have here a plain testimony of Christ's presence in the ceremonial services performed upon mount Moriah. In these he was to be found of them that sought him, until the day of his manifestation in the flesh. And the meaning of the word seems to me further to confirm this interpretation: for it signifies bitterness, what is bitter to the taste, and bitter to the spirit, grievous and hard to be borne; and what was there to be seen or done upon mount Moriah to render this its proper name? Look at the chief part of the temple service, and then judge. It consisted in making gifts and sacrifices for sin, in which you may behold a striking picture of the bitter sufferings of the Lamb of God. In the sacrifices were represented, every day, things more bitter than death, the shedding of his blood, and the taking away of his life. He made his soul an offering for sin, and to satisfy the infinite demands of law and justice. His agony and bloody sweat, his cross and passion, show what bitter things the Father had written against him. These were represented in the roasting of the paschal lamb with fire, and in the eating it with bitter herbs. And when Christ our passover was sacrificed for us, and really underwent the fire of the Father's wrath, there never was any sorrow like unto that sorrow, which forced him to cry out, in the bitterness of his soul, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

If all these circumstances be laid together, they will evidently determine the place of Christ's presence, while the ceremonial law was in force. He was spiritually present in the temple service, to render the sacrifices, and the other typical rites, the means of grace, and effectual to the ends for which they were instituted: for after the moral law was broken, there was no way to salvation, but faith in the promised Saviour; and the necessity of faith in him was taught by the services of the ceremonial law, as it is written, "through faith they kept the passover:" they acted faith upon Christ in the passover; they slew and roasted the paschal lamb with fire, and ate it with bitter herbs, knowing it to be a type of the future sacrifice of the Lamb of God, of the benefits of whose death they were then, through faith, partakers. They found his spiritual presence strengthening and refreshing their souls at the passover, as we do now at the Lord's supper; and they knew that, through his merits and mediation, their persons and their services were accepted to God the Father, which is, I think, the sense of the last words of the text,

I will get me to the hill of frankincense.

This is the same place mentioned before, only described by another name, to express a different property. Incense was, by divine command, a chief part of the temple service. As the sacrifices offered in the temple were to represent the death of Christ, so the incense there offered was to represent the sweet savour of his meritorious death, which alone could reconcile God to sinners, and could render them and their services well-pleasing in his sight; and therefore that rich perfume, mentioned Exod. xxx, which was the type of the sweet incense of Christ's merits, was forbidden, on pain of death, to be used upon any other occasion than in the service of God, and in any other place than in the tabernacle, at that time, and afterwards, in the temple. The command is, ver. 36, "Thou shalt put of it before the testimony, in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I will meet with thee: it shall be unto you most holy:" ver. 58, "Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from his people." This was to show that God the Father is seen to be propitious to sinners, only through the merits of his Son's sacrifice, and that he who seeks to be accepted in any other way or means shall die in his sins. The incense then was a type of Christ's meritorious death, and the hill of frankincense was the holy hill of Sion, upon which incense used to be offered, and a pure offering. The offering was that great sacrifice of the Lamb of God, shadowed out by all the sacrifices slain from the foundation of the world; and the incense was to represent the efficacy of his sacrifice. It is said of the typical offerings, that the Lord smelled a sweet savour; how much more was he pleased with the offering and sacrifice of Christ, which was indeed a sweet-smelling savour, acceptable and well-pleasing unto God?

But how was Christ present in the offering up of the incense? It was his institution, and he was spiritually present to render it effectual to the ends for which he instituted it. He appointed it to be one of the means of grace; for he taught believers, by this ceremony, that he could make them and their services acceptable to the offended Deity; and, by his Spirit, he gave them the comfortable knowledge of their acceptance. When, therefore, he mentions his presence on the hill of frankincense, it is as if he had said, When the high priest enters once every year, at the great feast of atonement, into the holy of holies, and there fumes the incense before the cherubim of glory, and sprinkles the blood before the mercy-seat, I will then enable believers to act faith upon my future fulfilling and realizing of this service: for, after my sacrifice upon earth, I will enter into the holy of holies, and will there plead my merits before the mercy-seat in heaven, and, by my all-prevailing intercession, will render the persons and the services of believers well-pleasing unto God the Father. Thus Christ was present upon the hill of frankincense; and there the faithful expected to meet with him. for, while the priest was offering up the incense in the temple, the people used to be at prayers without, hoping that the angel of the covenant, who had much incense given to him to offer it up with the prayers of all the saints, upon the golden altar which was before the throne, would make the smoke of the incense ascend up with their prayers before God. In this hope we find the whole multitude of the people (Luke i. 10.) praying without, at the time that Zacharias was burning the incense in the temple of the Lord.

From the sense and meaning of the words, as thus in part opened and explained, the following doctrine may be established. Upon the breach of the moral law, the ceremonial law was instituted to prefigure the promised Messiah, and his actions and sufferings, and to preach forgiveness of sins through him. Until the day of his coming in the flesh, the ceremonies served as shadows to raise ideas of him, and as means of grace to support the faith and hopes of his people: they were outward and visible signs of inward and spiritual grace, in the very same manner as the sacraments are at present, signing and sealing to believers the benefits purchased by the obedience and sufferings of the Lamb of God. This is the doctrine which I purposed, under my second general head, to establish.

The whole volume of scripture considers the ceremonial law in this same point of view. It was the scope and design of the Old Testament to reveal to sinners the covenant of grace, and to teach them how they might attain pardon for their breach of the moral law. Upon the first breach of it, the Messiah was promised, and the rites and services of the ceremonial law were instituted, to keep up faith and hopes in him, until his coming in the flesh; for they showed what he was to be, and to do, and to suffer. The New Testament relates the accomplishment of the Old, proving Jesus of Nazareth to be the promised Messiah, and declaring how he did and suffered every thing prefigured by the types, and foretold by the prophets. Both Testaments, therefore, treat of one and the same subject, namely, of the way and method by which the transgressors of the moral law may be delivered from the guilt and punishment which they have incurred. This is the opinion of our church, in her sixth article: "The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Jesus Christ." The everlasting life forfeited by the breach of the moral law is offered to mankind in the Old Testament as well as in the New, and offered by the same Saviour, Jesus Christ, and offered by the same gospel of the grace of God: for unto us, says the apostle, Heb. iv. 2, "was the gospel preached, as well as unto them." He is speaking of the Israelites, who, after their deliverance from Egypt, perished in the wilderness through unbelief; and he says, that what is preached unto us, was preached unto them. They had the same gospel which Paul preached; and what it was he thus informs the Corinthians: I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures. This is our gospel, and it was theirs under the Old Testament dispensation. Believers then had the same faith that we have, in the same Saviour. The gospel preached to them the coming of Christ, his sufferings and death for their sins, and his resurrection: they believed he would come, and we believe he is come. In this single circumstance their gospel differs from ours. Our reformers, in the second part of the homily upon faith, speaking of the fathers, martyrs, and other holy men, mentioned Heb. xi, have these remarkable words: "They did not only know God to be the Lord, maker, and governor of all men in the world; but also they had a special confidence and trust, that he was, and would be, their God, their comforter, aider, helper, maintainer, and defender. This is the Christian faith which these holy men had, and which we also ought to have, and although they were not named Christian men, yet was it a Christian faith that they had; for they looked for all the benefits of God the Father, through the merits of his Son Jesus Christ, as we do now. This difference is between them and us; that they looked when Christ should come, and we be in the time when he is come; therefore, saith St. Augustine, the time is altered and changed, but not the faith." Faith was always the same. Ever since the moral law was first broken, there has been but one gospel, which preached salvation by one Lord, and one faith.

If you ask, How was it preached to the holy men of old? It was revealed to them by many plain prophecies ("for the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy") and by many significant types and expressive ceremonies; under which Christ was as clearly preached as he is under the sacraments of the New Testament: for all these were memorials, instituted on purpose to keep him in memory; and they were patterns serving as copies to convey ideas of their originals, according to what is written, Exod. xxv. 40. And look, says God to Moses, that thou make them, namely, the tabernacle and all its vessels, after their pattern, which was showed thee in the mount; they were the patterns of heavenly things, as St. Paul, reasoning upon this passage, has assured us, Heb. viii. 5: "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God, when he was about to make the tabernacle: for see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount." Here is a plain description of the scope and design of the ceremonial law. An infallible interpreter assures us, that it served for an example and shadow of heavenly things. Its ceremonies were examples to set these heavenly things before men's eyes, and to raise ideas of them; and they were shadows to delineate them, and to give an outward sketch of them; and they were patterns like a good plan or design, representing them clearly and distinctly. This was the nature of the types: they were instituted to prefigure the heavenly things which were to be in Christ, and which were to be derived from him to believers.

In this sense, Christ was present upon Moriah. He was the types and services. These were his representatives. They stood for him, and acted in his name, and by his authority were deputed to declare his gracious intentions towards the transgressors of the moral law: for they all preached Christ, and salvation through his infinitely meritorious sacrifice. The whole temple-service represented him in this light. for the temple itself was the type and figure of his body. Our Lord himself calls it so. "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will build it up," John ii. 19. But he spake, says St. John, of the temple of his body, of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man. And herein he spake agreeably to the well-known usage of scripture, which calls the type and the thing typified by the same name. The temple was the type of his body, and every part of its furniture was a type and figure of what was to be in the humanity of the incarnate God. All its vessels were apt figures and beautiful pictures of those divine graces which were in him, and which believers were to receive out of his fulness. The holy place represented what he was to do upon earth: the holy of holies represented what he was to do in heaven for his people. At the entrance of the holy place stood the laver, filled with water, with which the priests were to wash, when they went in and came out of the temple. This was to set forth the infinitely purifying virtue which was in Christ, and with which he was to cleanse sinners from the pollution of sin, as he says in the prophet: "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you," Ezek. xxxvi. 25. Next to the laver stood the altar of burnt-offering, on which the blood of the sacrifice was offered; hereby was represented the all-meritorious blood of the Lamb of God, which alone taketh away the guilt of sin. On one side of the holy place stood the candlestick, with its lamps always burning to represent that divine light which came into the world, that he who followeth it should not walk in darkness, but should have the light of life. On the other side stood the table of shew-bread, the figure of that bread of God, which came down from heaven, and of which, if any man eat, he shall live for ever. At the upper end of the holy place, next the veil, stood the altar of incense, to represent the sweet-smelling savour of Christ's sacrifice, through faith in which the transgressors of the moral law are reconciled to God the Father, and rendered acceptable and well-pleasing in his sight.

The most holy place, or the holy of holies, was the figure of heaven; and what was done in it, once a year, by the high priest, was to represent what our great high priest does in heaven for us and for our salvation. This doctrine is very clearly taught in several parts of the epistle to the Hebrews. Thus we read that,

"into the second tabernacle went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people; the Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was not yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present," Heb. ix. 7, 8, 9. And what the Holy Ghost signified by this service could not but be known, while the tabernacle and temple stood, because it was a figure for the time then present. The 9th chapter, and great part of the 10th, treat entirely of this subject. The high priest was the type of Christ, our great intercessor. His going in once a year into the holy of holies, was the figure of Christ's appearing once in the end of the world, and opening a new and living way for us into the holiest. His carrying blood to sprinkle upon the mercy-seat, and incense to fume before the cherubim of glory, was to represent Christ's pleading the merits of his blood at the throne of grace, which was an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice well-pleasing and acceptable to the Holy Trinity. The high priest's coming out of the holy of holies to bless the people, was the figure of Christ's coming from the holiest to bless his people with an everlasting blessing—"Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

It appears, then, from all these authorities, that the ceremonial law preached Christ, and salvation through him, from the guilt and punishment incurred by the breach of the moral law. All its services prefigured him, and were lively and expressive pictures of what he was to be, and to do, and to suffer, in order to make an atonement for sin. His sacrifice for this purpose was represented by all the typical sacrifices: for without shedding of blood there was no remission; and it was not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins; therefore believers hoped for remission through his most precious blood, and sacrificed in faith, relying on the future offering of the Lamb of God: so that it was plainly the scope and design of the ceremonial law to preach remission of sins through the shedding of blood. When any person had offended, and his conscience accused him of sin, he was required to bring his sacrifice to the priest, and to lay his hands upon its head, and to confess his sins over it: after this its life was to be taken away, and its blood shed instead of the sinner's life. And this was to be done, even when a person had offended through ignorance. But in what did the merit of the sacrifice consist? Did its blood take away sin? No. It was not possible the blood of bulls and of goats should do that. The sacrifice was only a memorial instituted to bring the Messiah into mind, as if he had said, Do this in remembrance of me; remembering in every sacrifice the future sacrifice of the Lamb of God; and believers did remember him. When they ate of the paschal lamb, by faith they discerned the Lord's body, and enjoyed communion with Christ, our passover, as we do now at the Lord's supper. They found him present in the ordinances, according to his most true promise in the text. Until the day dawn, says he, the great day of my appearing in the flesh, and the shadows flee away, the shadows of the ceremonial law be realized and fulfilled in my life, obedience, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension; until these things be, I will be spiritually present upon mount Moriah, in the temple worship, and upon the hill of frankincense, to render the persons and the services of my people well-pleasing and acceptable unto God the Father.

Since, then, it was the scope and design of the ceremonial law to prefigure Christ under its expressive types and shadows, do you, my brethren, look upon it in this light? Are you convinced that the Old Testament contains the gospel, and the evidence for its doctrines? And have you read it carefully, in order to collect this evidence, and to establish yourselves in your most holy faith? Or, instead of making this use of the Old Testament, have you greatly neglected it, supposing it to contain a religion different from Christianity? This is the opinion of too many among us. But it is very unscriptural. The New Testament is so far from being contrary to, that it is in perfect harmony with the Old. They both preach one gospel, one Saviour, and one faith; for, both in the Old and New Testament, everlasting life is offered to mankind by Jesus Christ. And this life by him was preached by the ceremonies of the Old Testament, as well as by the sacraments of the New, with only this difference—the New is the fulfilling of the Old; the Old Testament promises the Messiah should come and dwell among men, and the New proves that he did come, and that God has been manifest in the flesh. Consider what has been said at present in proof of this point. Weigh it carefully; and then I hope you will read the Old Testament with great pleasure and profit, finding it testifying throughout of Christ, and of salvation through him.

But what have we to do, may some say, with the Jewish types and ceremonies? Are they not all now repealed and abrogated? Yes. Christ has fulfilled them, even to the least jot and tittle; but they still stand upon the record, to teach us what he was to fulfil. They still continue to bear evidence for Christ, although the observance of them hath ceased; therefore we are still concerned to search what witness they bear of him. "Search the scriptures," says Christ; "for these are they which testify of me." There were no scriptures, when he spake this, but the Old Testament; and it testified of Christ. It did bear witness of him, by its types; for they were shadows of good things to come, of which Christ is the body; and by its prophecies; for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. This testimony it still bears, witnessing to us what Christ was to be, and to do, and to suffer, as the New Testament witnesses to us that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah; for he was, and did, and suffered what the Old Testament had foretold. Thus they mutually support each other. The Old Testament looks forward to the accomplishment of its ceremonies and prophecies, referring its readers to some person who was to fulfil the law and the prophets, and the New Testament proves Jesus of Nazareth to be the person; and thus all the scriptures testify of him.

If you ask in what particular respect does the ceremonial law testify of him, it considers him chiefly in this point of view. The moral law being broken, and the transgressors of it being under guilt and liable to punishment, Christ was proposed to them by the types, as the sacrifice and atonement for their sins. All the sacrifices pointed at his sacrifice; and the atonement made by them had no merit but what was derived by faith from his all-perfect atonement: for he was the lamb fore-ordained to be slain by the covenant of the ever-blessed Trinity, which was made before the foundation of the world; and he was the lamb typically slain from the foundation of the world in all the sacrifices after the fall, and slain really in the fulness of time, when he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. In this respect, all the sacrifices pointed to the Lamb of God, referring the transgressors of the moral law to his most precious blood, without the shedding of which there could be no remission: because it was not possible that the blood of beasts could take away sin.

Upon this state of the doctrine there arises an important question, in which, my brethren, you are all nearly concerned, namely, Whether you look upon Christ in the same light that the ceremonial law places him. All the ceremonies pointed to him; and when any one had offended against the moral law, the ceremonial law required him to bring his sacrifice to make an atonement for his sin: for without shedding of blood there was no remission; and thus he was taught to hope for remission only through the shedding of the blood of the Lamb of God. Now, my brethren, Do you act as the ceremonial law enjoins? Are you convinced of your offences against the moral law, and sensible of your guilt, and apprehensive of your danger? Have you put your trust in the sacrifice of the immaculate Lamb of God? Have you placed all your hopes of pardon on the merits of his most precious blood? If not, what besides can you rely upon? You have sinned; and the wages of sin is death. The almighty lawgiver has declared, that you shall die—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Under this sentence you lie, as to anything you can do, either to respite it, or to revoke it, until it be executed upon you. Your life is forfeited, and you must die the death. And while justice spares you, how do you resolve to act? You hear there is a Saviour, and redemption in his blood. He laid down his life, and died to purchase life for all transgressors, who will come unto him for it: either, therefore, you must receive life of him, or die. Consider then, seriously, which of these two is your choice. Which would you have? life or death? If you refuse to come to Christ for life, you must die. Your blood must be shed, and your soul must perish; for the Lord God, who cannot lie, hath spoken, that without shedding of blood there is no remission: unless, therefore, you are saved by the blood of Christ, there is no remission for you. You must die in your sins.

But if you seek to be saved by the blood of Christ, and desire the life purchased by his death, you have all possible encouragement to hope for his favour. He has begun, and he must carry on the work. Wait upon him, then, for his grace in the ways of his appointment, and you will find him still present in them. Seek his face in prayer. Hope to find his good Spirit in hearing and reading his word, and continue thus in his service, and he will give you to experience the truth of the doctrine preached by the ceremonial law. All its sacrifices taught remission of sin through blood; and all pointed to the bleeding Lamb of God, and to his atonement; and, by faith, believers of old received the benefit of his atonement, as we do at present; for by faith they kept the passover and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born in Egypt should touch them. Wait upon God, and he will enable you also to act faith upon Christ your passover; and when his blood has been sprinkled upon your heart, the destroying angel cannot then touch you. This blood will keep you from death, and from him that hath the power of death. Through faith in it, you will live in the comfortable knowledge of what this scripture means: "He that believeth in me," says Christ, "though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die," John xi. 25, 26. Happy are they who thus believe and live in him. They have redemption in his blood, even the forgiveness of sins; and they are passed from death unto life. They know the infinite value of his atonement, not only for the forgiveness of their past offences against the moral law, but also for their present failings. They want the benefit of his most precious blood every day: for all that these do wants to be cleansed in the fountain which was opened for sin and for uncleanness. They are forced to bring their very duties to be cleansed here, because these do not come up to the perfect demands of the moral law. There are short comings in their most holy things, for which they want an atonement. Oh how precious, then, must the blood of Christ be to such persons! With what love will their hearts burn towards him! With what gratitude will they serve him! How dear will the ordinances be to them, since there they find their Lord spiritually present, comforting, strengthening and establishing their hearts! These persons want no arguments to persuade them to a constant attendance upon the ordinances: for they know that they shall in them find him whom their soul longeth for, and shall in them enjoy a sweet communion with him, until the day of glory break, and the earthly shadows flee away. Then they shall see him face to face, and shall be for ever happy with their Lord. Oh that this happiness may be yours and mine! Grant it, Holy Father, for thy dear Son's sake; to whom, with the eternal Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah, be equal honour and glory, praise and worship, for ever and ever. Amen.

DISCOURSE IV.

UPON THE LAW OF FAITH.

Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay, but by the law of faith.—Rom. iii. 27.

HAVING already considered the nature of the moral and of the ceremonial law, I am now to treat of the law of faith, mentioned in my text. The moral law is the holy, just, and good will of God, to which he required, and does require, perfect obedience: for his will is like himself, always one and the same, without variableness or shadow of turning: but there is no salvation now to be expected from this law, because all have sinned against it, and are liable to the threatened penalties. Upon the first breach of it, God was graciously pleased to reveal the ceremonial law, the design and scope of which was to point out the promised Messiah, and to be the means of grace to the people of God: for by its services, which were shadows and types of Christ, and of the good things to come through him, the eye of faith was kept looking earnestly upon him, and waiting for the happy time when the day should break, and the shadows flee away, and he should come in the flesh, to deliver his people from the curses of the moral law. At the end of 4000 years he came, and having fulfilled the ceremonial law, and accomplished every thing signified by its typical services, it was then repealed, and the law of faith alone was established, by which believers have been saved from the beginning, and are to be saved to the end of the world.

If we take a short view of the apostle's reasoning in this chapter, we shall easily discover what this law of faith is. He is treating of the corruption of mankind, of the Jews as well as of the Gentiles, and he proves that they are all under sin: for they have all broken the moral law, and are guilty in the sight of God, and are thereby become absolutely incapable of ever attaining inherent legal righteousness. After the moral law has been once broken, it can never afterwards justify the sinner; because it requires perfect uninterrupted obedience, and allows of no failing, no, not in thought. Its style and language is—"Do this, and thou shalt live."—"If thou transgress, dying thou shalt surely die." And when any one transgresses, it knows nothing of mercy, nor has made any provision for pardon, but calls aloud for justice to inflict the deserved punishment. And since all men have transgressed, therefore the apostle concludes that by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God. Thus every mouth is stopped, and all the world is become guilty before God. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested in the covenant of grace, in which the honour and dignity of the moral law is secured, and a wonderful way is revealed, whereby the sinner may be pardoned, and infinite justice may be glorified in showing him mercy. The Lord Christ, being God equal with the Father, freely covenanted to take man's nature, and in it to act and suffer as his representative, to pay the law perfect and infinitely meritorious obedience, and to endure satisfactory and infinitely meritorious sufferings, yea, to bear the wrath, and to die the death, which man deserved; and thus he wrought out an all-perfect righteousness, even the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe. And this method of justifying sinners by his being made sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him, is thus opened and explained by the apostle in the words going before the text. All have sinned, says he, and come short of the glory of God, being justified freely by his grace; and if by grace, then it is not by works, but is all a free gift through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood; his blood made the propitiation, and faith applies and receives it, and thereby declares the righteousness of God for the remission of sins that are past. And in this way of justifying sinners, through the righteousness of the Lord Christ, God the Father proves himself to be just, and the justifier of him who is of the faith of Jesus. He vindicates his justice, and the honour of his law; and, these being secured, he can then justify him that is ungodly, if he believe in Jesus: for then his faith will be imputed unto him for righteousness.

When the carnal man hears this doctrine, he is apt to take offence at it. He has such a high opinion of himself, and of his own boasted abilities, that he cannot conceive how God should justify sinners by his free grace, without any of their works and merit; and he is ready to ask, What! must I do nothing towards my justification? No. You can do nothing; because, while your sins are unpardoned, you are under sentence of death. You are dead in law, and you can no more do any act that is good and valid in the court of heaven, than a condemned criminal can do any act that is good and valid in one of our courts of justice. What! am I not to work out, says he, and to merit some part of my justification? No, none at all. The scripture gives all the glory to God, that it may cut off all boasting from man; for if God justify sinners freely by faith, without any works, where is boasting then? says the apostle. Man would have room to boast, if he was justified wholly by his own works, or partly by faith, and partly by his works: if Abraham were justified by works he hath whereof to glory; but since he is justified entirely by free grace, through faith, in the righteousness of another, all boasting is excluded. By what law? By the law of works? No, by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified, and therefore no flesh can boast: for how absurd would it be to boast of the works of that law which brings sinners in guilty, and condemns them? But all boasting is excluded by the law of faith; for faith receives justification freely from Jesus Christ, without any merit or works of man, and therefore is obliged to give all the glory to God; so that faith effectually excludes boasting; and the law of faith, the obligation that a sinner is under to go out of himself for righteousness, and to believe in the righteousness of another, in order to his being justified, still further excludes boasting; for the Lord God has made a decree, and heaven and earth shall pass away rather than it shall not be carried into execution, that a sinner shall be justified no other way but by faith. This is the law of the most high God, which he hath revealed from heaven, that ye believe in him whom he hath sent, for righteousness. Under this law we now live, and by it only can we be saved; and may he, who teacheth man wisdom, teach you the nature of it! May he accompany with his grace and blessing what I shall observe from the text,

First, Concerning the law of faith, and

Secondly, In defence of the apostle's doctrine, and Thirdly, By way of application.

As to the first head, the apostle has thus explained the law of faith. The moral law is still in force; but there is no salvation by it, because it requires perfect uninterrupted obedience, and will not allow of the least failing, no, not in thought. If you offend once, you have lost all claim to legal righteousness for ever; so that by the works of the moral law no flesh can be justified, since all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God. And as the moral law cannot save the sinner, neither can the ceremonial: for it is now repealed. Christ, the substance, is come, and has fulfilled all the legal types. These shadows of good things are now fled away; and to observe them at present would be denying that Christ has been manifested in the flesh, and has completed them. And therefore, since the moral law brings us all in guilty, and condemns us for transgressing it, and the observance of the ceremonial law is now repealed, there remains only the law of faith, by which a guilty sinner can be saved. This way of salvation by faith is established by law. The Lord God has made a decree, and has enacted, by his sovereign authority, that he who with his heart believeth unto righteousness shall be saved. This is the great charter of heaven, by which all the divine graces and blessings of time and of eternity are conveyed to transgressors. The law of faith says to them, you have broken the moral law, and are under sentence of condemnation; but behold the Lamb of God! believe in him, and you shall be justified. And thus the law of faith takes a poor sinner off from working and striving to merit his justification, and requires him only to believe what Christ has done and suffered for him, and in his stead. It commands him to rely entirely upon the righteousness of the Lord Christ for his pardon and acceptance with God the Father. This is the only way of justification now established by law. All other ways are illegal, and are expressly forbidden by a divine statute in this case made and provided, in which are these words: "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," either moral or ceremonial. The moral law is broken, and it condemns him, and the ceremonial law is repealed; therefore we conclude that he cannot be justified but by the law of faith; and by this he is obliged and bound to accept justification by believing, and not by working; so that, if he seek to enter into life, he must keep this commandment; he must renounce all merit of his works, all righteousness of his own, and accept of the Saviour's righteousness as a free gift, and have it by faith, imputed to him for his justification. This is the law of faith upon which the scripture is very full. The apostle has discussed this point at large in his epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians. In the third chapter of the Romans, he proves both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin and guilt, and cannot by any of their own works be justified before God; and then he speaks of the manner of their justification, which is freely by grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood to declare his righteousness. In the fourth chapter, he proceeds to illustrate this doctrine from the case of Abraham, who believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness. Now, unto him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness; and since it is entirely of grace, then it is no more of works; for it is a manifest contradiction to maintain that we are justified freely by the grace of God; and yet that the work of man is some way needful to merit our justification. Is not this something like purchasing a free gift? Equally inconsistent is the grace of God bestowing freely, and the works of man meriting righteousness. Man has nothing to do but to believe; and this too is the gift of God's free grace; for righteousness is imputed to him who worketh not, but believeth, even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered; blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. In these scriptures, our justification before God is ascribed to faith without works. These two, faith and works, cannot stand together. The righteousness of Christ, freely received by faith, is inconsistent with man's working in hopes of attaining a righteousness of his own; for he hopes to attain an impossibility. The apostle, in his most excellent sermon, preached at Antioch, recorded Acts xiii. declares that we cannot be justified by the works of the law. After he had finished the argumentative part of his discourse, he makes this application: "Be it known unto you, therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses," neither by the works of the moral, nor yet of the ceremonial law; so that the whole of a sinner's justification is put upon his believing.—"All that believe are justified."

I might bring many more passages of scripture to confirm this doctrine, but they would be needless, because it is already abundantly confirmed by the articles and homilies of our church. The title of the eleventh article is,

"Of the justification of man.

"We are accounted righteous before God ONLY for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings; wherefore, that we are justified by faith ONLY is a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the homily of justification;"—

In which homily we have these words:

"This saying, that we be justified by faith ONLY, freely, and without works, is spoken for to take away clearly all merit of our own works, as being unable to deserve our justification at God's hand, and thereby most plainly to express the weakness of man, and the goodness of God, the great infirmity of ourselves, and the might and power of God, the imperfection of our own works, and the most abundant grace of our Saviour Christ; and therefore wholly to ascribe the merit and deserving of our justification unto Christ ONLY, and his most precious blood-shedding. This faith the holy scripture teacheth us is the strong rock and foundation of the Christian religion; this doctrine all old and ancient authors of Christ's church do approve; this doctrine advanceth and setteth forth the true glory of Christ, and beateth down the vain glory of man: this whosoever denieth is not to be accounted for a Christian man, nor for a setter forth of Christ's glory, but for an adversary to Christ and his gospel, and for a setter forth of man's vain-glory." These remarkable words are in the second part of the homily: in the third part we have this passage:

"The very true meaning of this proposition or saying, We be justified by faith in Christ ONLY, is this: we put our faith in Christ, that we be justified by him ONLY, that we be justified by God's free mercy, and the merits of our Saviour Christ ONLY, and by no virtue or good works of our own, that is in us, or that we can be able to have, or to do, for to deserve the same; Christ himself ONLY being the cause meritorious thereof."

These authorities are very plain and very decisive. They declare that we are justified by faith ONLY, without any of our works or deservings. What words can be more full to the point than these are? "We put our faith in Christ, that we be justified by him only, and by no virtue or good works of our own that is in us, or that we can be able to have or to do for to deserve the same." And are these the words of our established church? Are they indeed part of one of our homilies? What! does she teach that no good works, which we can be able to do, deserve our justification? Surely then, my brethren, the law of faith is here with great plainness enforced, and you cannot, as good members of our church, refuse your assent to this proposition, that, in the way of justifying a sinner by faith in the righteousness of Christ, all boasting is excluded.

The natural man cannot receive this proposition, although it comes recommended to him by the highest authority. His heart rises against it. To leave him nothing to boast of, no work, no virtue to glory in, oh, it is too humbling to be borne! Scripture may be plain, and our church's comment upon it is still plainer, but he cannot allow himself to be quite helpless. It appears strange to him that he should have no hand or merit in justifying himself. His carnal reason cannot conceive how this should be, and therefore, whenever he hears of justification by faith only, he always fastens the idea of licentiousness to it, and is ready to object, "If this doctrine be allowed, what a wide door is here opened for all manner of wickedness? At this rate, men may do just what they please; for if they are to be justified by faith only, without works, is not the moral law hereby made void, and all obedience to it? Can there be any necessity for their obedience, unless they are to merit heaven by it?" The apostle was aware of this objection, and has answered it in this chapter: "Do we then make void the law through faith?" Do we repeal the moral law by showing that it cannot justify a sinner? Is this making it void? God forbid. "Yea, we establish the law." It stands established by faith, and by no other method, that has been revealed from heaven, or can be contrived on earth, as I proposed to show under my Second general head, Wherein I was to prove the truth of the apostle's doctrine in my text. The doctrine is this: In the way of pardoning and justifying a sinner, God was willing to shut out all boasting, that the whole glory might be ascribed to his free grace, and therefore he chose the law of faith, which obliges the sinner to acknowledge himself justly condemned for breaking the moral law, and to rely upon the righteousness of the Lord Christ, as the only means of his pardon and acceptance; for if the sinner's justification had been altogether of works, or partly of faith and partly of works, then he would have had whereof to glory, because he would have done something whereby to merit it; but now that righteousness, which is the matter of his justification, being freely wrought out for him, and given to him by sovereign grace as a free gift, and then apprehended and received by faith only without works; in this case all boasting is utterly excluded. This is the apostle's doctrine, which I will endeavour to establish by the following arguments. And,

First, There has been no other way or method discovered of establishing the moral law after it had been broken, and of repairing its honour and dignity, but by the law of faith. The moral law is holy, just, and good. It is the will of the most high God, and therefore partakes of the divine holiness, justice, and goodness. It is as holy, just, and good as God is, and can no more behold the least iniquity than he can; so that when all flesh was become guilty before God, upon account of the breach of the moral law, there could be no longer any salvation expected from it; for the decree is positive and absolute—"By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."

In what way then, or by what means, may they be justified whom the law condemns? As all have sinned, and robbed the law of its glory, it pleased God, of his infinite grace, to contrive a way whereby the sinner might be saved; and yet his law and justice might be maintained in their full honour and dignity.

The Son of God, equal with his Father in every perfection and attribute, undertook to stand in the place of sinners, and, as their representative, to do and suffer for them whatever law and justice demanded. The Father was well pleased for his righteousness' sake, because he knew that his beloved Son would magnify the law and bring honour to his justice. When the fulness of time was come, and the word was made flesh, for us and for our salvation he wrought out that righteousness, with which his Father was well pleased. His obedience to the moral law was for sinners, that, by the obedience of one, many might be made righteous; and he kept the law in all things, continually, perfectly, in thought, word, and deed, in its spiritual nature, and in its utmost extent.

This obedience was such, that he challenged the enemy to find the least failing in it, John xiv. 30: "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." Yea, he could appeal to the all-searching eye of infinite Justice for the absolute perfection of his obedience. Just before his sufferings began, he said, "Father, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do," John xvii. 4. The work of his active obedience being finished, he then undertook to suffer for sinners the pains and penalties due to the breach of their moral law. He suffered once for sin, the just for the unjust; he took their griefs and carried their sorrows; he was wounded for their transgressions, and was bruised for their iniquities, the chastisement of their peace was upon him, and by his stripes they are healed. He bled, he was made a curse; he died, that, by his death, they might live. for, he who did and suffered these things was God. He was truly a divine and infinite person, self-existent, co-eternal, and co-equal with the Father; for, as our church well expresses it, "that which we believe of the glory of the Father the same we believe of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, without any difference or inequality." And since there is no difference or inequality between the persons of the ever-blessed Trinity, consequently what the Lord Christ did and suffered was as infinitely meritorious as if the Father had done and suffered it. When the Lord our righteousness stood up to pay the law obedience, the dignity of his person brought more honour to the law than the obedience of all created beings, angels and men, could possibly have done; because their obedience would have been only finite, whereas his was divine and infinite, and they could only have wrought out a righteousness sufficient to save themselves; whereas he has brought in an everlasting righteousness to save even the ungodly. The prophet Isaiah, speaking of this subject, says, xlii. 21, "The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake, he will magnify the law and make it honourable;" and he did magnify it by completing it. He paid it both an active and a passive obedience in the most perfect degree, and established it in its highest honour and dignity; by which means even that justice, from which the sinner had most to fear, may now be glorified in justifying him; for God may now be just, and yet be the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus.

The righteousness, which is the ground and matter of our justification, is called in scripture, "the righteousness of faith," because faith receives and applies it, and "the law of faith," because the sinner is obliged to accept of this righteousness by faith only; and the manner of his receiving it is by imputation. As Christ took our sins upon him, and was a sinner by imputation, He was made sin for us, who knew no sin; so we are made the righteousness of God IN HIM; not righteous in ourselves inherently, but in him: we are righteous only in him: his righteousness is imputed to us, and made ours by faith, even as Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness. And in this way of justifying a sinner by imputed righteousness the moral law is so far from being made void, that it is established, and the great end of it is answered: for the apostle says, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." The end of the law was to justify those who keep it: "Do this, and thou shalt live;" but we attain not to this end, because, through the corruption of our nature, we do not keep the law perfectly; but Christ fulfilled the law for all those who believe in him, and thereby he became the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. By believing, we receive his righteousness, and then we answer the end of the law. Thus the law of faith does infinite honour to the moral law, and the believer is continually glorifying it; for his language is this—I acknowledge the law of God, to be perfectly holy, just, and good; it requires nothing but what is for the glory of the great Lawgiver, and for the good of his creatures; and no satisfaction can be made to its honour and dignity, after it has been once broken, but what is infinitely meritorious, which no sinner can possibly pay. But thanks be to God for the unspeakable gift of Christ's righteousness, which by faith is mine. His active and passive obedience are imputed unto me for righteousness; and I can now give glory to the moral law of God by acknowledging myself to be justly condemned by it, and by placing my whole trust and confidence in Jesus Christ, who of God is made unto me righteousness.

Thus the moral law is established. It was fulfilled in Christ, and the end of it is answered in believers; from whence it appears, that the law of faith has provided a full security for the honour and dignity of the moral law, and has magnified it and made it honourable, not only in the way of justifying sinners, but also in their walk and conversation after they are justified; which is the second argument I shall bring in defence of the apostle's doctrine.

The law of faith absolutely excludes all boasting, and all confidence in our works, but it does not make void the moral law: for although Christ does deliver the sinner, through faith in his righteousness, from the guilt and condemnation of sin, and thereby justify him, yet he does not give him a discharge from all obedience to the moral law, but, by many gracious motives, inclines and enables him to keep it. He sends his good Spirit to enable the justified believer to exercise all his faculties in paying a grateful obedience to the will of his God.

His understanding was before in darkness. He knew not the will of God, and therefore formed a very wrong judgment of it; but now the Holy Spirit enlightens his understanding, and lets him see the goodness and equity of all God's commandments. He used to think some sins were very little, and might be easily pardoned, and in the commission of others he lived secure without any remorse of conscience, hoping to make amends by repentance and reformation, and some sorrow and tears. But now the case is altered. He sees the law in its spiritual nature and extent, in its holiness and justice, and confesses that the least breach of it deserves everlasting misery; and although Christ has delivered him from the curse of the law, yet with his understanding he assents to its being for God's glory, and for his own interest, to walk in the law of the Lord.

And as the Holy Spirit enlightens his understanding to see what the law of the Lord is, so he takes away the prejudices, and subdues the opposition, which were in his heart against it. The commandments cease to be grievous unto him. The love of God, being shed abroad in his heart, constrains him to love God, and to love the will of God; for God and his will are one. He that loves God cannot hate God's will. Love cannot beget hatred. And therefore when the Holy Spirit gives that faith which worketh by love, he then reconciles the believer's will to God's will, and he can truly say—Lord, what love have I unto thy law! I see the holiness, and goodness, and justice of it; my will approves of it, and my affections love it; yea, I love it above gold and precious stones. Oh! give me strength that I may keep it with my whole heart. And the Holy Spirit does wonderfully strengthen believers in keeping it. He makes them strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might: for he sets their hearts at liberty, and then they run in the way of the commandments. So far then is faith from making void the moral law, that it establishes it as a rule of life for the believer who endeavours, by his holy walking, to glorify it. As he has received Christ Jesus, the Lord, so he desires to walk in him unto all pleasing: And this he would do, not to procure himself a right and title to heaven; for he received that when the Redeemer's righteousness was imputed to him for his justification; and gratitude for this inestimable gift constrains him to love God who so exceedingly loved him, and to evidence this love in the way which God has required; and that is in a grateful obedience. This love, which casteth out all other fear, brings in a filial fear of displeasing his loving Father. He dreads nothing so much as sin, because he knows nothing else can offend his Lord and his God; and therefore he would resist unto blood striving against sin. He would rather die than sin. This fear of offending God influences his whole life and conversation, and keeps him continually watchful, that he may walk worthy of God, who hath called him unto his kingdom and glory.

Upon these two arguments we may rest the truth of the apostle's doctrine in my text. The law of faith excludes boasting, because it excludes all man's works and merit in his justification. His keeping of the moral law cannot in the least justify him before God, because, after he has once broken it, it becomes to him the ministration of death and condemnation. In this state Christ finds the sinner, guilty and condemned, under the curses of the broken law, miserable and helpless. He takes pity on his distress, and determines to save him. With a love truly divine and infinite, he comes from his eternal throne, appears in the likeness of sinful flesh, and God and man are united in one Christ. This was necessary in order to his working out in our nature a divine and infinite righteousness for believers, against which law and justice might have no exception. He attained this righteousness by obeying the law, by suffering its pains and penalties, even unto death, and by being put into the prison of the grave. He was kept there three days, but it was not possible he should be holden any longer. On the third day he rose triumphant from the dead, and thereby demonstrated that law and justice had no further demands upon him: for they had certainly received full satisfaction when they released him out of prison. The law was magnified infinitely by his obedience and sufferings, and it is made honourable, whenever a sinner is brought to submit to be justified through the righteousness of Christ; because he then acknowledges the law to be holy, just, and good, allows himself to be justly condemned by it, and is convinced that no righteousness can save him, but what is infinitely perfect. Such is the Redeemer's. The benefit of this he seeks, and when he receives it, and it is imputed unto him by faith, he then stands justified in the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, and has the Spirit of Christ to guide, strengthen, and sanctify him. This good Spirit enlightens him to understand the law, to love it, and gives strength to keep it: and thus by his holy walking the law gets honour: so that the law of faith does not make void the moral law, but establishes it, both in the justification of a sinner, and also in the holy walk and conversation of a believer.

It is evident, then, that ever since the moral law was broken, there has been but one way in which a sinner could be saved; and this was the law of faith, which stands established by the sovereign decree of the most high God. He has solemnly provided and enacted, that whoever would enter into life must believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God. Have you then, my brethren, kept this commandment, and believed in him? Apply this to your own hearts, and examine them strictly. Do you believe the record which God hath given of his Son? If not, how do you expect to be saved? Against God's will you cannot be saved. You cannot resist omnipotence. And his will is, that you submit to the law of faith, and with the heart believe unto righteousness. The moral law condemns you to death for sinning against it, and no tears or sorrow, no repentance or amendment, can repair the injury you have done it; and therefore by it you cannot be saved. There remains, then, only the law of faith. This offers you a free pardon, and obliges you to accept of it upon pain of dying in your sins. The offer is, "He that believeth shall be saved," but, oh! how dreadful is the sentence which follows the kind offer, "He that believeth not shall be damned!"

Perhaps some of you may be convinced of the necessity of believing; but you cannot see how faith in the righteousness of another can gain acceptance with God. You think that your works and Christ's must go together to your justification. This is the opinion of too many among us, who will not submit to the righteousness of Christ, but will go about to establish their own righteousness along with his. Their mistake arises from their ignorance of the moral law; they know not its infinite holiness, and what its demands are; and from their ignorance of the gospel, which by the law of faith obliges the sinner to accept of that righteousness as a free gift, which is to satisfy all the demands of the moral law.

Such a righteousness Christ has wrought out, and he offers it freely, and the sinner by accepting it receives justification to life. He is made alive to God, and then can act and work in spiritual duties; but before this, he was dead legally and spiritually, dead under the sentence of the law, and dead to all motions and acts of spiritual life. While he lies in this state, he can do no more than a dead corpse can; but by the gift of righteousness he is legally alive. The sentence of death is taken away, and he is freely pardoned; and then he becomes spiritually alive, and can perform the offices of spiritual life. Being made alive at the root, he produces the fair blossoms and brings forth the ripe fruits of righteousness. But these fruits do not make him legally alive; they only evidence him to be so. They are the proper effects and consequences of his being spiritually alive, as the bringing forth the blossoms and fruit prove the tree to have life, but do not give it life. Oh! beware then, my brethren, of the dangerous mistake of making up a righteousness which is to be your justification to life, partly with your own works, and partly with Christ's. These two cannot stand together in your justification. The prophet separates them entirely: "I will make mention," says he, "of thy righteousness, even thine only," Psalm lxxi. 16; and yet he had as much righteousness to make mention of as any of the Old Testament saints. And the apostle, whose praise is in the gospel for his labouring more abundantly than all the apostles, yet prayed to be "found in Christ, not having his own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith," Phil. iii. 9.

What! shall we not do good works, will some say? Yes. Work from life, but not for life. You cannot work any thing acceptably until you who were dead in trespasses and sins be quickened; and when you are made alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, then you will study to walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good word and work.

This careful walking, my Christian brethren, is in a more especial manner incumbent on you. You are called unto liberty; only use not your liberty for an occasion of sin: for you are still under the law to Christ. Although you are freed from its condemning power, yet it is still a rule for your life and conduct; because it is the holy, just, and good will of God your reconciled Father, whom you love, and whom you are exceedingly desirous of pleasing. And it is the will of Christ, your Saviour, to whose image you seek to be conformed, and in whose steps you would gladly tread. And it is the will of the Holy Spirit, who is your guide, your sanctifier, and your strengthener: by him being led, you can take up your cross daily, mortifying sin, resisting the world's allurements, overcoming the temptations of Satan, and subduing the risings of your carnal minds against the moral law. Under the teachings of this good Spirit you will be led right, and under his influence you will be enabled to bring forth much fruit. Oh that the Spirit of the Lord may rest upon you, the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and might, the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord, that you may always walk worthy of the vocation wherewith you are called. May he help you to adorn the doctrine of God your Saviour in all things, and so to walk before him as to demonstrate publicly that you do not make void the law by faith, but do perfectly establish it in its full force and vigour. Grant this, holy Father, for Jesus Christ his sake! to whom with thee, and the eternal Spirit, be equal honour, praise, and worship, for ever and ever. Amen.

DISCOURSE V.

UPON IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS.

He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.—2 Cor. v. 21.

It is the great and merciful design of the gospel to acquaint a sinner, who is guilty and condemned by the holy law of God, how he may be pardoned and justified. Every one of us is a sinner; for all have sinned, and therefore all of us stand in need of pardon, and ought to receive it with thankful hearts as soon as the gospel preaches it to us. But the greatest part of mankind are not sensible of their guilt, nor apprehensive of their danger. Sin has nothing in it terrible to them. They love it, dream of happiness in the enjoyment of it, and while this delusion continues, they see not their want of, and therefore have no desire for, the gospel salvation. But when one of these persons awakes and opens his eyes, he is then terrified at the sight of his present state. Sin appears to him in a new light: he finds it to be exceeding sinful, and the wrath of God, revealed from heaven against it, to be beyond measure dreadful. His guilty conscience alarms him with an awful sense of his danger, and makes him feel some of the punishment due to sin; and then he cannot be easy until he know that his sins may be pardoned, and he cannot be happy until he has some evidence of their being pardoned. Now, Christianity is the only religion which can give such a person relief; because it alone teaches him by what means he may be pardoned and justified, and have peace with God. He may be pardoned freely through the grace of God, and justified through the righteousness of Jesus Christ, whom God the Father hath made sin for us, although he knew no sin in himself, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him, and, being thus justified by faith in him, we might have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Although this doctrine be clearly taught throughout the scriptures, yet there are at present two sorts of men who are great enemies to it, and who strive to keep convinced sinners from the comfort of it: I mean the Papists, who go about to establish their own righteousness, and the Pharisees, among us, who will not submit to the righteousness of God. The notion of the Papists concerning merit is the foundation of all their errors. They teach, that Christ merited the grace for them, which is in them, and then this grace in them merits their justification; and for this inherent grace God doth justify them. And thus they make a Saviour of inherent grace, and put it in the place of Christ, and give his glory to their own works. But if inherent grace be our righteousness before God, then how does God justify the ungodly, who have no grace, or how can he justify a man for those graces which are imperfect, and which want the benefit of Christ's atonement? Absurd as this opinion of theirs is, yet they must defend it. Their cause rests upon it: for if you take away their doctrine of merit, down falls the whole superstructure of their superstition, all their indulgences, pardons, pilgrimages, masses, fasts, penances, and the mighty Babel of man's inventions. When this doctrine was grown to a monstrous height, it pleased God to raise up Luther and the rest of the reformers to preach against it. Their principal aim and design was to overthrow the merit of works, and to establish justification by faith only, and they succeeded. Several nations were converted from the errors of Popery, and among the rest the inhabitants of this island. Our forefathers threw off the Romish yoke, and received the pure doctrines of the gospel, which, amidst our several changes and revolutions of government, have been happily preserved, until there has been, of late years, a manifest departure from them. Great multitudes of Protestants are going fast back again to Popery, and seemingly without knowing it; for it is a received opinion in England, as much as in France, that man's works are effectual and meritorious towards his justification before God. This is the fundamental heresy of the Papists, and how many nominal Protestants have fallen into it, our enemies can tell. They see, with pleasure, that there is very little appearance of religion left amongst us, and that some of our most decent professors are become Papists in that leading principle which separates the Popish from the Protestant communion.

Things being in this unpromising state, the friends of the reformation should bestir themselves. They should try to point out the old land-marks. This is more especially incumbent upon the clergy. It is high time for them to hold forth to their people the fundamental doctrines of the established church, and to warn them against the errors of Popery and Pharisaism. With this view I have chosen the words now read for your present meditation; and may the Lord give his blessing to what shall be spoken upon them! Oh that he may accompany with the effectual working of his power, what shall be said,

First, Concerning Christ's unspotted innocence. He knew no sin. Yet, Secondly, God made him to be sin for us, and,

Thirdly, For this reason, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

And first, our Lord's fitness to be made sin for us, is here set forth by his knowing no sin. He knew it not in the scripture sense of the word. He had no practical knowledge of sin, either in thought, word, or deed. Speculatively, he knew it well; but that could not defile him: for it was the sin of others which he knew, and hated, and came to put away by the sacrifice of himself. Christ was perfectly acquainted with the holy, just, and good law of God; he saw clearly into the purity and spirituality of it, which could not suffer the least offence, being as holy, just, and good as God himself is, and being the copy of his most perfect mind and will. In this view our Lord beheld the odious nature of sin, and the exceeding sinfulness of it. He knew the hatred which the all-pure God had to it, the punishment it deserved, and the everlasting fire which it had kindled in the nethermost hell. No one ever understood these things so clearly as Christ did. He saw the destructive effects of sin, what disorder it had brought into the world, and to what temporal and eternal evils it had subjected the bodies and the souls of men. He knew also that there was no help upon earth, and that no creature in heaven, of the highest order of angels, could deliver any one sinner from his distress, and much less a multitude; therefore his eye pitied us, and his compassion was moved at the sight of our lost and helpless state. Behold what manner of love he hath bestowed upon such sinners as you and me! a love which led him to do greater wonders to save, than he had before done to create us; for he, the most high God, blessed for ever, humbled himself to be made man. He, whom angels and archangels had been worshipping from the moment of their creation, took upon him the form of a servant, and came to save his people from their sins. Adore, my brethren, and praise this infinite condescension of the incarnate God: for it was for you, who believe it by true faith, and for your salvation, that the word was made flesh. He was equal to this great work; because he was perfect God and perfect man in one Christ, and as such he was absolutely free from sin—"he knew no sin," he knew it not in practice. No sin, no inclination, no motion or rising of sin ever entered into his heart, and therefore he was pure from the least spot or stain of pollution.

The scripture is very plain upon this point. Christ was known in the times of the Old Testament by the titles of the Holy Name, the Holy One, the Holy One of Israel; and the prophet Isaiah speaks of the Lord the Redeemer of Israel and his Holy One; and when the fulness of time was come, that this Holy One should be made flesh, he was conceived and born without the least taint of corruption, conceived of the Holy Spirit, and born of a pure virgin. Yea, the angel Gabriel pronounced him to be holy before his birth, in the message to the virgin, Luke i. 35: "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." He was born holy; and such was the life of the holy child Jesus, as his birth had been. We may see clearly how pure he came into this world, from the purity with which he lived in it. How different was his life from ours! he knew no sin, in thought, word, or deed. The prophet says, "He had a clean heart," all his thoughts were clean; "He had pure hands," all his affections were pure; "and he had a mouth without guile," no idle, false, or sinful word ever passed through his lips. He was altogether holy, harmless, and undefiled, and separate from sinners. In the law of the Lord was his study and his delight. He came to glorify it, and by keeping it in its spiritual nature, and in its full extent, with every faculty of soul and body, and at all times, he made it honourable. He paid it that obedience which it demanded, and continued in all things that were written in the book of the law to do them. Thus in him was no sin; sin being the transgression of the law. And accordingly we find him challenging his bitterest enemies upon this point; "Which of you," says he, (John viii. 46,) "convinces me of sin?" Nay, he went further and defied Satan himself, as well as the Jews: "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me," no sin of mine own to lay to my charge.

From these passages it plainly appears that Christ knew no sin. He was a pure and spotless lamb, holy and without blemish; and it was necessary he should be so; because, if he ever had any sin of his own, he could not have obeyed and suffered for the sins of others. The infinite purity of God's law can pass by no sin. Upon the least transgression, if it be but a thought or motion in the heart, the law passes sentence and condemns: "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them:" and if you continue not to do them, justice calls aloud for the infliction of the threatened curse, and waits to see it fully executed; therefore, unless Christ had continued to do all things which are written in the book of the law, he could not have obeyed and suffered for the sins of others; because he would then have suffered for his own, which must not be imagined. It would be blasphemy to suppose any such thing. When the last scene of his sufferings began, he was led like a lamb to the slaughter, a lamb without blemish and without spot, such as the ceremonial law required. You know, my brethren, that no creature could be offered in sacrifice to the Lord, if it had the least blemish or deformity. By this type was prefigured the perfect sinless purity, which was to be in the great sacrifice for sin. He was to be a lamb without blemish, without the least spot or stain of sin, either in his nature or in his life, and such a one was the Lamb of God. The apostle says expressly, 1 Pet. ii. 22, "He did NO sin." And St. John, 1 Eph. iii. 5, speaks to believers, "Ye know, that he was manifested to take away our sins, and in him is no sin:" this was a known and established truth, that in Christ there was NO sin. If judgment was laid to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, there would be found in him a perfect conformity to the law. And this his active obedience was necessary to prepare him for his passive, that, having obeyed the law actively, he might suffer passively whatever was due to our disobedience. And that righteousness, by which we are accounted righteous before God, is the effect of his being obedient unto death, of his obedience to the preceptive part of the law, which was his fulfilling the righteousness of the law; and of his obedience to the vindictive part of the law, which was his bearing the curse of it. His active obedience was absolutely perfect. He knew NO sin, and therefore was every way fit and qualified to suffer for sin, "to be made sin for us," as the apostle expresses it in my text; which words I am, in the second place, to consider.

Although Christ knew no sin, yet he was made sin. How could that be? How could he be made sin, who knew no sin? He was made sin, not practically, but by imputation. He had no sin inherently in him, but had sin imputed to him, when the Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all. In his own person there was no inherent spot or stain of sin, or any such thing. He could not touch the pollution of sin, nor could he practically know its filthy defiling nature. He was not a drunkard, a whoremonger, a thief, or whatever you call a sinner, as such. He neither was a sinner practically, nor had he ever the least inclination to be so; because his will was always in perfect harmony with the will of God. From whence it appears that Christ was not made a polluted sinner, nor yet a guilty sinner, as to the merit and desert of sin. In this respect he was not capable of being made sin. He did not, as to himself, deserve the punishment of sin, for which he suffered. Punishment is due to transgressors, but Christ had not transgressed. Even when he suffered, according to St. Peter, he was just and righteous in himself, (1 Pet. iii. 18,) "Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust." He was perfectly just, and therefore capable of undertaking to suffer for the unjust, that, as no suffering was due to him, the merit of what he suffered might be imputed unto them. And so it was. He freely entered into an obligation to stand in the place of the unjust, and to undergo the punishment due to them; and this, with his own consent, the Lord laid upon him; and in this sense he was made sin for us. He was made sin in the same way that we are made righteous. Now, the righteousness by which we are justified is not inherent in ourselves, but it is in Christ, and is made ours through God's imputing it to us. In like manner our sins were not inherent in Christ, but imputed to him and laid upon him. He was willing to become our surety, and to answer for our sins, and to have them imputed to him, so as to be obliged to bear the punishment of them, even the wrath and curse, which, if he had not endured them, would have sunk every one of us into the pit of hell. But Christ his own self bore them in his own body upon the tree. As the surety of all that shall believe in him, he undertook to answer all the demands which law and justice had upon them. And he was willing to have all their sins imputed to him, and placed to his account, that he might satisfy for them. Accordingly we read that he was once offered to bear the sins of many, and that by his own blood he obtained eternal redemption for them. When their iniquities were laid upon him, although he knew no sin, yet he knew what it was to suffer for sin. He died the death and endured the pains, which were in nature and proportion due to them for their sins, and for the full satisfaction of law and justice.

In this sense Christ was made sin; but what would this avail, if he was a mere man? He might be made sin, and might suffer, but not for us. The apostle says, in my text, he was made sin for us. What was effectual to us, must be more than human, and could be nothing short of divine. Christ's undertakings were too great to be performed by any person less than the most high God. And accordingly the scripture teaches us that Christ was Jehovah, the true self-existent God, a co-equal and co-eternal person with the Father and the Holy Spirit, and in his person God and man were united in one Christ. By this personal union, what the manhood did and suffered partook of the infinite merit of the Godhead. The manhood of Christ had no sin in it; and therefore what it suffered for the sin imputed to it was infinitely meritorious, because he who suffered was God as well as man. This most wonderful method of bringing many sons unto glory was contrived by the ever-blessed Trinity, and settled by the covenant of grace. God the Son was pleased to become their surety, and to stand up in their nature to act and to suffer for them; and what he undertook he could not fail of accomplishing; for all things are alike possible to his almighty power. When he acted for his people, he was God as well as man; his obedience was therefore divine and infinite, and by the merits of it shall many be made righteous. When he suffered for his people, his sufferings were of such infinite merit and efficacy, that by his stripes they are healed and freed from suffering. He took their griefs and carried their sorrows, that they might never feel them. When he died, and paid the debt to justice, which they ought to have paid, he soon brought them a discharge; for although he was buried and descended into hell, yet on the third day he rose again from the dead, and thereby demonstrated that all the ends were answered for which he was made sin for them.

Here, my Christian brethren, let us stop and adore the free love and rich mercy of our Divine Redeemer. He, the most high God, blessed for ever, condescended to be made man for us, and for our salvation. Oh wonderful condescension! that there should be any mercy for such enemies and rebels as we have been; and how did he magnify his compassion, that, when he might in justice have destroyed us, yet he humbled himself and stooped down to save us! But how great was his humiliation in vouchsafing to take on him the form of a servant, and to live in poverty and contempt! Considering who it was that became a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, we see the greatest wonder of all—the depth of his humiliation. He that was the lowest upon earth, was the highest in heaven. He came down to be made sin for us, to have our sins imputed to him, and to answer for them to law and justice. Accordingly, they were laid upon him, and he bore them in his own body on the cross, and thereby saved us from our sins. Blessed, for ever blessed, be the name of our dear Redeemer. Glory, and honour, and thanks never ceasing be to him, who took all our sufferings upon himself, because he could bear that which we could not, and because he could satisfy for that, in a short time, which we could not in eternity; and who, having thus delivered us from sin and suffering, has righteousness to impute unto us, in which we may stand blameless at the bar of justice. Oh, let us praise him with our lips and lives who was made sin for us, that he might be made righteous to us!—which is the third point I was to consider.

He was a spotless lamb, and therefore capable of being made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Righteousness is a perfect conformity to the law and will of God; and without this, no man shall see the Lord: "For the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Cor. vi. 9: and we are all unrighteous, because we have all sinned, and robbed God of his glory. The question then is, In what way, or by what means, can we attain righteousness? Can we attain it by the works of the law? No, it is impossible; because, if it were attainable by our own works, then we should be inherently righteous, and should have such a righteousness as the law demands; but the law demands perfect, unsinning obedience, which we have not paid it: and upon our failing to pay it, the law pronounces us guilty, passes sentence, and leaves us, as to any thing we can do, for ever under the curse; it being the irreversible decree of the almighty lawgiver, that, since all flesh has sinned and broken the law, therefore by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

But if sinners cannot be justified by any inherent righteousness, what righteousness have they to plead at the bar of justice? They have a righteousness absolutely perfect and complete, called, in scripture, the righteousness of God, because the Lord our righteousness contrived and wrought it out. He came into the world, and took flesh, in order to fulfil all righteousness. By his obedience and sufferings he satisfied all the demands of law and justice, and paid that immense debt which none of us could pay, and hereby he was made of God unto us righteousness: God the Father constituted and ordained him to be the perfect righteousness of believers. In him is their righteousness: "Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord," Isa. liv. 17. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

If you ask, how the righteousness of another can be made yours? It must be in the same way that Christ was made sin. He had no sin of his own, and yet he was made sin by imputation; and believers have no righteousness of their own, and yet are made righteous by imputation. Christ had no inherent sin of his own, nor have they any inherent righteousness; but he was made sin by having their sins imputed to him, and they are made righteous by having his righteousness imputed to them. The manner of God's proceeding is the same in both cases. When the Psalmist says, "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity," how is this to be understood? Has he no iniquity in him? Yes, he has original and inherent sin; and if he says he has no sin, he deceives himself; but he is a blessed man, because the Lord does not impute sin to him, nor charge him with it. So when David describeth the blessedness of the man to whom God imputeth righteousness; has the man this righteousness in himself, and is he inherently righteous? No; but, by an act of grace, God accounts him righteous, and imputes righteousness unto him; and therefore he is blessed. And thus God imputes righteousness to them who believe, not for a righteousness which is in them, but for a righteousness which he imputes unto them. As their iniquities were laid upon Christ, and satisfaction for them required of him, as a debt is of the bondsman, although he had none of the money; so is the righteousness of Christ laid upon them. In like manner, as their sins were made his, so is his righteousness made theirs. He is sin for them, not inherently, but by imputation; and they righteousness through him, not inherently, but by imputation.

This is the righteousness in which alone a sinner can stand acquitted at God's bar. There he must make mention of this righteousness, even of this only; for none but this can answer the demands of the law, and expiate the curse of it; and this righteousness can be made his by no other way than by God's imputing it to him; which, as it is the great truth held forth in my text, I will endeavour more fully to explain and defend by the following reasons :—

And first, the ceremonial law taught this doctrine very clearly. Whenever a person had sinned, he was to bring his sacrifice to the priest, and to lay his hands upon its head, confessing his sins over it, and then the guilt was transferred to the sacrifice, and its blood was shed instead of his. This is mentioned several times in Leviticus iv.

And of the scape-goat we read, Lev. xvi. 21. " Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat." All the sins of the children of Israel were passed over to the goat; but were they put into the goat, or were they inherent in him? No. This is too absurd to be supposed; but they were put upon the goat. And this was a very expressive image of our sins being laid upon Christ; for all the sacrifices represented him. As the scape-goat had imputed to him all the people's iniquities, so had Christ all his people's iniquities imputed to him; and as the goat did bear upon him all their iniquities, so Christ did bear all their sins in his own body upon the tree. What was prefigured by the type, was fulfilled by the reality, when Christ suffered once for sin, the just for the unjust: for then he was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Our righteousness is in him. This is a Second argument: That righteousness, which is our justification before God, is IN Christ: believers have it not in themselves; they have not an inherent righteousness, wrought out and attained by their own works, but their justifying righteousness was wrought out by another, and it is in him. How, then, can it be made theirs in any other way than by imputation? Must it not be transferred to them in the same way that their sins were transferred to him? And how were they transferred to him? They were imputed, not inherent: they were laid upon him, not into him. So his righteousness is in him, as their sins were in them; and it is imputed, not inherent; it is not put into them, but upon them. Their righteousness is in him, and he is the Lord their righteousness, and consequently that righteousness for which they are justified cannot be in them; but it is made theirs when God imputes it to them, and they by faith receive it. The manner of receiving it, which is by faith, is the Third argument I shall bring in support of the apostle's doctrine. Faith is the only instrument which God is pleased to use in applying Christ's righteousness. The apostle calls it the righteousness of faith, because faith alone is employed in the application of this righteousness. It is never called the righteousness of any other grace, but of faith. We never read of the righteousness of humility, meekness, or charity: these are of great price in the sight of God, but they have no office in justifying a sinner. This belongs solely to faith: for to him that worketh not, but believeth, is righteousness imputed. It is not by working, but by believing, that sinners are justified When they are convinced of sin, find no righteousness in themselves, hear the dreadful sentence of the law against the unrighteous, and feel in their guilty consciences some of the miseries which they deserve, then they are stirred up to seek for a righteousness in which they may stand acquitted before the judgment-seat of God. The scripture offers to them such a righteousness in Christ; and when God enables them to rest and to rely upon it for their justification, they then by faith have peace with God, through Jesus Christ their Lord. Thus the convinced sinner is forced to seek a righteousness out of himself, and to rely upon the righteousness of another: and how can this be made or accounted his in any other way than by imputation? How can he be made righteous in Christ, but by having Christ's righteousness imputed to him?

If these arguments be well considered, they will, I hope, establish the doctrine of the text: for they clearly prove, that God hath appointed the Lord Jesus Christ to be the only righteousness of his people. He was made sin for them; their sins being laid upon him, as the sins of the children of Israel were laid upon the scape-goat. And he was made of God unto them righteousness, and their righteousness is in him, not an inherent, but an imputed righteousness, and received by faith, which submits to be justified by the righteousness of another, and rests with full trust and confidence upon it. This is the fundamental doctrine of Christianity; and the direct contrary is the fundamental doctrine of Popery.

At the reformation, the Lord raised up faithful witnesses to bear their testimony against that reigning heresy of the Papists which places merit in man's works; yea, such merit as to justify a sinner before God; yea, still greater merit; for they maintain that a man can do more than the moral law requires, and can perform works of supererogation, the merit of which may be imputed to another person; and yet, at the same time, they deny the imputation of Christ's merits. The first reformers preached boldly against those blasphemies; and that blessed servant of God, Luther, was bold indeed. He knew well the dangerous tendency of the doctrine of merit, and therefore he principally wrote and preached against it; and God gave him great success. A sinner made righteous by the righteousness of Christ, is, as he used to say, the doctrine upon which a church stands or falls. Upon it our church was established, and has long stood; but do we stand upon it now? Are we all champions for the Protestant doctrine, or are we in general departed from it? Alas! our enemies can tell, with triumph they tell, of the increase of the Popish interest among us. And why does it increase? Whence is it that they make so many converts? Is it not because our people are not well established in this Protestant doctrine? If it was taught and preached more, our churches would not be so empty as they are, nor the mass-houses so full. Many of our people know not what it is to be a Protestant, and therefore they become an easy prey to the Papists, who are so busy and successful in making converts, that they pretend they have on one Lord's day more communicants at the mass-house in Lincoln's Inn Fields than we have on the same day at all the churches in London. I fear this may be true; but is it not greatly alarming? and ought it not to stir up the Protestant clergy to try to put a stop to the spreading of Popery? But how can they do this more effectually than by laying the axe to the root, and striking at the doctrine of merit, which is the fundamental error of the Papists? Overthrow this, and Popery cannot stand. A man cannot be a Papist, who believes that his justifying righteousness is in Christ; and whoever does not believe this, is not a Protestant. May the Lord raise us up faithful and able men (for we greatly want them) to defend his righteousness against them who have established a meritorious righteousness of their own, and will not submit to the righteousness of God!

But, besides the Papists, we have other enemies to the doctrine in the text. The careless sinner treats it with great contempt; for he does not see its value, nor his own want of it, and therefore he lives easy and secure in the practice of sin. The scripture has revealed the wrath of heaven against all his unrighteousness, but he does not regard the revelation. The law brings him in guilty, and condemns him, but he gives himself no concern about the threatenings of the law. The gospel offers him mercy, and its ministers entreat him to accept of it; but he stops his ears. Neither the grace of the gospel, nor the terrors of the law, can prevail upon him. Although he has no righteousness of any kind, yet he lives as if he were in no danger. Oh deluded man! if thou didst but know thy state, thou wouldst cry earnestly to the Redeemer, and seek to be accepted in his righteousness. May he take pity upon thee, and send his good Spirit to convince thee of sin, and to convince thee of righteousness!

The formalist is another enemy to the doctrine in the text. He will not receive justification by imputed righteousness, but will have his own righteousness seated on the throne along with Christ. He falls into this great mistake from his ignorance of the perfect nature of God's law, which has made no provision for any failing, but for the very first passes sentence, "Cursed is every one who continueth not in ALL things," &c.; and since all have failed, consequently all are under the curse, and can never be justified by that law which has condemned them. And his mistake arises also from his ignorance of the gospel. He takes the gospel to be a proposal of terms and conditions, mitigating the rigour of the law; and so he makes Christ only a milder lawgiver than Moses, requiring not perfect but sincere obedience of his creatures: whereas Christ came to redeem us from the curse of the law, by obeying its precepts, and by suffering its penalties; and our righteousness comes to us from him as the fulfiller of the law, and is received by faith without any of our works or deservings.

If any of you, my brethren, have fallen into this mistake, weigh and consider attentively what has been before said upon the moral law, and upon the law of faith; and if you are not convinced, can you ask God to direct you in the right way? If you can, he has promised to give you wisdom; he will teach you the true doctrine, and will enable you to submit to the righteousness of God. But if you are convinced, are you waiting for the precious gift of faith, or have you received it? If you are waiting for it, remember whose gift it is. The Holy Spirit alone can work faith in your heart. It requires his power, even that almighty power, which raised up Jesus from the dead. The scripture ascribes to him the office of convincing sinners of Christ's righteousness, and of giving them faith to rest upon it for their justification. Look up to him for this blessing. Wait in his appointed ways, hoping for it. And when the Spirit shall be poured upon you from on high, then you will be justified by faith in Christ's righteousness, and the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness, and assurance for ever.

Happy are you, my Christian brethren, who have received the righteousness of faith, and knowing whom you have believed. Since Christ's righteousness is yours, bring forth its proper fruits, and show publicly that there is an inseparable connection between justifying faith and sanctifying grace. By justifying faith the believer is united to Christ, and receives life from him, as a graft does from the stock upon which it grows. By virtue of this union, Christ liveth in the believer, and enables him to put forth the proper acts of spiritual life, as the stock upon which the graft grows supplies it with sap and juices to put forth leaves, and blossom, and fruit. This is the certain effect of the abiding of a branch in the vine: it will bring forth fruit; and if any one fancy himself to be a believer, and neither brings forth, nor is seeking to bring forth, any fruit, he only deceives himself, and the truth is not in him; for whosoever has Christ for a Saviour, will have the Holy Spirit for a sanctifier, and will bring forth fruit to the glory of God.

See, then, my Christian brethren, that ye value and prize this righteousness, and give it its proper honour, both with your hearts and lives. While you are bringing forth its peaceable fruits, you will continually find the comforts of it. This righteousness is one of the pieces of Christian armour. It is called a breastplate; because it is the proper armour for the vital parts. Your life is always safe while you have your breastplate on; you need not fear the terror by night, nor the arrow that flieth by day. Let thousands fall, you are safe. You are defended from outward attacks: for although many be the afflictions of the righteous, yet the Lord delivereth him out of them all; and you are kept in inward peace: for the work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever. In time of sickness this righteousness will be a perpetual cordial. It will not suffer the heart to sink, although the body grows weak and faint; for this breastplate is not only proof against the pains of sickness, but also against the weapons of death. "Righteousness delivereth from death," Prov. xi. 4; not by keeping the justified person from dying, but by keeping him from the fear of the first, and from the power of the second death. The righteous man, armed with this invulnerable breastplate, can challenge all his enemies. Who shall separate me from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation or distress, or persecution, or death? Nay; clothed in the robe of Christ's righteousness, I shall not be afraid to go through the valley and shadow of death, nor yet to stand at the awful bar of God's infinite justice. Why should he fear to stand there to be tried? for who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God himself that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again for their justification; and in his righteousness they shall stand holy and unblamable and unreprovable before the judgment-seat of God.

Since these are some of the benefits of having on the breastplate of righteousness, let us, my Christian brethren, keep it always in use. Since we are fighting under the Captain of our salvation, let us be ever armed with his righteousness; and may we all wear it upon our breasts, that neither guilt within, nor troubles without, may ever separate us from the love of Christ Jesus our Lord; but may we, in life and death, find the blessedness of this armour, by its protecting us from the threatenings of the broken law, and from the vengeance of almighty justice; and may we, in time and in eternity, live to his glory, who humbled himself to be made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Grant this, holy Father, for the sake of thy dear Son, Jesus Christ! to whom, with thee and the Holy Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah, be honour and glory, and blessing and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

DISCOURSE VI.

UPON BEING RIGHTEOUS OVER-MUCH.

Be not righteous over-much.—Eccles vii. 16.

The generality of men think it a very easy matter to get into heaven. They have never tried in earnest to get in, and therefore they are not sensible of any difficulty. Scripture may speak contrary to their opinion, but they will not hear it. Plain matter of fact may be against them, but they will not regard it. They sit down easy and unconcerned about their eternal state, resolved to enjoy the present world, like the fool upon record, "Soul, take thine ease; eat, drink, and be merry;" live jovially at present. Give thyself no trouble about religion; and let not one thought of death disturb thee. It will be time enough to prepare for eternity at some future period. Thus they think and act. Nay, many have arrived at such an absolute indolence, that they are angry and provoked if any one tells them they are certainly in the wrong; and they will not bear it; no, not from their minister, whose office and duty it is to try to convince them of the necessity of striving to get into the kingdom of heaven. But if such careless creatures will not hear us, yet they ought to hear him who has the power of life and death, and who says, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be who go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth to life; and few there be that find it," Matt. vii. 13, 14.

As soon as these great numbers, who are going through the wide gate and in the broad way, see any of their acquaintance beginning to strive to enter in at the strait gate, and to walk in the narrow way, immediately they are offended, and they try to stop them with urging the authority of the text, "Be not righteous over-much." Why, say they, cannot you be content with the religion of your forefathers? You used to keep to your church, and you lived as good a life as any of your neighbours, and you were righteous enough; what occasion is there then for so many prayers, and sermons, and sacraments? Indeed you carry things too far; and if you do not stop in time, you will quite ruin your character.

This is their manner of talking to every man who is determined to save his soul. As soon as he begins to live differently from his neighbours, and refuses to join with them in their way of murdering their time, they mark him out for a precise, godly fellow. They think he makes more ado about religion than need be; and if, after many trials, they cannot laugh him out of his oddities, they heartily despise him for an over-righteous fool.

But if the same man should be convinced of the great change which Christianity ought to make in him; if he begin to talk of the necessity of the new birth, and of the Holy Spirit's beginning and carrying on a saving work of grace in his heart, without which no man is a Christian, but in name; then worldly men are thoroughly provoked: they cannot bear this enthusiastic stuff. But if he insist further upon the necessity of Christ's righteousness, without which no sinner can be accepted and justified before God, and that his righteousness is imputed to the sinner by faith only, without any previous good works; although it be productive of all good works; for they are all the fruits of righteousness; these seem to worldly men the wild notions of a distempered brain. If he prove these points, and enforce them from plain passages of scripture, they are ever ready to object, What! shall we not be accepted if we do all the good we can; if we do not harm any one, but pay every one his own, and keep strict to our church, and go to the sacrament, as often as we have time to prepare? Is not this being righteous enough? And although we fail sometimes, (as who does not?) yet is not God merciful, and will he not for Christ's sake forgive us? These worldly men know of no righteousness but what consists in outward duties, in a mere outside conformity to some parts of the law. They forget that the law is spiritual, reaching to the very thoughts of the heart; and perfect, allowing of no offence, nor offering a pardon for the least, but pronouncing him guilty who offendeth in one point, and under guilt he must lie for ever, as to any thing he can do, unless he be justified freely by grace through the righteousness of the Lord Christ. Whoever insists upon these things is sure to be reckoned in the number of the over-righteous, and will certainly have this caution given him—"Be not righteous over-much."

It is certain, then, that the meaning of the text is generally mistaken. Natural men fancy it commands them not to take too much pains about saving their souls, nor to be singularly religious, but to be content to live according to the course and fashion of the world. More than this, is being righteous overmuch. Besides, many serious persons do not understand the text, and therefore have not an answer ready for their adversaries, who are at every turn misapplying this scripture, and putting a wrong sense upon it. The doctrine which it teaches ought also to be frequently inculcated and enforced, being one of the fundamental articles of our most holy faith. For these reasons, I have determined to give the passage a particular consideration; and will endeavour to show,

First, Negatively, what the words do not mean;

Secondly, What is their positive and precise meaning; and

Thirdly, I shall bring some arguments to prove the doctrine contained in them. And while I am speaking to these points, may the Lord God open all your understandings clearly to see his mind and will in this scripture, and prepare your hearts to practise the duty which it enforces. May his good Spirit be with us for these gracious purposes, while I am

First, Showing what the words do not mean. They are generally understood in a wrong sense. People fancy they contain a caution against attaining too much of the righteousness which is of the law; whereas, that is impossible. A man cannot have too much legal righteousness. Let him keep the law always and perfectly in its spiritual nature, and in its full extent, yet he can be but righteous. He does not perform more than the law requires; he only pays it its just demands: for the love of God and the love of our neighbour comprehend the whole law. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. Now we cannot love God too much, nor yet our neighbour, since we are required to love him as ourselves; and therefore if we love God with all the heart and soul, and mind and strength, and our neighbour as ourselves, yet we only do our duty; we do no more than is commanded us, and consequently we are only righteous, but not righteous over-much. But

Secondly, The scripture declares, there is no man living who so perfectly loveth God and his neighbour, as to attain the righteousness which is of the law. All have sinned, and have thereby robbed God of that love, and his law of that service, which are their due; and all are therefore unrighteous. The Psalmist declares, Psal. liii. 1, "there is none that doeth good," which words the apostle cites in this manner, Rom. iii. 9, 10: "We have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin; as it is written, there is none righteous, no, not one." Now, since there is none so righteous, and much less more righteous, than the law requires, consequently, there can be none, no, not one, righteous over-much.

Thirdly, To this agree the words of our blessed Saviour, Luke xvii. 10: "When ye shall have done all these things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do." Who does all those things which are commanded him? Not one: for all have sinned. But supposing he did, yet he would be only as righteous as the law requires. He would not be righteous over-much, because he would only do that which was his duty to do.

A fourth argument may be taken from hence: That any man living can be over righteous, and do more than the law requires, is a Popish tenet, exploded by the whole Protestant church, and particularly by the church of England, in her 14th article.

"Of Works of Supererogation.—Voluntary works, besides over and above God's commandments, which they (the Papists) call works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety; for by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake, than of bounden duty is required; whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that are commanded to you, say, we are unprofitable servants." This article condemns the general interpretation put upon the text, and declares that it cannot be maintained without arrogancy and impiety. To these arguments I will here add a Fifth, Taken from the character given in this verse, of the men who would be over righteous, namely, that they thereby destroy themselves; the righteousness which they are seeking will bring upon them destruction. "Be not righteous over-much: Why shouldest thou destroy thyself?" This single circumstance will help us to determine what kind of righteousness it cannot be: for it cannot be the righteousness of the law. This promises life to him that keeps it—"Do this and thou shalt live," and therefore this cannot be a destroying righteousness. Indeed, if after a man has broken the law, he afterwards turns to it for righteousness, and hopes, by his keeping of it, to be made righteous, then he will destroy himself; because the law promises life only to perfect obedience, and threatens to put them, who offend in one point, under the curse: for he that offendeth in one point is guilty of all. This indeed is a destroying righteousness opposite to which is the righteousness of the gospel. It is to save sinners from being destroyed by the law. It was wrought out for them by the God man, Christ Jesus, and is imputed unto them by faith; and when they with the heart believe in it, they are then saved from destruction. Of this saving righteousness it is impossible a man should have too much. He must have all that is needful for his justification, and more than he needs he cannot have. He wants righteousness in an infinite degree, such as none can give him but the Lord our righteousness; and without this he cannot be saved.

It is evident, then, that the text speaks of a righteousness, to which if a man trust, it will destroy him; which cannot be the righteousness of the law; for this promises life to them who keep it; nor yet the righteousness of the gospel; for this promises pardon and life to them who have broken the law, but believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God. And since it is neither the righteousness of the law, nor of the gospel, I come now, under my second general head, to consider what is the positive precise meaning of the text, and what is the false pretended righteousness of which it treats.

The context may lead us to the true meaning. In what sense a man is commanded not to be righteous over-much, may appear from the following words, "Neither make thyself over-wise." How can a man be over-wise? Certainly he cannot know too much. Knowledge is part of the image of God in the soul, as the apostle teaches: "The new man is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him," Col. iii. 10. A man cannot be too wise; but he may think and speak of his own wisdom more highly than he ought; and that is making himself over-wise. In like manner, righteousness is part of the image of God in the soul, Eph. iv. 24: "And that they put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness." A man cannot possibly be over righteous; he cannot do more than the law requires; but he may think and speak of his fancied righteousness more highly than he ought; and that is making himself over righteous. It is supposing him to be what he is not, which is self-righteousness. In this sense Theodore Beza, one of the great lights of the reformation, understood the passage; for, in his note upon it, he says, "Boast not too much of thine own righteousness and wisdom." He supposed a man's boasting of his righteousness was making himself righteous over-much; and this is really the case. A man cannot possibly have too much righteousness; but he may fancy himself to be righteous when he is not; and if he speak and act according to his own fancy, then he is one of the over righteous. And Secondly, The true sense of the word agrees with the context. Strictly rendered, they read thus, "Be not thou a great self-justifier;" the original word, which is translated righteous, is in the conjugation Hiphil, which in the Hebrew tongue signifies to make righteous, or to justify; and being here used personally, it stands for a justifier; one who would make himself righteous; and he does it to excess; he justifies himself over-much, pretending to a greater righteousness than he has. This is the meaning of the text, "Be not thou a great self-justifier:" for there is not a righteous man upon earth who doeth good and sinneth not, and consequently there is not one man upon earth righteous enough, much less righteous over-much, except in his own proud conceit. And against this self-righteousness the text cautions us, advising us not to think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think. But, granting this to be the meaning of the text, some will say, What necessity was there for this caution? My answer to this is a

Third argument, by which the meaning of the words may be settled. It was always necessary to give men this caution, because no man can be righteous over-much; and yet men have always been trying to make themselves so. It is impossible to do more than the law requires, and it is impossible for fallen man to do all that it requires, and yet his pride puts him upon trying impossibilities. There is a self-righteous spirit in him, which leads him to hope he can, by his keeping of the law, attain to such a righteousness as God will accept, and for it justify him. This appears from the history of the Jews in the Old Testament. Moses often dissuades them from the opinion of their own righteousness; and the prophets enlarge upon this particular. The book of Job treats entirely of it, being professedly to show that no man can be justified before God by any righteousness of his own. Job insists upon it, in his debate with his three friends, that his life and conversation had been such, that he could maintain his own ways before God. "Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity; for till I die, I will not remove mine integrity from me. My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go; my heart shall not reproach me so long as I live. I am clean, without transgression; I am innocent; neither is there iniquity in me." But he soon changed his opinion after Elihu had found a right indictment against him, and charged him with having said that he was righteous, and should be found so, if God were to weigh him in an even balance. Elihu's arguments brought down and humbled his proud self-righteous spirit, and he confessed, "I have uttered what I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not. Behold, I am vile; I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." The Lord God knew the temper of the Jews, and that they would be always leaning to self-righteousness, and therefore he left this book upon record, to silence all the pleas which they should ever make for the sufficiency of their works towards their justification at his bar. How necessary this book was, we may see clearly from the great degree to which a self-righteous spirit prevailed in our Lord's time; for then the pharisees, and all that made a great show of religion, knew of no righteousness but what they could attain by their own works, and not so much by the works of the moral as of the ceremonial law. They supposed the observance of the ceremonies to be meritorious, and hoped to be made righteous by keeping them strictly. In consequence of this opinion, the learned doctors, rabbies, and scribes, introduced a vast number of traditions, and thought that by keeping them with the ceremonies, they should be holier than others; and they condemned our Lord, because he would not practise the traditions of the elders, but opposed them, and said that they had made the law of God of none effect by their traditions; they had made the moral law of none effect, because they thought to atone for their offences against it, by keeping the ceremonial law, which also they rendered of none effect, because it was instituted to point out the Messiah, who was to make an atonement for the sins committed against the moral law. Our Lord often preached against the scribes and pharisees, and he never spake such sharp words against any sorts of sinners as against them; for he says, they were farther from the kingdom of God than publicans and harlots. In all his ministry, he never made such a severe discourse as in the 23rd chapter of St. Matthew, where he is exposing the errors of the scribes and pharisees, and, notwithstanding their many long prayers, and alms, and fastings, and pains to make proselytes, and frequent washings, and many other such-like things, which they thought made them righteous, yet he says to them, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" How necessary, then, was the caution in the text to such persons, who thought themselves righteous, and despised others: and is it not still necessary for those who are seeking righteousness by the works of the law? How many thousands and tens of thousands are there now in the world, Protestants as well as Papists, who place righteousness in duties, in living up to the law as near as they can, in keeping clear of gross sins, in going to church, and in hearing and reading the scripture; and if they do all this, they then think themselves safe. But there are some more strict than these, who enjoin themselves a round of duties, set forms of prayers and times of fasting, and give many alms, and never miss the sacrament once a month, and perhaps have some family worship; upon which account they think themselves very good, and can thank God that they are not like other men. If any minister dare attack this false righteousness, they cry out against him as the pharisees did against Christ. If he tell them that he does not speak against what they do, but against the motives upon which they act, not against the thing done, but against the end they propose in doing it, this provokes them more; because it tends to lay open the rottenness of their hearts, which being not cleansed from sin, all their outward and pretended righteousness is only like painting a sepulchre, or washing the outside of a cup, while there is left within all manner of uncleanness.

Since, then, a self-righteous spirit has prevailed, and still prevails in the world, the wise man's caution has been, and is still necessary. He calls to persons of this temper, who are seeking righteousness by the works of the law, and says to them, Why will ye try to justify yourselves by your duties? You are attempting an impossibility; for the law requires absolutely perfect obedience, which you have not paid. You have sinned and you are none of you righteous, no, not one. There is not a righteous man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not, and consequently there is not one who has that unsinning righteousness which the law demands, and without which none can be justified by it. Trust not, then, to your imperfect obedience. It can only destroy you; but seek a better righteousness, even the righteousness of God.

If these arguments be carefully considered, they will, I hope, lead you to the true meaning of the text. The wise man is not speaking against the righteousness of the moral law, nor against the righteousness of the law of faith; but he is dissuading sinners from seeking righteousness by the works of that law which they have broken, and which condemns them. But, trusting to this false righteousness, they must inevitably be destroyed; for it is the righteousness of a sinner, which is a contradiction in terms. It is an unrighteous righteousness: the law knows nothing of it. The righteousness of the law consists in perfect obedience; and one single failing renders the sinner, ever after, absolutely incapable of being made righteous by his keeping the law. This is the doctrine of the text, which, because of the great opposition made to it, I proceed to defend under my third general head. And I will only mention two arguments:

the first taken from the righteousness of the law, and the second from the righteousness of the gospel.

The righteousness of the law consists in paying it its due; and that is unsinning obedience. Whoever is legally righteous, must keep the law in its most perfect degree, not offending even in a single thought. He must continue to do all things always and perfectly, as the law requires; and then it will pronounce him righteous, and give him the promised life. But who is thus righteous? Not one: for all have sinned. And how, then, can any one be righteous overmuch? So far from it, no one can be righteous at all by his keeping the law, after he has once broken it; because it immediately brings him in guilty, and condemns him. Having offended in one point, he has thereby lost his claim to the righteousness of the law, as much as if he had offended in all; and therefore he cannot be made righteous by the deeds of that law, which has passed sentence upon him, and given him up into the hands of justice, to suffer the first and second death. While he lies in this miserable helpless state, he can no more do any act which is good and valid in law than a malefactor can under sentence of death; and yet he is so proud as to fancy that he can merit heaven by his dead works. Poor vain creature! he is so full of self as to think he can do all that the law requires, although he has broken it, and although he can do nothing but sin, until he be pardoned and believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God: for whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. What great numbers are there amongst us of this self-righteous spirit; who, because they are somewhat stricter in their lives than others, and are more constant attenders upon ordinances, therefore state to themselves, and expect you should give them place according to their own fancied rank of merit! They are still proclaiming, as the pharisees used to do, Make way there; stand by; I am holier than thou. Against this mock-righteousness the text is levelled. The design of it is to strip the self-righteous of all their borrowed plumes, and to convince them that, after they have broken the law, they cannot be made righteous by a partial keeping of it. The wise man would lead them to consider what the moral law is; how far short they come of the obedience it requires; and how imperfect, yea sinful, their works and duties are. And thus he would convince them of their want of a better righteousness than their own. The Jews were exceedingly prone to trust to their own righteousness, and therefore he tried to beat them off from any reliance upon it. When our Lord came, he found them under the influence of the same self-righteous spirit; and in all his preaching he spake with great sharpness against the pretended righteousness of the scribes and pharisees. We have still men of the same spirit among us, whose righteousness does not exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, and yet they hope to enter into the kingdom of heaven. To all such persons the wise man directs his advice, and counsels them not to trust to their works and duties for a righteousness in which they may be justified before God—"Be not ye great self-justifiers. Why will ye destroy yourselves?" Your false righteousness will destroy you if you venture to put your trial upon it at God's bar; for he has already decreed that, since all have sinned, therefore by the deeds of the broken law shall no flesh be justified in his sight.

It is certain, then, that the text does not speak against the righteousness of the law, nor yet, secondly, against the righteousness of faith. The law of God is as holy, just, and good as he is, and cannot pass by the least sin. It has made no provision for a pardon, nor given any promise to repentance or to amendment, but requires absolutely perfect unsinning obedience; and upon the first offence it puts the sinners under the curse, and leaves him in the hands of justice to inflict upon him the threatened and deserved punishment. In this state the gospel finds him, and offers him the righteousness of the Lord Christ; but the proud sinner will not submit to be justified by it, until the Holy Spirit preach the law to his conscience, and convince him of its holy, spiritual, and perfect nature, upon which he feels guilt, conscience accuses and condemns him, and he sees no righteousness in his fancied good works to rely upon, but finds he must go out of himself for a righteousness, in which he may appear before God. Then the Holy Spirit convinces him of Christ's righteousness, how infinitely perfect it is, and how safely he may trust to it, and gives him faith to apprehend it, and to apply it to himself for his justification. And then he no longer goes about to establish his own righteousness, but submits to the righteousness of God. Against this the wise man cannot caution us. We all want it; and over-much of it we cannot have. It is the righteousness of God, as perfect as God is, and the divine Person, who wrought it out by his obedience and sufferings, humbled himself to be made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Believers are not only righteous in him, but righteousness, and that the righteousness of God too, against which law and justice cannot make any exception; therefore of this righteousness, though not of their own, may they boast all the day long. The merits of it are their justification; the fruits of it are their sanctification: and when they come to heaven, this righteousness will be their everlasting robe of glory; and to sing his praises, who clothed them with it, will be their employment and happiness for ever and ever. Surely, then, the wise man's caution in the text was not levelled against this all-perfect and glorious righteousness? No. He knew the inestimable value of it, and intended to recommend it by detecting that false righteousness, upon which sinners are apt to rest, and see not their want of a better. This was his design, which having proved and established by several arguments, I shall only add two or three practical observations upon what has been said.

This greatly mistaken text is, I hope, now set right, and the meaning of it is made plain and clear. The wise man did not intend to speak against the righteousness of the law, nor against the righteousness of faith, but against a false righteousness, which was then, and is still, in the world. How many are there, who, after they have broken the law, think of being justified by keeping it better, and hope to make themselves very good, and righteous enough by their works and duties? To every such person the wise man says, "Be not thou a great self-justifier. Why shouldst thou destroy thyself?" But very few will take his advice. There is a generation of men, proud, and self-righteous, who think their own works can recommend them to God. Although they have sinned, yet they fancy that duties can atone for sins. The Jews were much addicted to this error, and the apocryphal books are full of it. In our Lord's time we find the religious among the Jews placing righteousness in works. Our modern pharisees copy exactly after them, and refuse to attend to the wise man's caution in the text. These over righteous ones make a saviour of their duties, and hope to merit heaven by their works; and yet, alas! their works are but few, and these very imperfect. Their righteousness is chiefly negative, consisting in doing no harm, in not murdering, or stealing, or getting drunk, or breaking the commandments, outwardly. Then they are what you call very good sort of people. But if they keep close to their church, and go to prayers on Wednesdays and Fridays, and on a saint's day, if they have nothing else to do; and will not play at cards, or go to the play-house on Saturday night before the sacrament, although they have no objection against going on Monday after they received it; oh, these are your mighty good people indeed! Who are righteous, if they are not? But if they go to the sacrament once a month, and use the new week's preparation, and follow it strictly; or if they miss any of the prayers through an engagement in the evening, they will be sure to say them all the next morning; and if they have some new book of devotion, out of which they say their formal task, morning and evening, like the stupid Papists gabbling over the bead-roll of their Ave-Marias and Paternosters; these are our great saints. Who shall go to heaven, if they do not? These, like their predecessors of old, think themselves righteous, and despise others. Their pride deceives them, and hinders them from submitting to the righteousness of God. They are too proud to submit. The knowledge of the law and the knowledge of themselves would humble them. But they are so ignorant of the law, as to believe that by doing some of its duties they shall be made righteous enough; and they are so ignorant of the plague of their own hearts, as to see no necessity for an inward change. They cannot be persuaded but they have very good hearts, and therefore they have no reason to pray with the Psalmist, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." Without this clean heart and right spirit, they have only the form and outside of Christians. The life and power is wanting; and Christ may say to them, as he did to the church of Sardis, "I know thy works, that thou hast a name; that thou livest, and art dead."

But if this be the case, some will be apt to say, Why need we do any good works, if they be not meritorious? Why need we to go to church, and pray, and hear and read the word, and go to the sacrament, and do good, if all this be no part of our righteousness before God? It certainly is not: "for by grace are ye saved," says the apostle, "through faith: not of works, lest any man should boast." And to this doctrine the whole Protestant church subscribes, and all the Papists deny it. The reformers were called Protestants, because they protested chiefly against this blasphemous tenet of Popery; namely, that works merit towards a sinner's justification before God. This is the grand distinction between us and the Papists, and yet, alas! this distinction is wearing out. What great numbers have we among us, who trust to their own fancied good works for acceptance with God? In this point, and it is a very leading one, they are perfectly agreed with the Papists. They are both great self-justifiers, having at least equal, if not superior, merit to Christ in the matter of their justification. Hear the form of monkish absolution, in which the doctrine of merit is thus taught;—"God forgive thee, my brother, the merit of the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the blessed saint Mary, always a virgin, and of all the saints, the merit of thine order, the strictness of thy religion, the humility of thy confession, and contrition of thy heart, the good works which thou hast done and shalt do for the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, be unto thee available for the remission of thy sins, the increase of desert and grace, and the reward of everlasting life. Amen."

What a deal of self-wrought stuff is here; the merit of which, instead of the merit of Christ alone, is said to be available for the remission of sins! And is it not the same with our half-Papist Protestants? Are there not multitudes of them who think that the merit of their church-going, and the strictness of their lives, and the merit of their prayers and alms, and other good works, will justify them before God, or, if they dare not trust wholly to them, yet they hope Christ will supply what is in them deficient? But this is mixing grace and works, which the scripture will not allow to stand together: for if works, wholly or in part, merit our justification, then there would be room for boasting, which God, in his way of justifying sinners by the righteousness of Christ, has absolutely excluded, that no flesh might glory in his presence; Christ being made of God unto sinners all that they want; even wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and eternal redemption; that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

Since, then, Christ has made an atonement for sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness, why will you glory in yourselves, rather than glory in the Lord? Why will you trust in your own fancied righteousness, since nothing but pride could tempt you to glory in it? Your ignorance of Christ's righteousness hinders your seeing how infinitely perfect it is; and your own self-sufficiency will not let you submit to be saved by it; and therefore you go about to establish your own righteousness. You may work for a time upon this plan, and think yourselves safe; you may lull conscience asleep, and deceive yourselves, and deceive others with your fair outside; but the cheat cannot last long: God sees your hearts, and the corruption in them is naked and open to him, although you study to hide it from yourselves. He has declared of you, although you will not believe him, that you are not righteous: for there is none righteous in himself; no, not one. This is his sovereign decree. Oh that your consciences may submit to it, and seek for a righteousness which God will accept at his bar! Dreadful will be the time, if you appear there without a complete and infinitely perfect righteousness. Such there is in Christ, and in none else; and it is offered freely, even to you, ye self-righteous pharisees. You may receive the free gift of his righteousness, if you will renounce your own. And what is your own? What merit can there be in these duties which are done out of pride, done in sin, and done in opposition to the word of God? If you can reject all dependence upon these, the gospel offers to you freely the righteousness of God for your justification. Oh, that he may dispose you to accept of it, that, being justified by faith, you may have peace with God through Jesus Christ our Lord, and may live in the comfortable sense and enjoyment of this peace, until you receive a crown of righteousness, which fadeth not away! Grant this, holy Father, for the all-perfect righteousness' sake of thy beloved Son, Jesus Christ! to whom, with thee and the Holy Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah, be equal praise, and glory, and dominion, and power, in time and in eternity. Amen and Amen.

DISCOURSE VII.

UPON THE RIGHT KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment. And the second is like, namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.—Mark xii. 28—31.

Our blessed Saviour had been disputing with the chief priests, and elders, and the scribes; and, after he had silenced them, they left him and went their way. But they departed with enraged and malicious hearts, determined to take the first opportunity to destroy him; and they sent certain of the pharisees and of the Herodians to catch him in his words. These hypocrites pretended to believe him to be a faithful teacher of the way of God, and to come to him with no other view than to desire his opinion upon a very difficult case; namely, Whether it was lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not? Our Lord solved this difficult question in a manner that astonished his very adversaries; for he, knowing their wicked hearts, said unto them, Why tempt ye me? Bring me a penny. And when they had brought it, he said, Whose image and superscription is this upon it? And they answered, Cæsar's. Then, said he, Render therefore to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. As soon as he had silenced them, certain of the sadducees came with a case out of the law, which they thought he was not able to solve; but he presently showed them, that their error arose from their ignorance of scripture; and he put them to silence. While he was confuting them with the authority of Moses, the pharisees were gathered together against him, and one of them, being a scribe, learned in the law, having heard him reasoning with the chief priests, then with the Herodians, and afterwards with the sadducees, and perceiving that he had answered them well, was willing to try him with a question out of the law. The scribe asked him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God, &c. And the scribe said unto him, Well, master, thou hast said the truth; for there is one God, and there is none other but he; and to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices. And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durst ask him any question.

In this passage we have the sum and substance of vital and practical religion. The first and greatest commandment is the love of God, arising from the right knowledge of his essence and personality; and the second is like unto it; namely, the love of our neighbour, founded upon the true love of God. There is none other commandment greater than these; for upon these two hang all the law and the prophets: and since these two are the greatest, they therefore deserve our greatest attention. Our Lord demands it of us in the text. What he enjoins for the two greatest commandments we ought to esteem such, and to study them most, and to practise them best. To that end, let us consider them carefully; and may his good Spirit open our understandings to comprehend them and dispose our hearts to love them, and give us grace and strength to practise them agreeably to his holy will!

The first commandment consists of two parts—the knowledge of God, and the love of God. The true knowledge of God is contained in these words: Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord. And the nature and degree of love to God is thus described: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind, soul, and strength. I shall confine myself at present to the first of these particulars, purposing, through divine assistance, to explain and enforce what is laid down in the text concerning the true knowledge of God, reserving the other parts of the text for some future opportunity.

The first and chief point in our religious inquiries is, to discover what God is. This is the fundamental article, upon which all the rest depend. We must know the nature and personality of God before we can serve and love him; and therefore our blessed Saviour very properly places the knowledge of God before the love of him. We cannot love what we know nothing of. Ignorance of God cannot possibly beget love of him. If there be very dark and confused ideas of him in the understanding, there cannot be much true love of him in the heart: for which reason the text determines and fixes the proper object of worship before it requires the love and service which is to be paid him. Our Lord begins with the knowledge of the true God, and does not purpose any thing new upon this point, but goes to the law and to the testimony. He cites a passage from Deut. vi. 4, in which the divine essence and personality are clearly stated: "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord." This is a command to the whole Israel of God, whether Jews or Gentiles, to hearken to what the Lord God says concerning himself. He calls to them, and requires them to hear him: "Hear, O Israel!" by which means it becomes a matter of duty; and we are indispensably bound to attend to this revelation of his will. He has not left us at liberty to think what we please about his essence and his personality, because he has revealed what we are to believe about both. And it was necessary he should do this, because there is no religion without a God, and no true religion without the true God. How should we know what religious service to perform, if we were ignorant of the proper object of worship? It being absolutely necessary that we should know God, the knowledge of him is therefore revealed, and settled, in the first part of the greatest commandment. We are not left to reasoning about the being of God from the light of nature, or from philosophy or metaphysics; but the scripture has fixed our creed, and we must abide by it; otherwise we cannot keep the following parts of the text: we cannot love God and our neighbour aright, unless we first know what God is. Since this is a material point in our present inquiry, and not thoroughly understood, I will endeavour to prove the necessity of settling the proper object of worship, before the worship due to him can be paid. It is very certain, there can be no salvation without belief in God. An atheist cannot be saved. He that cometh to God must believe that he is; but the atheist denies his very being, denies that God is, and thereby withdraws all allegiance from him. Now, if a man cannot be saved without believing in God, consequently he cannot be saved without believing in the true God; for a false God is no God at all; it is a mere idol, a nothing in the world. Whoever pays his service and worship to this false god, is an idolater, and guilty of high treason against the supreme majesty of heaven. If any of you, who owe your allegiance to King George, were to go to Rome and pay it to the pretender; in what light would the law consider your proceeding? Would not it try you for a capital offence, and, if found guilty, would not it deprive you of your fortune and life? The law of the most high God treats those who withdraw their allegiance from him in the same manner, having already passed sentence upon them, and decreed that idolaters shall not inherit the kingdom of Christ, and of God.

Since then the true object of worship must first be known before we can worship him aright, how are we to come to the knowledge of him? This is the next step in our present inquiry. And who shall determine this point for us? What authority shall we abide by? Shall scripture or reason decide? If scripture be judge, its determination is clear. What words can be plainer than these are? "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? No. It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea," Job xi. 7, 8, 9; entirely out of the reach of our faculties. The reason of this is assigned in Matt. xi. 27: "No man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him:" no man, therefore, be he ever so wise and learned, knoweth God the Father, but by the revelation of his Son. And to this agree the words of the apostle, 1 Cor. i. 21: "The world by wisdom knew not God." The world by such wisdom, as it could attain, was not able to discover the true God.

If these testimonies of holy writ be not suffered to determine the point, it is not because they are of doubtful interpretation (for words cannot speak plainer), but because you would have the matter tried before some other judge. Well, then, let us hear what reason says: but we will not hearken to its proud boastings of what it can discover: we will examine matter of fact, and inquire what it has discovered. Did reason ever find out God? and did any reasoners ever find out the almighty to perfection? Who were the men? When, where, did they live? In the refined and enlightened ages of Greece? Tell us, ye disputers of this world, did your Aristotle, or any of his followers, with their subtle reasoning, attain to the knowledge of God? It is an undoubted truth, that they did not. And did any of the other Greek philosophers succeed better in their inquiries? No; not one of them. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and fell into gross idolatry along with the ignorant vulgar: for they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and to four-footed beasts, and creeping things. But if the Greeks failed, did not the learned Romans find out God? No; not one of them ever discovered what God was. The Roman philosophers, aided and assisted with all the discoveries of the Greeks, yet remained as ignorant of God as they had been. Tully has left us a curious treatise upon the nature of the gods, in which he has demonstrated the apostle's proposition, that the world by wisdom knew not God; for in this volume there is not a conjecture or a hint about the nature of the true God. After the fruitless inquiries of such a genius, I need not bring any other arguments to prove that the Romans, with all their learning and refinement, knew not God. Their reason was not equal to the task. And where shall we find greater reasoners? Did any man ever make a better use of his reasoning faculties than Tully? And yet, with all his searching, he could not find out God. In these instances we see the utmost stretch of reason, and what it can discover. Indeed, it boasts great things, and pretends, by the help of metaphysics, to discover the secrets of the spiritual world; but these are vain boastings. Matter of fact disproves them: for there was not one reasoner in Greece or Rome who discovered the true God. These men came the nearest to the truth, who erected an altar to the unknown God; by which they held forth and exposed the weakness of human reason, since, in one of the most famous universities of the heathen world, the philosophers worshipped an unknown God. How weak and groundless, then, are the boastings of our modern unbelievers, who pretend to discover what God is by the mere dint of reason! What have our Arians and deists discovered of him? Do they know more of God than the philosophers did? No. They have indeed greater helps, but by rejecting them their pride is greater, and their ignorance appears more manifest; for they have left revelation, and have invented to themselves as empty an idol as any heathen philosopher ever worshipped. They rejected the Godhead of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit, and have imagined to themselves a god existing in one person, infinitely extended, filling infinite space, and many other such like chimerical attributes. And this idol, this nothing in the world, is become the fashionable divinity of our times: but its worshippers are all traitors: every act of worship paid to this idol is high treason: for, by such act, men withdraw their allegiance from the true God, and pay it to what has no more divinity than stocks and stones. And ought not the servants of the most high God kindly to admonish their fellow-creatures of their guilt, when they see them seduced by this dangerous heresy? And if the watchmen give them not warning, will they not be partakers with them in their sins? If we hold our peace, they will perish; but their blood will God require at our hands. So that, as well for the sake of our own souls, as of theirs, we ought to speak plainly upon this subject, and bring it to a matter of self-examination. Let each of us put these questions to himself:—Is it so, then, that there can be no true worship or love of God, unless it be paid to the true God? Have I, then, the right object of worship for my God? How was I brought to the knowledge of him? for this is the best way to discover the certainty of what, I think, I know of him. Did I find him out by the light of reason? And did metaphysics help me to find him out to perfection? If I have taken this method, I have been deceiving myself; for the world by its reason never found out God. Or was I brought to the knowledge of him in this way? Was I convinced of sin, and humbled under the sense of it? and did I then find myself fallen from God, and alienated from the life of God, so that I had no means of discovering his nature and perfections, but as revealed by his word and by his Spirit? Did I read the word, and pray for the Holy Spirit to open and to explain it, that I might come to the knowledge of the only true God and of Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent? And am I still in this humble, teachable frame of mind, reading the word, and praying for the teachings of the Spirit of God?—If this be your case, happy are ye. God has promised, and his word cannot be broken. Ask and ye shall have. Ask and ye shall have this great promise of the new covenant fulfilled to you, Jer. xxxi. 34: "And they shall no more teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, saith the Lord." He will teach you the knowledge of himself, and will manifest to you his essence and his personality. You shall know him as he has been pleased to reveal himself in the text, of which we have the whole of what is contained in the sacred volume; for here he declares what his essence is; he is one Jehovah; and what the persons in this one Jehovah are; they are Alehim. Jehovah our Alehim is one Jehovah. This proposition is one of the deep things of God, which he hath revealed unto us by his Spirit, and which contains more than can be written in many volumes. Each word has a rich copiousness, and explains to us many treasures of divine truth. May that Lord and God, in whom are laid up all the riches of grace and knowledge, open them to you at this time, that you may understand the will and mind of the Lord in his great and glorious name Jehovah.

The word translated Lord, is, in the original, Jehovah; which signifies a manner of existence peculiar and proper to the most high God. He is the only self-existent essence. All other beings owe their existence to his will and pleasure, and depend on him for life and breath, and all things; but he exists by a necessity of nature, and this necessary existence is the meaning of the word Jehovah. We cannot fully comprehend the idea conveyed by this word, because we are not acquainted with the manner of necessary existence. The wisest man upon earth cannot describe in what manner any material object exists; for the atoms, of which bodies are composed, fall not under the observation of our senses. We know that gold differs from water; but we are ignorant of their constituent particles, which make them differ, so that we confessedly know not the manner of their existence; and the plain reason is, gold and water do exist in a different manner, but our senses cannot discover how their particles or atoms differ. And since we know not the manner of the existence of the material bodies with which ourselves are conversant, how absurd would it be for any man to pretend to know the manner of the existence of a spiritual being! How presumptuous, then, would it be for any man to undertake to describe how Jehovah exists, and rashly to affirm that he exists in a manner which excludes all personality, while this very man does not know the manner of the existence of any one thing in the world. And yet every little philosopher, who has but just learned to reason upon the objects which are within his reach, pretends to reason about the nature and attributes of God; and every minute infidel undertakes to prove by metaphysics, and one of them, more proud and ignorant than the rest, thought he could prove à priori, that Jehovah exists in one person, although Jehovah himself declares he does not. If these men would attend to the meaning of the name Jehovah, it might correct some of their mistakes. It signifies necessary existence. Now, from whence shall we form a perfect idea of this word? We have no idea but from our senses, and there is no object within the reach of our senses, which exists by a necessity of nature. All these Jehovah had formed and made; consequently they can only give us ideas of dependent existence. There is but one Jehovah, the text says, and he exists in a manner, of which no other thing can give us a perfect idea; and therefore we can have no reason to reject the account which God has given us of the manner of his existence; but if we act consistently, we must receive and abide by the revealed account, which teaches us that Jehovah is the self-existent essence, and that this essence is one—one Jehovah; but the Alehim, the persons in Jehovah, are three. There was no doubt in those ancient times about the personality: the scripture guards most the unity of the essence; and, while it affirms the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit to be of the self-existent essence, it, at the same time, teaches us that these three are one—one in essence, but three in persons.

The personality in Jehovah is described in the text by the word Alehim, which is in the plural number, and acknowledged to be so by the Jews as well as Christians; and if they had not owned it, yet the sense of the passage would lead us to seek for a plural interpretation, because there was no need for a revelation to teach us that Jehovah, our one Alehim, is one Jehovah, which is no more than that one is one. But the word Alehim being plural, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, being Alehim, it was necessary to reveal to us the unity of the essence, and to teach us that these three persons were one Jehovah, and therefore, being of the self-existent essence, none is before or after other; none is greater or less than another; but the whole three persons are coeternal together, and coequal. Each of the persons is Jehovah. The Father is Jehovah, as we read Isa. lxiv. 8: "But now, O Jehovah, thou art our Father." The Son is Jehovah, Isa. xlv. 21. "Who hath declared this from ancient time? Have not I Jehovah? and there is no god else beside me; a just God and a Saviour:" here the Son, our Saviour, is called Jehovah. And the Holy Spirit is Jehovah, Isaiah xi. 2: "The Spirit Jehovah shall rest upon him, the Spirit of wisdom and understanding," &c.

Each of the persons is called Alehim. The Father is so called, 1 Chron. xxix. 10: "And David said, Blessed be thou Jehovah, Alehim of Israel, our Father, for ever and ever." The Son is Alehim, Isaiah xlv. 21: "There is no Alehim else beside me; a just God and a Saviour." The Holy Spirit is Alehim, Exodus xxxi. 3: "I have filled Bezaleel with the Spirit Alehim," not of the Alehim; the Hebrew is with the Spirit Alehim; so that the Spirit is the Alehim. These scriptures confirm the doctrine of the text; namely, that Jehovah is one, and that, in the unity of Jehovah, there are three Alehim; which word does not signify their manner of existence. Jehovah denotes that; but it is a relative word, descriptive of the gracious offices of the eternal three in the economy of man's redemption. And neither the personality expressed by its being plural, nor its meaning, are retained by our translators in the singular word God. God is no more the sense of Alehim, than goodness is. And if the translators could not find a proper word in our language, they should have given a definition of it in the first place they met with it in the Bible, and then have retained the Hebrew name ever afterwards. By their neglect, our people are kept in ignorance of this gracious name, under which Jehovah would have himself to be known. It belongs to the covenant of grace, and is descriptive of the acts and offices of the eternal three in the glorious plan of man's salvation, and it signifies the binding act of the covenant—the obligation entered into upon oath to fulfil it. This is the sense of Aleh, the root from whence Alehim is derived; and there is no other root from whence it can be derived without offering great violence to the established rules of the Hebrew tongue. The oath of God is often mentioned in scripture, and the people's entering into it is beautifully described, Deut. xxix. 10, 11, 12: "Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord your God; your captains of your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with all the men of Israel, your little ones, your wives, and thy stranger that is in thy camp, from the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water; that thou shouldest enter into covenant with the Lord thy God, and into his oath." God is here said to have made an oath, emphatically styled his oath, because it was the oath of the covenant from whence the name Alehim is taken.

If you ask, when was this covenant made by oath, and by whom, and for what end? The scripture answers those points very clearly.

The covenant was made before the world began, as Titus i. 2: "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began." Was not this promise the oath of the covenant? What else could it be? God, who cannot lie, promised before the world began, and foreordained, as 1 Peter i. 20, that Christ should be the Lamb, who should take away sin by the sacrifice of himself. This was foreordained by an eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord, Eph. iii. 11. What is called, in the scripture, the purpose, promise, and foreordination of God, was the covenant of grace which was made before the world began; yea, by an eternal purpose, and from which the divine persons who confirmed this covenant by an oath are called Alehim; and as the covenant was made before the world began, they therefore took their name from it, and are described by it, before the creation, in the first chapter of Genesis. They had done some act before, from which this name was taken. Now it signifies to confirm any thing by oath; therefore they had confirmed something by oath before the world began; and what it was these scriptures determine, which speak of the purpose, counsel, promise, and foreordination of God made before all worlds, to bring many sons unto glory by Jesus Christ. This was the design of the purpose, counsel, &c., and the persons who designed this are the three in Jehovah: for each of them is called Jehovah, and each of them is called Alehim, because each person in Jehovah had a distinct office in the economy of the covenant. The Father undertook to demand full satisfaction for sin; therefore he is called a jealous God and a consuming fire. Christ undertook to pay this satisfaction, and is therefore called God the Saviour; and the Holy Spirit covenanted to apply and to render effectual the benefit of Christ's satisfaction to believers, and therefore his constant name is Spirit, which word signifies the air that we breathe, on which our animal life depends, as our spiritual life does on his inspiration. Now, since the divine persons have entered into a covenant, and do sustain those distinct offices in it, and since our salvation depends upon the knowledge of these truths, was it not an act of infinite love and condescension for the divine persons in Jehovah to take the gracious name of Alehim, and to reveal themselves to us, as persons bound by the obligation of an oath to carry the covenant of grace into execution?

If you ask, what necessity there was for this oath? It was necessary only on our parts, and it was an act of astonishing mercy, and will demand our everlasting tribute of praise, that God would vouchsafe to give convinced sinners such encouragement to hope for mercy, as to bind himself by two immutable things to save them. The apostle, Heb. vi. 16, 17, 18, thus speaks of this wonderful instance of God's love: "An oath for confirmation is among men an end of all strife; wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us." In this scripture the apostle describes the counsel, or the covenant of God to save sinners; and this was confirmed by an oath; and the reason of the oath was for the sake of the heirs of promise, that they might have two immutable things to rest their faith upon; namely, the immutable counsel and the immutable oath of God; and these ought to silence all doubts in the heirs of promise, because it is impossible that either of them should be broken.

These authorities may suffice to determine the meaning of the divine name Alehim. It is expressive of the personality in Jehovah, and denotes what the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the three Alehim, have covenanted upon oath to do for the salvation of sinners. Alehim signifies the Trinity in covenant, and particularly expresses the oath, which was the binding act of the covenant, and thereby it denotes the most merciful relation in which divine love could manifest itself; a relation productive of the richest blessings of time and of eternity. Jehovah is a name of majesty and greatness. Alehim is a name of grace and mercy. Jehovah expresses the self-existence of the Godhead, and the infinite difference between his manner of existing and that of his dependent creatures; and after they had sinned, it was to them a name of terror: whereas Alehim expresses nothing but tender love and abundant mercy to returning sinners: for the covenant was made for such, and it was confirmed by an oath, that they might place their whole trust and confidence on what the Trinity had covenanted to do for them and for their salvation: for the Father, although he be the avenger of sin, yet has been satisfied with the obedience and sufferings of his coequal and coeternal Son, and will be satisfied with all those who submit to be saved by his righteousness; and the Holy Spirit will influence them to accept the righteousness of God for their justification, and he will work mightily in them to enable them to bring forth the fruits of righteousness, until he bring them safe to glory.—These are the mercies promised in the covenant of grace, and expressed by the divine name Alehim. How greatly, then, should this name encourage convinced sinners to come and ask the covenant mercies? And what strong consolation does it give them, when they flee for refuge to Jesus Christ, and to lay hold of the hope set before them in him?

From what has been said, it appears that the first part of the commandment, relating to God, is the right knowledge of him; and what we are required to believe concerning his essence and personality is described in these words: "Hear, O Israel; Jehovah our Alehim is one Jehovah." Jehovah, the self-existent essence, who is our Alehim, our Trinity, bound by the oath of the covenant to save sinners, these three in covenant, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are not before nor after other, greater or less than another, but they are of one and the same self-existent essence; these three are one Jehovah; the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity are one Jehovah.

This, my brethren, is the doctrine of the text, which the Lord God himself calls upon you to hear: "Hear, O Israel." And have you heard him? Have you received his account of the divine essence and personality? If not, why do you reject it? Is not his command a law? and are you not bound to believe what the Lord has revealed concerning himself?

Perhaps you think the revealed account is not established upon sufficient authority. This point does not come under consideration at present. We are only treating of the doctrine; and what can you object against it, as it has been now stated? Why, say some, I still think, after all that you have said, the doctrine is inconsistent; for you are forced to maintain that three are one. Nay, we maintain no such contradiction; for the Trinity is not three and one in the same respect, but three in person and one in essence. The air, which is reduced to atoms in the action of fire, and the light which comes from it, and the gross spirit of the air which feeds the fire—these three conditions of the air are one in essence; and is it any contradiction to say, these three are one? No, surely. Just so we speak of the essence as one, and of the persons in it as three.

Supposing this to be a good illustration of the doctrine, yet still we cannot receive it, say some, because it is unintelligible. What is unintelligible? The proposition itself is plain: in the self-existent essence there are three persons. You cannot object to the difficulty of the terms, or of your forming a clear idea of what they convey. But you cannot conceive how there can be three persons in one essence. And is this the cause of your unbelief? If you will not believe the doctrine of the Trinity until you comprehend the manner of the divine existence, consider how absurdly you act: for do you know how a spirit exists? No. And yet you believe the existence of an immortal spirit within you. Can you comprehend how an infinite Spirit exists? No. You know not how your own spirit exists; and yet, while you are confessedly ignorant of a finite object, you pretend to be so well acquainted with the mode and manner of existence of an infinite Spirit, as to reject what is revealed in scripture concerning it. Whether this be not acting an absurd part, I leave it to yourselves to judge.

But still you cannot think the scripture doctrine of the Trinity is rational if you go to try it by reason, you forget that the world by reason knew not God.

It did not know him formerly in the learned ages of Greece and Rome. And if then, this enlightened age has discovered how Jehovah exists, let our reasoning infidels demonstrate that he exists in such a manner as absolutely excludes all personality. But this they cannot demonstrate; they know they cannot; and yet they pretend the scripture doctrine of the Trinity is not rational, although they have no reason against it; no good reason, however; none that they dare publicly own. The cause of their unbelief must be ascribed chiefly to their sins. While they live in wilful sin, they cannot know God, because their minds are in total blindness, and will continue so, as long as they continue alienated from the life of God. They must be convinced of sin, and humbled under the sense of it, and sue for mercy, and receive it, and then they will know the blessed Trinity is Jehovah: for no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him by the teaching of his good Spirit. May he, who has the residue of the Spirit, send him to take away ignorance from all unbelievers, hardness of heart and contempt of his word, that they may be converted, and believe to the saving of their souls.

But, besides these more open deniers of the doctrine, we have several of our own people who attend upon the ordinances of the church, and yet are ignorant of this fundamental doctrine. For their sakes we ought to insist upon it, and to explain it as taught in scripture, and in the liturgy of our church, with which the state of the doctrine, as now laid down, is perfectly consistent. The first of the thirty-nine articles treats of faith in the Holy Trinity, and says that in the unity of the Godhead there be three persons of one substance, power, and eternity—the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: and the proper preface in the communion service for Trinity Sunday is more clear and determinate. "It is very meet and right that we should give thanks to thee, who art one God, one Lord; not one only person, but three persons in one substance; for that which we believe of the glory of the Father, the same we believe of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, without ANY DIFFERENCE or INEQUALITY." These are the testimonies of our church, and they are very full in confirmation of the doctrine which you have now heard. Consider them carefully, my brethren, and beg of God to enlighten your understandings with the knowledge of the truth. Oh that he may manifest it so clearly as that you may know the Father to be your reconciled Father, the Son to be your Almighty Saviour, and the Holy Spirit to be your counsellor and comforter, your strengthener and sanctifier unto the end!

Happy are they who thus know God, or rather are known of God. You, my Christian brethren, enjoy this happiness; for you know in whom you have believed. By faith you have come to God, believing that he is Jehovah, the self-existent essence, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek the mercies of the covenant, which was made by the blessed three in Jehovah, and which is expressed by the gracious name Alehim. You know Jehovah your Alehim, and thus you keep the first part of the great commandment of all—Hear, O Israel; Jehovah our Alehim is one Jehovah. You believe in and worship Jehovah, one in essence and three in person. You are thankful for what is revealed concerning the personality and the merciful offices sustained by the divine persons in the covenant of grace. With your lips and with your lives you are ready to show forth the thankfulness of your hearts, and to follow me to the next part of my text, which treats of the love of Jehovah Alehim. But this I must reserve for the subject of another discourse, only desiring you at present to look up to that Lord and God of whom we have been speaking, and to beseech him to render useful what has been said to all of us. Oh that he would enable us all to make use of the words of our church upon the occasion, and with the prayer of faith to say, Almighty and everlasting God, who has given unto us, thy servants, grace by the confession of a true faith to acknowledge the glory of the eternal Trinity, and in the power of the divine majesty to worship the Unity; we beseech thee, that thou wouldest keep us steadfast in this faith, and evermore defend us from all adversities, who livest and reignest one God, world without end. Amen.

DISCOURSE VIII.

UPON THE RIGHT LOVE OF THE LORD GOD.

And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him, Which is the first commandment of all. And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment; and the second is like; namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.—Mark xii. 28—31.

Our blessed Saviour has delivered, in these words, four very important truths.

First, He teaches us the right knowledge of the Lord God.

Secondly, The right love of him.

Thirdly, The right love of our neighbour, arising from the right love of God; and Fourthly, The greatness of these commandments: there is none other commandment greater than these.

The first of these particulars has been already treated of. It is contained in these words: Hear, O Israel; Jehovah, our Alehim, is one Jehovah. There are three that have entered into covenant in heaven—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; and these three are one—three persons of one essence. This is the revealed account; and this, my brethren, you are bound to receive, if you believe in God: for if you withdraw your allegiance from the three persons in one Jehovah, and pay it to an absolute God existing in one person, you are as guilty of idolatry as if you had twenty thousand gods. This is the case of every deist, who, by rejecting the scripture doctrine of the Trinity in unity, is in as bad a state as the atheist: for what is the difference between him who has no God, and him who has a false God? They are both without the true God in the world, both traitors against the majesty of Jehovah, and both have turned away their ears from hearing his laws. He has commanded them to believe in him as Jehovah Alehim, but they refuse to believe in him. The atheist says there is no Jehovah, and the fool upon record, the deist, hath said in his heart, there are no Alehim; and how, then, can they escape his vengeance, since he has threatened, that they who only forget him shall be punished in everlasting fire? "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God." The crime is small to forget God, compared to theirs who deny his very being, or who refuse to worship him as the true God. In either case, they are guilty of high treason; for the Lord God calls upon them to hearken to him. He is about to deliver the first and great commandment, and he requires his people to attend and to receive the law from his mouth—Hear, O Israel! Israel signifies all the people of God, in whatever age or country they live, whether they be Jews or Gentiles. "Hear, O Israel; Jehovah, our Alehim, is one Jehovah." Jehovah is but one; but Alehim is plural, more than one; namely, the three in covenant—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—who took this name because the covenant was confirmed by an oath for the sake of the heirs of promise, that they might have two immutable things to rest their faith upon. The right knowledge of God, then, consists in believing, that in Jehovah, the self-existent essence, there are three coequal and coeternal persons, between whom there is no difference or inequality but what is made by the covenant of grace. Their names, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are not descriptive of their nature, but of their offices: they are not to teach us in what manner they exist in Jehovah; but they are covenant names, belonging to the offices which the divine persons sustain in the covenant. The scripture does not use these names to teach us how the divine persons exist, but how they act; how they stand related to the heirs of promise, and not what they are in themselves, as persons in Jehovah. This is a truth of great importance, which I have endeavoured to defend, both from the pulpit and from the press; and particularly in a printed discourse upon the self-existence of Jesus Christ. The true object of worship then, to whom our obedience and love are due, is Jehovah Alehim, according to what is said in the Creed: "the unity in Trinity and the Trinity in unity is to be worshipped." And is this, my brethren, the object of your worship? Do you pay your allegiance to a God in one person, or to Jehovah in Trinity? If you have not been determined to worship Jehovah Alehim, but have broken this first part of the great commandment of all, you cannot keep the other parts; for the love of God depends upon the knowledge of God. How should you love the true God until you know him? But if you know him as he has been pleased to reveal himself to us in the text, as three persons in one essence, and are desirous of paying him that tribute of love which he requires, then you will gladly follow me to my second general head; namely, to the consideration of the right love of the Lord God. And may he be present with us, while we are treating of his love! Oh that he would send his good Spirit to stir up longings in their hearts, who have as yet no desire to love the Lord God; to shed his love abroad in their hearts, who are hungering and thirsting for it; and may both speaker and hearers find their love to God increase from what shall be said upon these words: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." In discoursing upon which I shall

First, Show the nature of the love here commanded.

Secondly, I shall consider whether all men keep this commandment.

Thirdly, If they do not, in what way the gospel directs us to attain the love of God; and then, in order to stir us up to attain it, I will lay before you, Fourthly, Some of the exceeding great and precious promises to them who love God.

First, The text treats of our love to the Lord God, requiring our love to arise from the knowledge of him. When the understanding perceives what he is, the heart ought to receive him for its chiefest good. As Jehovah, he is the fountain of all good; he is the self-existent essence, through whose power and goodness all other beings exist, and therefore to him they all owe their tribute of love and obedience. As Jehovah Alehim, the Trinity in covenant, he has engaged to bestow upon his redeemed people every grace and every blessing which they stand in need of in time and in eternity, and on this account he has an undoubted claim to their allegiance. When they view him in this light, their hearts should be determined to love him; and when they partake of the graces and blessings of the covenant, they ought to love him out of gratitude. The debt of gratitude is so immense, that they can never repay it, and therefore they are the more obliged to make every possible acknowledgment of their thankfulness. They ought to love Jehovah their Alehim with all their heart, with all their soul, with all their mind, and with all their strength: and yet, when they do love him in this perfect manner, they can only acknowledge the debt; for they leave it still unpaid; and it will be for ever unpaid, as to any return in kind that they can make. They can only love (and what less can they do than love?) the Lord their God, for his infinitely rich blessings; and this love he demands. As Jehovah, he has a right to demand it of all his creatures; and as Alehim he may claim it of every one who partakes of the benefits of the covenant. They ought to love him

"With all the heart." The heart is the seat of affection: all the affections belong to the heart; and the Lord God here claims them all: they are all to centre in him. He is to reign sole monarch of the heart; and the affections are to be his willing subjects, loving him above all things, and in all things. Whatever any of them desire as good, they are to desire it out of love to God; and they are not to give any object a place in their esteem, unless their love to it be a proof of their love and obedience to God. My son, says he, give me thy heart,—all thy heart,—and let me have no rival to share in thy affections. And as he thus demands the love of the immortal spirit within us, so does he, in the next words, claim the affections of the human frame: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God "With all thy soul." The Hebrew word, here rendered soul, does not signify the immaterial and immortal spirit, but is generally used in scripture for the parts concerned in carrying on the circulation of the blood, and in which the appetites of the human frame are placed. These are to be regulated by the love of God, and they are all to be used in his service. The heart, being the commanding and ruling faculty, ought to influence them at all times to act upon a principle of love to their infinitely kind Creator and Benefactor. Every desire and craving, every instinct and passion of the animal faculties, should be brought into such a cheerful subjection to the Lord God, that to do his will should be their delight. There should not be a motion or stirring of desire in any of the appetites but what took its rise from love; for all the soul, the whole human frame, was to be governed and influenced by the perfect love of God. There should not be a desire in any one instinct or appetite but what sprang from divine love; and when carried into act, and gratified, it ought to be invariably directed by the same principle. And the Lord God not only demands the service of all the affections of the immortal spirit, and of all the appetites of the human frame, but the text goes on to claim the service of all the rational faculties; for that is the sense of the Greek word, which is rendered

"With all thy mind." It denotes that power of the mind whereby it deduces one thing from another: it is what the logicians call discursus, or the art of reasoning. The mind having before received ideas by simple apprehension, and formed a judgment of them, is then enabled to reason upon them; and this faculty of reasoning is here meant: so that every thing which the mind can reason upon ought to lead it up to God, and to increase its love to God. Reason, with all its powers, should be under the influence of divine love. And thus the Lord God expects us to keep the first and great commandment: he requires all the affections of body, soul, and spirit, and all the reasoning faculties to be invariably fixed upon him; and he would not only have them to be influenced by his love, but he would also have each of them to exert his whole strength in manifesting their love in him:

"And with all thy strength." The love of God must be perfect in kind, in degree, in duration. Whatever strength there is in man, divine love should have the command of it, and the continual use of it. All the powers of soul and body, and of all their faculties, should be directed in every thought, and word, and work, by the love of God; and there should be no abating of their vigour in any respect; but they should be continually carried out with their whole strength into grateful acts of love and obedience.

This is the nature of the love required in the text; and it is required by the Lord God, to whom we are all under infinite obligations, and whom we are bound, by innumerable ties, to love with all the affections of the immortal spirit, and of the human frame, with all our reasoning faculties, and with all our strength. This is the first and great commandment; and whoever keeps it in this perfect manner, fulfils the law of the first table. He cannot have any other God as an object of love or worship, neither can he set up any false worship, nor dishonour the divine name, by taking it in vain, nor forget the time appointed for enjoying communion with his God. How can he break any of these commands while the love of God reigns in his heart and commands all his affections? But if he breaks any one of them, does he not thereby withdraw his love and service from God? And if this be done only once, he has not kept the first and great commandment, but is become a transgressor of the law, and liable to suffer the punishment due to his transgression.

Here, then, there arises an important question, in which you are all nearly concerned; and every one of you should ask his own heart, Have I kept this first and great commandment? The Lord God has an undoubted right to this tribute of perfect love: have I paid it him? Whether you have or not shall be now inquired under my Second general head:—and it was proposed to consider, whether all men kept this commandment.

Let us examine these two faithful witnesses upon the point—scripture and matter of fact; and by their concurrent testimony let the truth be established. Look around you, my brethren, and see what men's affections appear to be most set upon. What are they coveting with all their hearts, wishing for with all their souls, and pursuing with all their strength, and in the enjoyment of what do they account themselves happy? Is God in all their thoughts? Is he the chief object of their love, and the great end of all their pursuits? Is gratitude to him the ruling principle of their lives? and do they think themselves most happy when they love him most and serve him best? A very little acquaintance with mankind will soon convince you that God does not reign in their hearts, although his hands have made them and fashioned them, and their life and breath, and all things come from his bounty, and the use of them depends upon his good pleasure. They have forgotten all his benefits, and turned traitor to their sovereign Lord. They have taken up arms, and have entered into rebellion against his lawful government. They have enlisted freely in the service of sin, to fight under the banner of Satan. Their love to sin has drawn them into this unnatural rebellion, and their strong attachment to its pleasures has made them reject the happiness which God offers them. While they are at war with him, he publishes an act of grace, and out of his infinite mercy declares his willingness to forgive them, if they will throw down their arms: but they refuse to receive his free pardon, being not only lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, but also such desperate lovers of pleasure, that they are haters of God. They hate him for denying them the sweet enjoyment of their beloved sins; and they hate him the more for threatening to punish them. And this hatred shows itself openly by their hating his will, his ordinances, his people; yea, by their hating every thing that God loves.

Well might the prophet say, Lord, what is man? What is he indeed! What a most wonderful creature is he, that he should not be afraid to fight against the Almighty, and that he should dare to hate an infinitely perfect God! Oh, surely he is fallen! fallen greatly from his higher state, since he is such a monster of ingratitude as to hate his best friend and benefactor, even the God who gave him those very faculties of body and soul, and who continues the use of them, although he makes them the instruments and weapons of rebellion, and with them opposes God's lawful sovereignty over him.

But, perhaps, some will ask, What! are all men haters of God? Yes; in their natural state every one of them hates him: and this may be demonstrated from their love of what God hates. All have sinned; and what can tempt them all to sin, but the love of it? All men love the world, and place their affections upon the things of it: how could this be, if their hearts were placed upon God, and their affections upon the things of God? If they loved the God of infinite purity, they could not at the same time love the world that lieth in wickedness; because this is setting up their will in opposition to his holy will, in which all enmity consists. "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." These two kinds of love cannot be in the same heart; they are at irreconcilable enmity; and yet the love of the world is in the hearts of all natural men: they are turned from the love of God to the love of evil. The heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. So says our ninth article: "Fallen man is of his own nature inclined to evil;" his inclinations are turned from the love of God to the love of evil; yea, so entirely turned, that the imaginations of the thoughts of his heart are not set upon God, but are set upon evil, and that continually. And this love of evil is deeply rooted in the very nature and frame of man, and has gotten such entire possession of him, that it has made him hate God. This hatred chiefly shows itself by its opposition to the will of God, which is, in fact, opposition to, and hatred of, the person of God; according to what is written by the prophet: "Ye that love the Lord, hate evil," Psalm xcvii. 10. To which agree the words of our Lord, "If ye love me, keep my commandments;" show your love to me by your love and obedience to my will. Does any natural man show his love in this way? No. His heart is in another interest. He hates the commandments of God; therefore he hates God. There appears a settled fixed hatred in him to the divine ordinances. How little does he read or know of the word of God! Many large volumes he has perused, many novels and play-books he has treasured up in his memory; but the sacred volume, in which God has revealed all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, is neglected. How many are there of us who never read the Bible through in our lives! whereas, if we loved God, we should certainly read the sweet volume of his grace and love with care and diligence, and should be meditating in it day and night. No reading would be so pleasant, as none would be more improving: but the devil's book is far more perused than God's. We hear of very few parties that meet together to read the scriptures: thank God, there are some! but thousands meet together in this city every evening to study the devil's book. How can these persons love the Lord God with all their hearts, since they hate his revealed will, and can spend three or four, or more, hours every day at a most stupid diversion, and at which God is not in all their thoughts? And as the natural man hates the word, so he hates prayer: it is a vast burden to him. If you propose to him to be of a party, who are going to spend an hour this evening in prayer, you will soon see he has no relish to the duty. He will try to get himself excused, if he can; and if he cannot, it will be to him a most miserable, long, dull hour; and he will be very glad when it is over. The reason is, he has no communion with God, and therefore does not love to converse with him. The things of time and sense please him more than the things of God; yea, so much more, as to render tedious and hateful all the exercises and ordinances of religion. The very table of the Lord is not pleasant to him. God has been pleased to prepare a rich feast for his people; but the natural man has no appetite for it. He has no faith to live upon Christ's broken body, and blood shed; and therefore, perhaps, never was at the Lord's table in his life, unless for some prudential reasons, to please some relations, or to qualify for some good place. And as to the Lord's house, he never goes there but out of form and custom. If he is to see some favourite new play or entertainment, he goes with very exalted spirits to the devil's house; but coming to church is a burden; and when he is there, the service is quite tiresome. He wishes it was over, and the dull sermon was ended. The Lord's day has nothing pleasing to engage his heart. It breaks in upon his business and pleasures, and is the most stupid day in the whole week. If he be a polite man, and of a plentiful fortune, he will show how wearied he is with the divine appointment of this portion of time, by his manner of spending it. The day being got over as well as he can, in visiting and company, he thinks the evening may be spent at an innocent game of cards, or at a concert of music. Can these people love God, who thus demonstrate their enmity to his will and to his ordinances? And if any one reprove them, they will soon express their enmity against him, and will make him feel it too, if they have it in their power. How dwelleth the love of God in such persons? Can love beget hatred? If you love any person, will you do every thing which you know he hates? Certainly this is the way in which hatred shows itself; and therefore, since all men love sin, which God hateth, and love the world and the pleasures and enjoyments of it, and neglect and hate the divine ordinances, it is evident that the love of God is not in them.

This may be the case of the baser sort of men, some may say, but not of the more civilized and polite. Yes, it is the case of all alike. Human learning does not bring men to the knowledge of God, nor politeness to the love of him. What people were more learned and polite than the Romans? and yet they were "haters of God," Rom. i. 30. They had attained to the highest refinement of classical learning, and nevertheless they continued to hate the true God. They were very polite and civilized in their manners to one another, but in their religion no nation was ever more rude and barbarous. Their city was full of idols, and yet they were without God in the world; for his person they rejected by their idolatry, and his most adorable attributes and perfections they hated.

But some may ask, Is there no difference between us, who are born in a Christian country, and others, who have no knowledge of Christ? No; none but what is made by grace. You have many outward privileges in a Christian country; but you do not therefore partake of the love of God; because you partake of these privileges. Is not this matter of fact? Is there not as much love of the world, of riches, pleasures, and honours among nominal Christians, as among Jews or heathens? For in what does a nominal Christian differ from a heathen, but in name? He has, indeed, some outward privileges, but these cannot of themselves change the inward frame and temper of his mind; because they operate, not mechanically or physically, but by the divine influence upon them; and where this is not present, although Paul should plant, and Apollos should water, yet there would be no increase either of the knowledge or of the love of God.

Does this state of the case offend you, my brethren, because it gives you such mean ideas of human nature? Nay, be not offended at what scripture plainly teaches, and experience demonstrates. Rather search your own hearts, and see whether there be not in you a settled hatred of God. If you examine yourselves by the rule laid down in the text, and if conscience does its duty, you will own yourselves to be guilty of the breach of the first and great commandment. But whether you own it or not, it is an infallible truth. As certainly as God hates sin, so certainly does the unpardoned sinner hate God: for he that loves sin cannot love God. While he hates the mind and will of God, how can he possibly love the person of God? And such haters of God have we all been. We have all loved sin, which is direct enmity against his sovereign will. We have all committed sin, which is open rebellion against his government. Could we have acted in this manner if the love of God had been perfected in us? No, surely. The love of God would never have led us to break his holy laws, to insult his authority, and to provoke his justice; for hereby the wrath of God abideth upon us; and did we indeed love him, how could we bear to be under his wrath, or how could we think of its abiding upon us for ever and ever? These are undoubted proofs of our having failed in our love to God. We have all broken the first and great commandment, and are thereby become transgressors of the law. We are all subject to the pains and penalties threatened to transgression, and are unable to do any thing to deliver ourselves. This is our guilty and helpless state. My brethren, are you convinced of it? This conviction is absolutely necessary: for you can never be brought to love God until you have been made thoroughly sensible that by nature you were haters of God. When the Holy Spirit begins to turn your hearts from sin to righteousness, the first step he takes is to convince you of your former hatred to God and to his will. Under a sense of this, he humbles you, and makes you pray to God for the discovery of his love. Finding yourselves miserable without it, you will earnestly ask it of him who has it to give. But these points come now in order to be considered under my Third head—Under which I purposed to explain in what way the gospel directs us to attain the love of God. One great design of Christianity was to reform our love, by bringing it back to its proper object, and by fixing it there. By sin we had withdrawn our hearts from God, and placed them upon the things of time and sense; whereby we had not only fallen into a state of guilt, but if we had continued in it, we could not have been happy, no, not in heaven, because we cannot be happy in what we hate. Our hatred would turn heaven itself into a place of torment. Christianity was the gracious contrivance of God, by which we might be brought to love what would make us really and eternally happy; and this it does by raising our affections from the love of the creature to the love of God. It begins this work by convincing us that we have failed in all the duties of the first table, and have broken the great commandment of love, which includes them all. He that is never convinced of this will never see his want of divine love, and therefore will never ask it. Have you, then, been convinced, my brethren, from what has been said, that in your natural state you neither do love God, nor can love him by any means in your own power? If you are not convinced, what I am going to offer will be of no service to you; because it is in vain to show you how to attain the love of God, if you see not the necessity of attaining it. May the God of love himself convince you of this necessity, and help you to follow me with profit in this consideration of the several steps by which the gospel directs sinners to the love of God, and these are three. The First, Is a lively sense and conviction of their want of the love of God;

Secondly, A clear discovery of what Christ did to manifest the love of the Father, and to reconcile sinners to him; and,

Thirdly, The work of the Holy Spirit in bringing them to the knowledge and experience of the love of God.

The first step towards the attainment of divine love, is a lively sense of the want of it. The Holy Spirit convinces the sinner of his guilt for having withdrawn his love and obedience from the Lord God, and for having thereby robbed him of his due honour and service. The sinner upon this feels what it is to have provoked an almighty God, and in his guilty conscience he has fearful apprehensions of God's anger, and of abiding under his wrath. He finds he should have grovelled on in the sinful love of the creature, if the Holy Spirit had not thus convinced him of his guilt, and made him feel his misery. He now sees he has broken all the first table, and is become a transgressor of the law, and therefore is stirred up in earnest to seek for the sense of God's pardoning love.

This is the Lord's way, in which he brings him to know himself and to experience the emptiness of all creature love; and thus he puts him upon seeking happiness in God. My brethren, have you been made sensible of your want of it? and are you seeking it in him? If you are, you have great reason to be thankful; for you have already some tokens of his love. He has put it into your hearts to seek his favour. May he draw you by the cords of his love until you have a clear discovery of what Christ did to manifest the love of the Father, and to reconcile sinners to him; which is the second step towards the attainment of divine love.

We could never have attained it by any means in our own power, and no mere creature could have attained it for us; because, before the Father would manifest his love to us, he would have all the demands of his law and justice fully answered. While the broken law stood out against us, and justice was concerned to see its pains and penalties inflicted, we could have no peace with God. But Christ undertook the work of reconciliation, by doing all that his law required, and by suffering all that his justice demanded, and thereby making a full atonement for our sins. The law he fully satisfied by his infinitely perfect obedience; for by it he magnified the law, and made it honourable, insomuch, that "by the obedience of one, many shall be made righteous," to make them righteous before God, otherwise Christ obeyed in vain. Justice he fully satisfied by his infinitely meritorious sufferings. It was decreed, that without shedding of blood there should be no remission; but it was not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should obtain remission; wherefore, when he cometh into the world, he saith to his Father, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me. In burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure; then said I, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God, by making myself an offering for sin. This was the Father's will. He accepted the sufferings of the just for the unjust; and when the holy Lamb, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, he was an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour. The Father is well pleased with him, and is also well pleased with them, who have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins. For the prophet, speaking of them, says, Psalm lxxxv. 2, 3, "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people; thou hast covered all their sin. Selah. Thou hast taken away all thy wrath; thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine anger." This is the character of God in Christ. His wrath is turned away from his people. For what reason? Are they not sinners even as others? Yes; but he is well pleased with them for Christ's righteousness' sake, through whom he has forgiven their iniquity, and has covered all their sin.

When the sinner, convinced of his want of divine love, is thus satisfied that Christ has paid the full price to obtain it, having answered all the demands of law and justice, and that sinners may now be brought nigh to a reconciled Father, and may taste and see how gracious he is, then he waits for this blessing, which is the gift of the Holy Spirit. It is his work and office to bring convinced sinners to the knowledge and experience of the love of God: and this is the third particular I was to treat of.

The Holy Spirit directs the hearts of awakened and convinced sinners to the love of God in this way and method. He makes them sensible of their wants, and then shows them where they have a supply. He gives them evidence to believe the all-sufficiency of Christ, whose obedience and sufferings were divine and infinitely meritorious, and made a full and perfect satisfaction for sin. God the Father accepted them as such; and, since his justice was well pleased and satisfied with them, the sinner thinks he may be satisfied with them also: for as there is no objection against them in the court of heaven, so there ought to be none in the court of his conscience. Then the Holy Spirit enables him to put forth an act of faith, and to rely upon Christ as a tried foundation. He casts himself upon Christ's power to save, believing him to be Jehovah, the Lord God Almighty; and, hearing and reading the gracious promises of Christ's readiness to save all that come to him, he sees there is no reason for him to doubt either of Christ's power, or of Christ's love, to fulfil his promises: upon which he is enabled thus to address the Lord Christ:

O almighty and most merciful Saviour, in whom the Father is reconciled to returning sinners; thou hast the residue of the Spirit with thee, by whom they may be reconciled to God: I bless thee, I praise thee, and glorify thee, for the inestimable gift of thy good Spirit, by whom I have been enabled to rest upon thy promises, and to rely upon thy faithfulness to fulfil them, even to me, a miserable, helpless sinner. O Lord, strengthen my faith by the grace of the same Spirit; that it may work by love, but having still more clear evidence of the Father's being reconciled to me, I may love him with all my heart and with all my soul.

With such actings of faith in prayer, God is well pleased; for they are the breathings of his own Spirit in the believer's heart; and he will answer them. He strengthens faith, and increases love, according to what is written, Rom. v. 5: "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." The Holy Spirit is given to the believer, to bear witness with his Spirit that he is a child of God: and when the word of God and the Spirit of God thus bear their joint testimony to his being beloved of the Father for Christ's sake, then he is rooted and grounded in love, and is disposed, and mightily strengthened in the inner man, to perform every work and labour of love.

Thus the gospel represents the whole Trinity as concerned in directing the sinner's heart into the love of God. The Father forgives all his offences through the atonement of his beloved Son, who did and suffered all that was required by law and justice; and the Holy Spirit disposes the sinner to be reconciled to God, and to believe in his word; and then gives them faith to apply the promises to himself, and to love God, who first loved him. Our love to him arises from the evidence we have of his love to us; for without this evidence an awakened sinner cannot love God. While he looks upon God as the just avenger of his sins, it is impossible that he should love him; and so long as guilt remains in his conscience, he cannot but fear and dread the justice of the Almighty, and these terrors will entirely shut out all love; for it is against nature to love pain: and how, then, can the awakened sinner love that offended God, who is to inflict it upon him? He cannot love him, until he has some sense of God's pardoning love, and of his interest in the covenant of grace. The text declares this truth: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," thy covenant God, not an absolute God, such as the deists worship, but a God related to thee in the covenant of grace. Thy God is a relative term, implying the relation which God stood in to the believer, and which is here expressed by the word Alehim—thy Alehim. The Trinity, bound in covenant to redeem man, are thine, and stand related to thee in all their covenant offices: the Father is thy Father, the Son is thy Saviour, the Holy Spirit is thy counsellor, guide, sanctifier, and strengthener: all the graces and blessings of the covenant are thine, in time and eternity; therefore thou shalt love Jehovah thy Aleheim for these inestimable mercies, with all thy heart and mind, and soul and strength.

My brethren, is this your experience? You were once haters of God: have you been brought to love him, and do you know him to be your reconciled Father? The gospel has revealed no other way of attaining his love, but seeking it through Christ, and receiving it by the grace of his Spirit. Have you, then, sought and received it in this way? If you have, you will gladly follow me to my

Fourth general head; which was to treat of the promises made to them who loved God. These promises are exceeding great, and exceeding precious, containing every covenant-blessing of grace and glory. The Lord has engaged to preserve them that love him, Psalm cxlv. 20, and to keep covenant and mercy with them that love him, Deut. vii. 9; yea, they that love the Lord shall be like the sun, when he goeth forth in his might, Judges v. 31; nothing shall stop their course; afflictions, sickness, temptations, all manner of trials, shall help them forward; for all things shall work together for good to them that love God, Rom. viii. 28. But it is impossible to describe the great things which God hath prepared for them that love him. If a man love me, says Christ, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come and make our abode with him, John xiv. 23. This fellowship with the Father and the Son, by the bond of the Spirit, is the greatest happiness which can be enjoyed, next to the crown of life, which God hath promised to them who love him, James i. 12, and who shall be for ever happy in the enjoyment of his love. Are not these promises exceeding great and precious? And on whom, my brethren, can you place your affections, who has any such promises to make you? Can the world bid so high for your hearts? Are its pleasures worthy to be compared with the pleasures laid up at God's right hand for evermore? Are its honours and riches like the honour and riches which come from God? What can sin offer you—what can Satan purpose—what can the flesh covet—that can be put in competition with the blessedness which God has promised to them who love him? If they promise more than God, they are liars; and if you trust them, you will be deceived. But God's promises are like himself, unchangeable. He is faithful and just to fulfil them; and he does fulfil them daily: his people are witnesses for him: they declare, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord hath promised in his word to them that love him. All are come to pass unto them, and not one thing hath failed thereof. Oh, that you were all his witnesses, and knew the happiness of his love! May he shed it abroad in all your hearts for his mercies' sake, and enrich you with the blessings of his love in time and in eternity!

Having considered the nature of the first and great commandment, it behoves us to apply what has been spoken, and make it useful to ourselves. My brethren, have you found any use in it? Are your hearts placed upon the Lord God? Is he the reigning object of your affections? How were you brought to love him? Did you ever find yourselves miserable because you were at enmity with him? And did you seek the Father's love through Christ, as the effect of his obedience and sufferings, hoping that the Father was your Father for the righteousness' sake of his beloved Son? And did you continue in this way, seeking, until you received the faith which worketh by love? If this be your experience, bless God for this unspeakable gift. It becometh you well to be thankful. Praise him with your lips. Praise him with your lives, and give him every testimony of your love, which he requires; especially give him your hearts, and let him reign in them. There let Christ set up his kingdom, and by his sovereign power subdue your enemies and his; for, when Christ dwells in your hearts by faith, ye shall then be rooted and grounded in love, and shall be strengthened with might in the inner man to do his will, and to suffer it. Then your constant language will be, Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall any trouble, because painful? Shall any temptation, because strong? Shall any duty, because hard? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us.

Are there any of you, my brethren, who are not thus rejoicing in the love of God, but are wishing and desiring to be in this happy state? From whence arise your desires? Do they come from the conviction of your sin and misery? Do you feel the enmity of your wills, and the rebellion of your hearts against God? and do you therefore wish that, although you are now enemies, yet you may be reconciled to God by the death of his Son? Have not you been trying to do something in part to make a reconciliation with God? And what was the event? Have not all your attempts failed? and have not you been brought to see the insufficiency of your works to make your peace with God? And did the sense of this send you, as helpless sinners, to the throne of grace, entreating the Lord Christ to be your peace, and to make both one? Is this your experience? If it be, thus far you have been directed aright into the love of God. But who brought you thus far? Is it not he who is to carry on, and to give you the blessing for which you wait. It is the Holy Spirit who has convinced you of your guilt and misery in turning your hearts from God, and who has disposed you to seek his love, and who is also to shed it abroad in your hearts. And this he will do, by giving you the faith which worketh by love. He will enable you to trust God's faithful word, which cannot be broken, and to rely upon his unchangeable promises, which cannot possibly fail of being fulfilled to every one who comes and sues for mercy and favour through the righteousness of the Lord Christ. Thus he will give you power to put forth and to act faith, and to apply the promises to yourselves, whereby he will bring you to see that Christ loved you, and gave himself for you, which will produce love in your hearts, and the fruits of love in your lives. Wait, then, upon him for this blessing. Wait under the word, hoping and praying that he would make it the means of working faith in your hearts: and when it is given unto you to believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God, then he will fulfil the work of faith with power; he will support the patience of hope, and he will carry on the labour of love even unto the end.

Perhaps there may be some persons here, who have no desire to love God. They have given up their hearts to other objects, and are pleased with their choice. Oh ye sons of men! how long will ye thus idolize the sinful creature, and rebel against the almighty Creator? How long will ye love vanity, and seek after happiness in the ways of sin? Can these things make you happier than God can? Nay, know ye not, that at the end of your fancied pleasures there is real misery for evermore? And are you making a good bargain? Is it worth your while to give up all hopes of heaven and glory for the sake of some present joys? And what are they? Are they solid and lasting? and do they make you happy through life? Have you no uneasy sensations when you are sometimes alone, or when you are visited with sickness? Does not a troublesome thought then intrude, "What will become of me, if I should die? If I were to be in heaven, I could not be happy; because I love nothing that is there. I have no love for God, nor for his will, nor for his people. I find no pleasure in praising God here. How then could I rejoice in singing his praises hereafter?" If ever your mind has been led to such reflections, how did you get rid of them? Did you try to drive them away by company or diversions? And you succeeded; the melancholy fit wore off; and you thought it a great blessing you were easy again. This single instance is sufficient to demonstrate that you are not happy; and, indeed, it is impossible that you should be so. While your heart is turned from God, it is set upon sin, and sin has no happiness to give. Its promises are all lies, and its enjoyments are all delusions; for it undertakes to make you happy in that to which the Almighty has threatened eternal misery, and the practice of which will bring this misery upon you. Men and brethren! are not these things so? And why, then, will you set your love upon sin? Can it make you perfectly happy? Deal fairly with yourselves. Are you as happy as you would wish to be? You know you are not. I appeal to your own hearts. But if any of you are so desperately deluded as to wish for no other happiness than what the pleasures of sin can give you, yet did you ever consider what would be the end of this delusion? Oh think upon that; and may the sense of it open your eyes; for surely you are acting a most unnatural and wicked part, to choose eternal misery rather than part with some sinful pleasure. May the God of all grace convince you of your want of his love, and bring you to know and experience the happiness of it! and oh that he may now put it into your hearts to pray for it! May he, the Lord and giver of every good gift, bless what has been now spoken, and render it the means of increasing his love in the hearts of all this congregation! May he pardon our imperfect manner of thinking and speaking of his divine and infinite love; and may he shed it abroad abundantly in all our hearts! Oh that he would send us away inflamed with his love, and would give us grace to walk in love, continually evidencing our unfeigned love to him by our love to his commandments!

Grant us these our requests, most holy Father, for the sake of Jesus Christ, our Lord; to whom with thee, and the eternal Spirit, three coequal and coeternal persons in one Jehovah, we ascribe the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, now and for ever. Amen.

DISCOURSE IX.

UPON THE RIGHT LOVE OF OUR NEIGHBOUR.

And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment. And the second is like; namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.—Mark xii. 28—31.

In these words our blessed Saviour has given us the sum and substance of all practical religion. He has reduced it to two short rules, which are yet so full and copious, that they comprehend all the law and the prophets. The whole scripture was to lead us to the right knowledge of the Lord God, that we might pay him the love and obedience which are his due, and might love our neighbour as ourselves.

I have already discoursed of the two parts of the first commandment, and have endeavoured to explain and to enforce the right knowledge and the right love of the Lord God; and I come now to the second commandment, which is contained in these words of the text: "And the second is like, namely this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." The second is like unto the first, because it treats of the same subject, is enforced by the same authority, and is enacted for the same wise and gracious purposes; and the second is further like, because it arises and branches out of the first; since, if any man has the true love of God in his heart, it will evidence and prove itself to be there, by enabling him to love his neighbour as himself. The right love of our neighbour is the fruit and effect of our love of God, and can spring from no other root, especially in the perfect degree here required—Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. This is an abridgment of the whole moral law, and comprehends all the duties of the second table. As he who loves God keeps the first table, so he, who loves his neighbour as himself, keeps the second. May the Lord incline all our hearts to keep it; and may his good Spirit render useful and profitable what shall be said,

First, Concerning the inseparable connexion between the two commandments—the love of God and the love of our neighbour.

Secondly, Concerning the nature and extent of the second commandment—Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

Thirdly, Concerning the scripture method of enabling us to keep this commandment. And then,

Fourthly, I shall make some practical observations upon these particulars

As the first of these points, I lay this down for an evident truth; that the man can have no real love for his neighbour who has not first the love of God in his heart; such a true experimental sense of God's love to him in Christ Jesus, as was treated of in the last discourse; for the love of our neighbour stands upon the love of God: it has no other foundation. Build it upon what you please but this, you will find nothing else strong enough to act against the opposition of a man's own selfish heart. But as we have many pretended master-builders, who lay another foundation than that is laid; and as some of the most dangerous mistakes in religion arise from building upon these men's foundation; I will therefore bring some arguments to prove the inseparable connexion between the two commandments—The love of God and the love of our neighbour. And

First, a man cannot love his neighbour aright, until he be endued with the love of God; because he has no principle of love in his heart. Man, in his natural state, or, as our church expresses it, man, before he receives the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit, has no holy, pure love of any kind. All his affections are placed upon wrong objects and directed to wrong ends. They are turned from God, and placed upon those objects, the love of which he has forbidden, and they are directed to the pleasing of self, and not to the glory of God. This is the scripture character of fallen man. He has no brotherly love: and how should he have any? for he has no natural affection. He acts contrary to those very instincts by which the brutes act invariably. With all his boasted reason, and dignified faculties, he is, in social life, lower than a brute; for are there not parents who have no love for their children, and children who have no love for their parents? Is it not a common thing to find a family divided against itself, and Cain persecuting Abel unto death? And what principle of love can he have in his heart, who is thus without natural affection? Natural affection ties men together with the strongest bonds of love; but all these he breaks asunder; and therefore it is just as possible that any brotherly love should be in him, as that a fountain should send forth at the same time sweet water and bitter. But

Secondly, The natural man is not only without a principle of love, but is also described by that God who created his heart, and knows it intimately, to be actuated by a principle of hatred. Until he has some of the love of God shed abroad in his heart, he cannot have any true love for his neighbour, because he is absolutely under the influence of vicious self-love; and while this reigns in the heart, brotherly love can have no place; nay, it will be absolutely shut out, as the apostle shows, Titus iii. 3: "We ourselves also (as well as others) sometimes lived in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another." When did he, as others, live in this malicious, envious, hateful state? He was, he says, a slave to these base tempers, until the kindness and love of God our Saviour was manifested to him; and therefore, until this be manifested to any man, he must be a slave to the same tempers. He cannot be delivered from them by any human means. No knowledge, no power of philosophy, no system of morality, no stretch of genius, nor refinements of polite life, can make a man less hateful in himself, or less disposed to hate others. Had not the Romans all these advantages? and yet we have this character of them drawn by an infallible pen:—They were filled with all unrighteousness, covetousness, maliciousness, full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity, whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, disobedient to parents, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful. Thus were they hateful, and hating one another: and such is every man before he receives the grace of Christ. He has all these evil tempers in him which the Romans had.

But some perhaps may ask, What is the cause of this universal depravity of man's affections? The corruption of his nature is the true cause: for all our evil tempers spring from the corrupt heart. The fountain is polluted, and therefore the streams run foul. Out of the heart, says our Lord, proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, with the other abominable deeds of the flesh, some of which the apostle mentions by name, Gal. v. 20; such as hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, envyings. These are in every heart; for the imagination of the thoughts of the heart is only evil, and that continually, continually evil, because continually set against the love of God, and against that love of our neighbour which the will of God requires us to pay him. Surely, then, his heart must be changed before brotherly love can enter into it. Grace must work upon its evil tempers, and the Spirit of God must subdue them, that love and its sweet dispositions may rule in the heart. Love first taken place in us when the Spirit of God sheds it abroad and manifests to us the pardoning love of our God. Then a new principle of love takes possession of the heart, which strives against and conquers our selfish tempers. But, until this be done by the spirit of love, there is nothing in any man but SELF. His views are all narrow and selfish. The end of all his pursuits is self-seeking, and the end of all his enjoyments is self-pleasing. This is God's own account of his fallen creature, man. And what says matter of fact? Is this man's real character? I shall endeavour to prove, under my Third argument, that it is. Experience demonstrates it. Look around you, my brethren, and see what men are doing. Does love reign in every breast? Are they studying how to make each other happy, and rejoicing in each other's happiness? No. The contrary spirit prevails. Is there any little village free from disputes and quarrels? Where is there any large business, or manufactory, free from contention and envy among the various persons concerned in carrying it on? If they be all of one mind and of one heart, is it not generally a wicked combination to enrich themselves by oppressing others? Is there any trading city, whose merchants rejoice in the prosperity of others, as in their own? Is there any state free from parties? Blessed be God for the lessening of party-spirit among us. It has received a great blow, but it is not dead: it is only waiting for some public misfortune to give it a specious occasion of raising fresh disturbance and confusion. And look into the present melancholy state of Europe; where do you find brotherly love? Oh! where can it subsist amidst the horrors of war? It was not brotherly love which raised armies, ranged them in order of battle, put them upon action, and made brethren rejoice in the slaughter and death of each other. Brotherly love has not a more distressing sight than when it surveys a field of battle, upon which there lie ten or twenty thousand unhappy men slain in one day. These are awful proofs of the ascendency which hatred has in the human breast. It has got possession, has seized the throne, and has entirely banished all brotherly love. The fact is notorious; for men are everywhere complaining of the miseries which they meet with in social life; and they do not complain without reason. The time is come when this character is fulfilled. "Men shall be lovers of themselves, covetous, proud, boasters, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded." Is not this a real picture of mankind. Do we not find these unsociable tempers prevailing among them at this day? and do not these demonstrate that man is incapable of having any true love for his neighbour, until he has the love of God in his heart.

But supposing that man, in his natural state, could do some seeming acts of love to his neighbour; yet, they would avail nothing without the love of God—which is my fourth argument. Since fallen man has not the love of God in his heart by nature, nor is capable of attaining it by any means in his own power, the great business of religion is to bring him to love God, and to keep the first and great commandment, which the gospel alone can enable him to do. Moral philosophers have been trying, but they have always failed. They make religion consist in the duties of the second table, omitting the first; which is the same thing as if they laid the foundation in the air, and built the house downwards. Morality has no foundation without the love of God. All moral obligations to brotherly love fail in their motives, and in their end. Their motives are like so many ropes of sand. They have no force to bind and to oblige the conscience. We have many men who write and speak learnedly about moral duties; but here they fail; they can offer no obligation strong enough to overbalance the propensity in the sinner's heart against those duties. His heart pleads more strongly against them than they can plead for them. They may talk eloquently to him of the beauty of virtue, and may argue with him closely upon the fitness of things, and may try to persuade him by a fine chain of reasoning to act agreeably to the nature of things and to the moral sense; and they may recommend the whole from the charms of universal benevolence. All this looks very pretty in theory, and may make a fine system of the religion of nature delineated: but bring it to practice; offer these motives when self-love has some favourite passion to gratify, or self-interest has some great prospect of advantage; and what is the consequence? The man is deaf to all your moral arguments: they cannot reach his heart, nor open and enlarge it to receive brotherly love, but leave it still under the power of its selfish tempers. These have too deep a root in nature to be driven out by the mere dint of moral reasoning. Grace alone can subdue them; and when grace places the love of God in the heart, then it delivers the affections from vicious self-love, and makes them act by a constant uniform principle of love to the brethren.

And as morality fails in its motives, so does it also in its end. It proposes a wrong end. The glory of God should be the end of all our actions, but moral men seek their own glory by their works; for they suppose that their works are meritorious, and can procure them the love and favour of God by way of desert. Thus they set aside faith; without which no moral works can be acceptable. Faith alone directs us to a right end, and proposes the right means to attain it; and every act and exercise of faith towards the attaining of it is well-pleasing unto God. But morality without faith cannot please God: for it is an adjudged case in scripture, "that without faith it is impossible to please him;" and it has been determined by our church, in her thirteenth article, that works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ. It is faith, working by love, which renders those works pleasant to God, that, done upon any other motive, would be highly displeasing to him.

Let these arguments suffice for the proof of the first point. It appears, from their evidence, that the love of our neighbour arises from the love of God. There is no other foundation for it. You must keep the duties of the first table before you can keep those of the second. The connexion between them is inseparable. Unless a man first has the love of God in his heart, he cannot have any true love for his neighbour. He cannot love him at all, and much less in the perfect manner here required—"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." And this leads me to speak of the nature and extent of the second commandment, under my second general head.

The text requires a very exalted and refined degree of brotherly love. It commands us to love our neighbour as ourselves, with the same strength, with the same constancy of affection; for no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth it, and cherisheth it: so should he nourish and cherish his neighbour in all good things. Whatever good he wisheth to himself, the same should he wish to his neighbour; and whatever evil he would have kept off from himself, the same should he endeavour to keep off from his neighbour; and he should, in both these respects, exert himself for his neighbour as much as for himself. But who are required thus to love their neighbour? The law reaches to all men and to all cases. The same authority which enjoins the perfect love of God, enjoins also the perfect love of our neighbour. And can any fallen man keep these commandments? No; while he is in his natural state, it is impossible. We have before proved that he can neither love God nor his neighbour until his affections be changed, and vicious self-love be taken out of his heart. But when grace has made him a new creature, when his understanding is enlightened, his will is rightly disposed, and his heart is under the influence of divine love, then the text speaks to this man, and says, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. The same graces which led thee to love thyself aright will operate with equal force in the love of thy neighbour, and will show itself in every work and labour of love.

It is evident, then, that the duty is of great extent. The object on whom it is to be exercised is mankind in general; for every one is our neighbour, who stands related to us in the common bonds of humanity. If he be a heathen, a Turk, or a Jew, he is nevertheless bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. Nay, if he be our enemy, yet still he is our neighbour; we are of one family, and of one father; and therefore his hatred to us should not stop the current of our love to him; as our Lord has taught us in the 10th chapter of St. Luke. A certain lawyer asked him, Who is my neighbour? Jesus answered him in a parable. The Jews and the Samaritans were at such great variance, that they would not even have any dealings with one another; and a certain man, in going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. A priest and a Levite saw their countryman in this distress, but passed by without giving him any help; and afterwards a Samaritan came to the place where he was; and when he saw him he had compassion on him, and gave him all the assistance in his power. Which now of these three, says Christ, was neighbour to him that fell among thieves? The lawyer answered, He that had mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise. Go, and imitate this Samaritan. Learn of him to look upon all men, even thine enemies, as thy neighbours, and love them, and do good to them, as he did. Thus it is plain, from our Lord's explanation of the word neighbour, that we ought to extend our love to all men, and also to all cases. It is to reach to the inmost desires of the heart. The love of God, being shed abroad there, will take the command of the affections: and when love is on the throne, reigning in the heart, it will sweetly incline and mightily enable the other faculties to obey its dictates. Love will not dwell in the same heart with selfishness and hatred, but will oppose and subdue them, in order to make room for brotherly love; and when this comes and dwells in the heart, the man is thereby always disposed to think, and speak, and act, for the good of his neighbour. He has in him an abiding principle of love, which, according to what is written, "thinketh no evil." Love works first upon the thoughts of the heart, from whence all the words and actions spring. It infuses its gracious influences into the root, that the sap and juices communicated from thence may partake of its nature, and that whatever grows upon this stem may be the fruit of love. That heart-love, which thinketh no evil, will speak none; for as out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, so love, being in the heart, will show itself in the tongue, and will not speak evil of its neighbour; nor can love do him any harm. "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law," Rom. xiii. 10; to love our neighbour as ourselves is the fulfilling of the law of the second table, which they that have the love of God in their hearts endeavour to keep, not to merit heaven; for that was the purchase of Christ's blood; but they are kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven them; and they walk in love as Christ hath also loved them.

This is the nature and extent of brotherly love. It springs from the love of God, and is guided and influenced by it. Whatever the law of God teaches a man to do for his own good, brotherly love will put him upon doing the same for the good of others, and not only of his particular friends and relations, but also of mankind, yea, of his very enemies; even for them brotherly love has its good wishes and its good offices. It would not entertain an injurious thought of its neighbour, nor speak a word to his prejudice, nor do any thing to his hurt. Its constant breathings are, As I have opportunity, I would do good unto all men. And is this, my brethren, the language of every one of your hearts? Have you a principle of brotherly love actuating and influencing every thought, and word, and work? Examine yourselves closely upon this point. It may help to show you clearly the state of your souls: for this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God loves his brother also. If your love to God be from a right motive, and to a right end, it will work in all the kind offices of brotherly love. If you fail in these, you certainly fail first in your love to God; for these are the streams which flow from the fountain, and they could not fail unless the fountain ceased to supply them. There is a want of the love to God in the heart when there is a want of any of the good offices of brotherly love in the life. Search, and see if this be not your case; and if it be, look up to God and entreat him to direct your hearts into his love, that you may hear with profit what shall be said under my Third general head, Concerning the scripture method of enabling us to keep this commandment. Man has no generous principle in him by nature. Vicious self-love directs and governs all his views and actions, and therefore he must be changed and renewed in the spirit of his mind, before brotherly love can have any place in his heart. The scripture treats largely of this great change, and ascribes the whole of it to the Spirit of God. He enlightens the understanding, and convinces the sinner of his guilt and of his danger! Then he attacks the stubborn self-will, and makes the sinner feel that if he follow his own will he must unavoidably perish, and that everlastingly: and he also shows him the horrid rebellion of his heart, whose affections are all apostates from God, having set up the creature, and served it in the place of the Creator. The sinner becomes deeply sensible of his guilt and of his misery, and is made earnestly to wish and to pray for deliverance: and when the Lord has thoroughly humbled him, and by various ways and means has convinced him of his own utter helplessness, then he enables him to believe to the saving of his soul. He finds himself at peace with God through the righteousness of the Lord Christ, on which he can rely for his acceptance and pardon; and therefore he loves God, who has first so exceedingly loved him; and he proves, by his unfeigned love to the brethren, that this love of God is in his heart: for, being there, it will produce the kind dispositions, and will draw forth the good offices, of brotherly love. In this way grace overcomes the selfishness of nature, and anger, wrath, malice, hatred, and the other unsociable tempers of the old man are subdued, and the new man puts on bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering. These are sanctified affections in him, because they are the genuine fruits of that faith which worketh by love.

This is the scripture method of attaining brotherly love. It cannot be attained but by the grace of God: for the established rule is—"Ye are taught of God to love one another." It is not from human, but from divine teaching. Brotherly love is not learned in the schools of moral philosophy. The greatest professors of ethics may write pretty systems, and read lectures upon them to their pupils, and perhaps they may explain to them something of brotherly love; but they can place none of it in the heart. Christ alone can do that. He is the great teacher of brotherly love; and it is in his school only where men can learn it practically. He teaches his disciples first the want of it; and when he gives them his love, and sheds it abroad in their hearts, then also he gives them the love of the brethren, as it is written, 1 John iv. 7: "Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth, is born of God, and knoweth God;" he is a child of God, because he loveth his heavenly Father, and loveth all his Father's children: which doctrine the same apostle maintains in these words, 1 John v. 1: "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God; and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him." Here the apostle discovers the true cause from which arises our love to God and to man. It is through faith, apprehending and laying hold of Christ, that we are made the children of God, and therefore we love the Father of whom we are begotten, and the brethren who are begotten of him, and who have obtained like precious faith with us. Believers, who are thus born again of God, and adopted into his family, are closely connected and joined together in the bonds of love. Love, flowing from the head into all the members, unites them in affection to their heavenly Father and in affection to all his children; for, being members of the same body, they have the same care one for another; and if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or if one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

It is certain, then, from these scriptures, that no man can love his neighbour as himself, unless he be taught it of God. There is something called universal benevolence, and the moral sense, and the patriot spirit, which pretend to teach brotherly love upon the principles of moral philosophy; but these are false, bastard kinds of love, arising from selfish motives, and directed to selfish ends. And let them appear ever so refined and exalted, yet they are not sanctified affections, because they spring not from faith in Jesus Christ; and without faith in him it is impossible to please God. Works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are not pleasant to God. You may do many seeming acts of love; you may be the foremost in all charitable subscriptions; you may be very kind to your needy relations, and very good to the poor; nay, you may build hospitals, and leave your estate to endow them; yet, if these things be not done in faith, they have in them the nature of sin, and are not acts of brotherly love, but acts of your own proud, selfish spirit. God looks at your heart. He sees upon what principle you are working; and if your principle be wrong, your actions cannot be pleasing in his sight. Make the tree good, and its fruit will be good; but a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit. This is the main point, with respect to brotherly love; and this comes to be considered in the Fourth place, Under the practical observations upon the doctrine of the text. The doctrine is this: Whoever keeps the first table, will keep the second. If the love of God be in his heart, he will give proof and evidence of it by his unfeigned love of his neighbour, and he will love him as himself, not with that vicious self-love which influences the views and actions of all natural men, but with that holy, sanctified affection, which springs from, and is guided by, the love of God. If this brotherly love were in every heart, it would turn the world into a paradise. If all men had true heart-love to their neighbour, earth would be heaven: for, so much love as there is on earth, so much of heaven is brought down upon it. The hateful and selfish tempers of mankind make the world what it is: these are the cause of all the miseries in society, and these are in all men by nature. Their love centres in self, and seeks not another's good, but its own. One great design of Christianity was to reform their love, by giving them that faith which worketh by love, by love to God for his inestimable mercies, and by love to men for the sake of God; by which means the old, selfish heart becomes a loving heart, and is ever prepared to do all the good it can to the bodies and souls of men. This is the true character of a Christian. He wishes well to all men, speaks evil of no man, and is ready to every good work. In thought, word, and deed, he is influenced by unfeigned love to his neighbour, whether he be a stranger, a friend, or an enemy. Is this your character, my brethren? Have you the true love of your neighbour in your hearts? and are you constantly manifesting it in your lives? How many persons have we among us, that make great professions of brotherly love, even of universal benevolence, and yet they divide the two tables, and make religion consist in keeping the duties of the second. All our moralists act upon this plan. They speak and write very prettily about moral duties; but they lay the foundation of them upon sand. They neither build them upon the love of God, nor upon faith in Christ Jesus; and other foundation can no man lay for the love of God, nor upon the grace of the Holy Spirit disposing and enabling them to love God, and then to love their neighbour. Thus these men put asunder what God hath joined together. The love of God and the love of men cannot be separated: for there can be no true, brotherly love, but what springs from the love of God. Let it spring from any other cause, there will be something in it selfish; it will arise from private, narrow views, and will be directed to mean ends; and be it ever so refined and patriot-spirited, yet it will be unsanctified; because, whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. Without faith the sinner is under guilt, and under sentence of death, and is as incapable of doing a single act which is good and valid in the court of heaven as a condemned criminal is of doing any legal act which would be allowed to be valid in a court of justice. The law of God has attainted him of high treason, and found him guilty; upon which justice has a right to inflict the deserved punishment, and to put the sentence of the law in force against him; but if he own the sentence to be just, and sue for mercy, and seek it through Jesus Christ, relying on his grace and righteousness, then by faith he is pardoned; his attainder is reversed, and he is capable of doing acts well-pleasing unto God, through Jesus Christ his Lord. The moral works done by such a person are acceptable, because his person was first accepted, and he was what they call rectus in curia; but without faith it was impossible that his moral works should please God: "for whatsoever is not of faith, is sin."

But I need not enlarge upon this point. Perhaps there may be none of those persons here. By our presence we declare ourselves to be professors of Christianity, and as such we are nearly concerned in what has been now said. The scripture has drawn our character before we receive the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit, and has painted in very expressive colours the inward lineaments of our hearts. It not only describes every fallen man to be without any true love of God or of his neighbour, but also represents him to be at enmity with God, and to be under the power of corrupt inclinations, which are opposite to God's will, and of selfish views, which are destructive of brotherly love. But while the scripture thus describes our malady, it offers us a remedy, which faith receives, and then works by love to God and to man; by love to God in loving him and his will, and by unfeigned love to the brethren, showing itself in every good word and work. There are great complaints in the world of the want of this brotherly love; and indeed there is very little of it to be found anywhere. But what is the reason? Is it not because there is a great want of the love of God? For since brotherly love springs from this, as from its only fountain, how can there be love abundant in the streams, if it fail in the fountain? If love does not operate in your life, how can love be in your heart? And if it be not there, what are you? not a Christian. What the sun would be without light, such is a Christian without love. He has none of the life and spirit of Christ, and wants the very mark and badge of Christ's disciples. "By this (says he) shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." O Lord, where are thy disciples at present? Hast thou not said, Ye shall know them by their love to one another? But upon whom is this mark found? Upon all nominal Christians? No; they are distinguished by a contrary temper. But is it not among professors? What professors? We have professors of so many denominations, and of so many different parties, that it is hard to say who has the narrowest views, or the most party spirit; but it is easy to see, at first sight, that brotherly love is the peculiar character of few of them. Alas! alas! they have lost their proper mark by which they were to be known to be Christ's disciples; and thus the scripture is fulfilled, which saith, "In the latter days the love of many shall wax cold." It is cold, indeed, with many; thank God, not with all. There are some (although but few), perhaps, of every denomination, who still have unfeigned love for the brethren. May the God of love increase their numbers.

Since there is so little brotherly love in the world, let each of you, my brethren, examine yourselves, and see whether you be Christ's disciples more than in name and profession. Are you known to belong to the household of faith by your love to one another? Do you love your neighbour as yourself, with a well-regulated, holy love, arising from a right motive, and directed to a right end? If you think you have this love, how did you attain it? Were you taught it of God? Have you been humbled before him under a sense of your guilt, and have you felt the misery of being enslaved to your own wicked and selfish tempers? And did you apply to Christ for deliverance? Did he take guilt out of your conscience, and give you that faith which worketh by love to your reconciled Father, and by love to your brethren for his sake? If you have been thus taught of God, you will also be enabled of God to love one another. And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more.

But if this be not your experience, then you cannot have the true brotherly love; and without it, what are you? You are not a Christian; for this commandment have we from Christ, that he who loveth God, love his brother also. Your want of love to your brother demonstrates your want of love to God: and consider what state you are in while you are not reconciled to God, nor at peace with him. You are under the guilt of all your sins, and liable to suffer the deserved punishment of them. That God, whom you daily provoke, daily spares you. He might get himself glory in punishing such a rebel; but his long-suffering bears with you: and what return do you make him for keeping you out of hell? Do you love him, and serve him with grateful obedience? No, you attack him with open, avowed rebellion, as if you had an arm like God, and was not afraid of the fire of his wrath: and you carry on your war against him by declared war against your neighbours, indulging the malicious, envious tempers, and gratifying the unjust desires of your own selfish heart. Suppose God should call you to his bar while you are in this state! As you have no love for him, you could have no happiness in beholding or enjoying him; and as you have no love for his family, you could not be happy in their company. You hated them upon earth; and, they are so much unlike yourself, you would hate them in heaven. What, then, could you meet with at his bar, but what you are prepared to receive, even an eternal separation from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power? And can you think of this without concern? Have you no fear lest the wrath of God should abide upon you for ever and ever? What! have you not one wish to flee from the wrath to come? Oh dreadful state of hardened sinners! May the Lord take pity on you, and subdue your rebellious hearts by his almighty grace, that you may be brought to the right love of God, and of your neighbour.

Perhaps, some of you may say, I thank God I am not in this state. I have been made to see and to feel my enmity against God and against man; and I heartily desire to love both. You have reason, indeed, to be thankful; for this desire is a sign and token of God's love to you. Wait upon him, that you may know and experience his love. He has encouraged you to ask this grace of him, and has promised to give it, upon your asking. It is his gift; for God is love; and he is more willing to give than you are to ask. It is one of his choice gifts, which he delights to bestow upon the children of men, and with the right use of which he is well pleased. "If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well," James ii. 8. Ye do well in presenting this odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing unto God. Oh! wait then upon him, and be found in the ways of his appointment, not to merit his love; it is a free gift, and it is inestimable; the price of it is above all the riches of earth and heaven, but wait humbly for the time of his love; and when, out of his sovereign grace, he sheds it abroad in your heart, then he will enable you to love your neighbour as yourself. Surely these blessings are worth your waiting for; especially since you are encouraged by those comfortable words, the truth of which many thousands now alive have found by happy experience: "They shall not be ashamed that wait for me, saith the Lord." Isa. xlix. 23.

Thanks be to his rich and free love, which has fulfilled this scripture to so many in our days. You, my brethren, who know the love of God, should remember, that as you love him who begat, so you ought to love them who are begotten of him. The soundness of your love to God should be made evident from your acts of love to your fellow-creatures; for that faith, which brings you to the knowledge of God's love to your soul, should work by love to them; and this work of love proves it—does not make it—but proves it to be a living faith. While it lives, it loves. Love is the very breath of faith; and while love breathes in the believer, it disposes him to do all the good he can to the bodies and to the souls of his neighbours; for his is heart-love. He cannot see any one sick, poor, in prison, naked, or wounded, but love hastens to his relief. It does not say, Be ye well; be ye relieved, &c.; but it freely gives them such things as they have need of. My Christian brethren, you know that these are the proper offices of brotherly love. Oh! be careful then in the practice of them. If you would have your evidences kept clear for heaven, and your peace and comfort abiding, let your faith be continually working. Exercise it upon Christ's distressed members. Go about doing them good. Refuse no labour of love; for he has commanded, and he has encouraged you to embrace every opportunity. This is the commandment of God—that you should believe on the name of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave you commandment: and the day is approaching, when you will hear him say, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Keep your faith, then, working by love; for they cannot be separated. Faith is the root, and love is the fruit: if the root be alive, it will bear fruit, even the abundant fruits of love and charity, to God's glory, and to man's profit.

And as the believer is kindly affectioned with brotherly love to relieve the bodily wants of his neighbour, so is he influenced towards his spiritual wants with more affection, because the soul is more precious than the body; at least, if he be not, he ought, however, to be thus influenced. There is in men a strange remissness and backwardness to the performance of the offices of love, relating to the souls of their neighbours; but grace makes them willing and able: it sweetly inclines and mightily enables them to the spiritual acts of brotherly love; but one cannot help lamenting how little grace is exercised this way. While worldly people are erecting magnificent hospitals, and doing princely acts of charity, oh! how short of them do professors come in their works of charity? You are a professor; you call yourself a Christian; and do you not know one of your neighbours who lives in open sin, and yet you never speak to him of it? You thought, indeed, sometimes of reproving him; but then, fear, or shame, or indolence prevented you. These passions were stronger in you than brotherly love. And does not this convince you how unlike you are to your blessed master? Did he ever decline doing good for fear of some little inconvenience which might attend it? No, he went about doing good, although at the hazard of his life; and yet your love to Christ, and to precious souls, is so very cold, that you can suffer your neighbour to live in sin, yea, perhaps to die in it, without one kind reproof. And hast thou not, then, boasting professor, great reason to examine thyself, whether thou be in the faith? for how canst thou prove it to be true and alive, since it does not work by love? May this humble thee, and put thee upon seeking more of the spirit and power of Jesus Christ. Perhaps you are the master of a family: how do you show your love to your servants? You see they do your work, and you take care to pay them their wages: and what more do you than publicans and sinners? But do you watch over their souls, instructing and admonishing them with all gentleness and diligence? Have you any family worship? Do you pray constantly with them, and for them? so that the Lord may justly say of you, as he did of the father of the faithful, "I know Abraham, that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment." God knows, there are few heads of families who take any care at all of the souls of their servants; and few indeed do their duty by them in brotherly love. The Lord pardon what is past, and reform us for the future in this respect. Perhaps you may be a parent, and you take pains enough to provide for the temporal welfare of your children: you rise up early, and late take rest, and eat the bread of carefulness, that you may get a great fortune for them: and what more do you for them than for your beasts? You provide for your children's well-being in the world: and do you not the same for your cattle? Christian love would put you upon another work, and would stir you up to catechize them, to teach them to know themselves, to become early acquainted with their corrupt and sinful nature, and to see the necessity of their salvation by Jesus Christ. This is your bounden duty as a parent. The blessing upon the discharge of it is in God's hand; but he requires you to use the means; and if love be alive and active in your heart, you will strive more to have your children rich in grace, than rich in those things which perish in the using. In whatever other station of life God has placed you, do you perform the offices of brotherly love in it? Do you love your neighbour as yourself? Search diligently, and watch your heart narrowly. If you have any true love, pray for more of it; and may the Lord God Almighty help you to subdue self, and all your selfish tempers, that love may increase and abound in your soul. May you grow up unto him in all things, who is the head, even Christ; from whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love. Hear us, thou God of love, and answer; and grant that all men may know us to be thy disciples by our edifying one another in love. May no selfish temper, no bigotry or party spirit, hinder us from relieving the spiritual or bodily wants of any of our distressed brethren; but unite all thy members closely among themselves. Make us, Lord, of one mind and of one heart; and may all that love thee in sincerity think and speak the same things. O give us that love which never faileth. We ask it for thy mercy's sake, to the honour of the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, three persons in one Jehovah, whose is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

DISCOURSE X.

UPON THE CLEANSING VIRTUE OF CHRIST'S BLOOD.

In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness.—Zech. xiii. 1.

THEY that be whole need not a physician; but the sick stand in need of his advice and help. The persons who feel no malady of sin, see not their want of a saviour. They are not in pain, and therefore they desire no remedy; but it is otherwise with the convinced sinner. He feels the misery of sin. He suffers the torment of it in his guilty conscience, and earnestly seeks for relief. No person in exquisite pain ever cried out for help with greater fervency than he does. He has heard of the almighty physician, and of his great readiness to heal all distressed objects who come unto him; and therefore he earnestly implores his assistance. How comfortable to his afflicted soul is such a scripture as this, when explained and applied to him by the Spirit of God: "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness." He hears the words with joy, and blesses God for having opened a fountain for such polluted sinners as he is, to wash in and be clean. He believes the record that God gave of his Son, namely, that his blood cleanseth from all sin; and through faith he finds great joy and peace in receiving redemption through the blood of Jesus, even the forgiveness of sins. But the case is quite different with those who have never been in any concern about their souls. They may give a kind of simple assent to such scriptures as this. Perhaps they may be convinced that they shall want to be cleansed from sin some time or other; but at present they see no absolute necessity for it. They have no painful sense of the malady of sin, nor any apprehension of their danger; and therefore they give themselves no uneasiness about the great Physician of souls. But the less they are concerned for themselves, the more ought we, who are sensible of their danger, to be concerned for them. We ought to preach the law to them, by which is the knowledge of sin, and to set before them their pollution and their guilt, and the misery and punishment to which they are subject; and we ought to look up to God for his blessing, that he would set home and apply by his grace to their consciences, what we speak to the outward ear. And when he has convinced them of the dangerous state in which they live, before they are washed in the fountain of Christ's blood, and they earnestly desire and pray to be washed in it, then we may safely preach to them the comforts of the gospe., and the infinite riches of a Saviour's love; then we may exhort them to wash and be clean; though their sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow, when washed in the fountain of the Redeemer's blood: though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. May the Lord God, who opened this fountain, be with us this day to apply its cleansing, healing virtue. May his good Spirit awaken the careless and profane sinner to see his pollution and guilt! may he increase the desires and strengthen the longings of those who are waiting for the blood of sprinkling! and may he edify and comfort his own people by means of what shall be said, in order to determine

First, What the fountain is, which is mentioned in the text.

Secondly, The time when it was opened; here said to be a particular day.

Thirdly, The wonderful property of this fountain—it could cleanse and do away the pollution of sins of the deepest dye; and then,

Fourthly, By what means and in what way sinners receive and partake of its cleansing property.

It will not require many words to determine what the fountain is. There is a circumstance mentioned in the text, which will easily settle this point. It is said to be opened for sin and for uncleanness. Now, what fountain could it be which had the wonderful property of cleansing from sin? The scripture has laid down this infallible rule: without shedding of blood there is no remission: and the shedding of what blood ever obtained remission? Did the blood of the sacrifices under the law? No. "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the Lord: I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats," Isaiah i. 11. "For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings," Hos. vi. 6. He commanded sacrifice, but not in preference to mercy. Men were not to rest in the sacrifice, as if its blood could atone, but to look with faith at the great sacrifice which the mercy of God had provided, and which was to make a full atonement for sin, and to bring in everlasting righteousness. This was the sacrifice of the Lamb of God. No blood but his ever did or could atone. If all the cattle upon a thousand hills had been offered up, they could not have taken away the least sin. If a man had given the fruit of his body for the sin of his soul, still his sin would have remained. If he had repented, his repentance without faith in the blood of Christ could not have obtained remission. There would be occasion to repent of his repentance. If he were to shed rivers of tears, yea, tears of blood, these very tears would want washing. Nothing can cleanse and do away sin but some divine and infinitely precious blood; and in whom is there any such? Not in a mere creature. A creature has blood; but none that has any virtue to cleanse a sinner from the pollution and guilt of sin. This is the property of the Lamb of God, who, being both God and man in the person of one Christ, did thereby give a divine and infinite virtue to the blood which he shed, so that it can cleanse from all sin. Here, then, is the fountain. It is the most precious blood of Christ, which is always sending out its virtue, as a fountain is always sending out water. Its cleansing streams have never stopped, since there was sin to cleanse; and they can never be exhausted. Whoever washes therein shall be made clean, let him have been ever so defiled or polluted. The pool of Bethesda was a lively image of the fountain. After the angel went down and troubled the water, then whosoever first stept in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had. As this cured every bodily, so does the blood of Christ cure every spiritual disease; for it takes away sin, which is the cause of all diseases, and obtains eternal redemption.

Are any of you, my brethren, thoroughly sensible of the defiling nature of sin? and do you find how offensive it makes you in the eyes of a holy God? Has the angel of the covenant come down and troubled your consciences? and are you convinced that nothing can cleanse you but the blood of Jesus Christ? Then believe his word and rely upon his promise, that if your polluted souls be washed in this fountain, how filthy and defiled soever they be, they shall be made clean: for it can cleanse from all sin. Are your pollutions numerous, of a long continuance, and of the deepest dye? The blood of Christ can infallibly cleanse them and make them as white as snow; because it partakes of the infinite and divine nature of the God-man Christ Jesus. He who opened this fountain for sin, was God and man united in one Christ, whereby the actions of the one nature may properly be ascribed to and predicated of the other. The man Jesus had blood to shed; but he who shed it was God as well as man; and therefore it is called by St. Paul "the blood of God:" for as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and man is one Christ. The manhood suffered and bled; the Godhead merited infinitely by those sufferings and by that blood-shedding, and so the one Christ, who suffered and bled, merited infinitely, according to what the apostle John says, "That God laid down his life for us;" and the ends and purposes for which God laid it down could not possibly be defeated. Hear this, ye poor guilty sinners, whose consciences are troubled with a sense of your many and great pollutions. The Lord God has opened a fountain for such as you are, to wash in and be clean; and he has given to it a divine and almighty virtue to cleanse all manner of sins. His power is present, to make it an all-perfect cleanser. Oh that God may enable you to make use of it! Is it not your heart's desire that you may be made clean? And here are the means. The fountain stands open. What hinders you then from washing in it, and having your con-sciences purged from dead works? You cannot doubt of its virtue. Has it not cleansed sinners who were once as black as hell?—a Manasseh, a Mary Magdalen, a Saul? Put it then to the trial. Believe the record which God has given of it. Apply it for the cleansing of your souls, and it will infallibly take effect. All the sinners, from Adam to Christ, who have been admitted into the presence and kingdom of God, were cleansed from every spot and stain of sin in this fountain; and all the sinners, from Christ to the end of the world, must wash their robes in the same fountain, if they appear in spotless purity before God. But although this fountain has had its all-cleansing virtue ever since the fall, yet there was a fixed time in the council of God, called in the text, in that day, when the immaculate Lamb of God should come into the world, and shed his blood, and put away sin by the sacrifice of himself; and this brings me to my Second head,—Under which I purposed to consider the time when this fountain was opened, here said to be a particular day. And this was certainly the day when the Redeemer suffered and bled upon the cross, which being fixed and unalterable in the decrees of the most high God, they who lived before Christ gave himself an offering for sin, were saved by faith in him, as we are since he was offered; for the merits of his sacrifice looked backwards as well as forward, and, like as the sun sends out light in every direction, so did the efficacy of our Lord's sacrifice. It communicated its cleansing qualities, as well to those who bled before, as to those who lived since, Christ made his soul an offering for sin. But nevertheless there was a day, a precise determinate time, for his offering. Christ was the lamb slain from the foundation of the world, slain typically in every sacrifice; but in the fulness of time he came, and was really slain, and the day of his sufferings was the day when the fountain for sin and for uncleanness was opened, which is clearly determined by the context; for in the foregoing chapter the prophet is speaking of an extraordinary morning in the land of Israel, and he introduces his description with these words: "And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the Spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look upon me, whom they have pierced." These words are applied by an infallible expositor to our Lord's being pierced upon the cross: for St. John says, "When the soldiers came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs; but one of them, with a spear, pierced his side, and forthwith came out blood and water:" for these things were done, that the scripture should be fulfilled: "A bone of him shall not be broken." And again another scripture saith, "They shall look on him, whom they have pierced." From hence it is evident that the fountain was opened on the day of Christ's sufferings, here pointed out by this distinguishing mark; namely, the soldiers' piercing his side, from whence there flowed blood and water. When this fixed day was come, and Christ had suffered whatever the hand and counsel of God had determined before should be done to him, then his blood had an all-cleansing virtue. What he once shed was for ever meritorious. It was so absolutely perfect, that he need not shed it any more. The sacrifice of that one day was sufficient to satisfy all the demands of law and justice; "so that Christ need not offer himself often, as the high priest entered into the holy place every year with the blood of others; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world; but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Once, the just suffered for the unjust, and the blood which he shed on that day had such an infinite cleansing virtue as to make scarlet, crimson sins as white as snow. The ends for which he bled could not possibly be defeated; for he was God and man united in one Christ; and the one Christ merited infinitely by the shedding of his most precious blood; and it was indeed shed as abundantly as if it had flowed from a fountain. From the time that his agony and bloody sweat began in the garden, until he expired upon the cross, he was a bleeding victim, wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities. When he was buffeted and scourged; when he was crowned with thorns, and their sharp points were stuck into his head by the barbarous soldiers; when the cross was laid upon him, and the weight of it opened his wounds and made them bleed afresh; when the nails went through his hands and feet, and he hung for six hours bleeding upon the cross; then was the most precious blood shed, which is the only fountain to wash away sin and uncleanness. Sinners, consider the great need you have of this fountain, and the inestimable love of Christ, who opened it for such as you are. He calls upon you, he entreats you to view him, as he hung bleeding upon the cross in his bitter passion—"Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger." This is his earnest request to you who are passing by and minding other things. He would have you to stop, to lay aside all other concerns, and to employ your thoughts upon his unparalleled sufferings. Oh, hearken then unto him! Look upon this man of sorrows. View him tormented, bleeding, dying, and then ask your heart, Why does the innocent Lamb of God thus suffer? Was it not that there might be a fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness? And how, then, are you affected with the shedding of that blood, which can cleanse from all sin? If grace be stirring in your hearts, you will mourn with a godly sorrow for your sins which occasioned his bitter sufferings, as it is written in the chapter before the text:—"I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplications; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him as one that is in bitterness for his first-born." As tender parents are affected with the death of an only son and of a first-born, so shall the holy mourners in Sion be affected with the wounding and piercing of Christ. They shall be in bitterness, not only for his death, but for the cause of it. Their sins were the betrayers and murderers of the Son of God; and it is their constant language—"My sins pierced Christ with a thousand sorrows in the day of his suffering, while he was wounded for my transgressions and bruised for mine iniquities; and yet—vile, ungrateful wretch that I am—daily am I piercing him with my sins, and making his wounds bleed afresh." Whoever can speak these words feelingly, will mourn after a godly sort, and will know how to value that precious blood which has merit and efficacy to save him from his base ingratitude, as well as from his other sins. He will look upon every one of our Lord's wounds as a fountain opened for the purifying of sin and of uncleanness; for every sin is of a polluting nature, and wants cleansing. Nothing can be so loathsome in the eyes of a holy God as sin. A leper covered over with sores, and ulcers, is not more offensive in our sight, than he that is defiled with the leprosy of sin is in the sight of God. He is not only of purer eyes than to behold it, but he also rejects the sinner for it, as filthy and abominable altogether; and he will be rejected for ever, unless he be convinced of the defiling nature of sin, and desire to be cleansed from its pollution. When these desires come from the Holy Spirit, he will strengthen them, until the sinner, being justified by the blood of Christ, be made clean and righteous altogether. But this point comes more particularly to be treated of in the Third place, Under the consideration of the wonderful property of the fountain mentioned in the text, it could cleanse and take away the pollution of sins of the deepest dye. The fountain is the blood of Jesus Christ, which is able to cleanse from sin by the divine ordinance and appointment. The ever-blessed Trinity have given it an almighty power in order to its answering all the purposes of cleansing; and therefore it is called by the apostle "the blood of the everlasting covenant," because the eternal Three entered into a covenant, and by an eternal purpose decreed to bring many sons unto glory through the obedience and blood-shedding of Jesus Christ. He being a person in the Godhead coequal and coeternal with the Father, undertook, as their representative, to obey the law for them, and to suffer the penalties, to shed the blood, and to die the death which they deserved, and thus to satisfy all the demands which his Father's justice had upon them. The Father accepted him as their substitute, and was well-pleased with them for his sake, even before he came in the flesh; and when he did come in the fulness of time to put away sin by the infinitely perfect sacrifice of himself, and when he said upon the cross, "It is finished," then the blood of the everlasting covenant made a full and perfect atonement for their sins. Of this there can be no doubt, because he rose from the grave in a public character, as the first fruit of the dead, and because he afterwards ascended up on high to give gifts unto men, and, according to his most true promise, he gave his royal gifts, even to the rebellious. He sent them the Holy Ghost the comforter, whose office in the covenant it was to awaken sinners, dead asleep in sin, to convince them of their guilt and danger, and to bring them to the blood of sprinkling to be made clean. When the Holy Spirit thus graciously stirs up and disposes them to be cleansed in the fountain, which was opened for sin and for uncleanness, why should not they instantly make use of it? The fountain can cleanse them. It is almighty to cleanse from all sin. The holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity have covenanted to give an infinitely purifying virtue to it. Although Jesus alone shed his blood, yet the Father covenanted to accept it, and the Holy Spirit covenanted to apply it and to make it effectual to the sinner's heart; so that the whole Trinity have appointed it to be an infallible cleanser. And let troubled consciences remember, that the divine virtue and almighty power of the Godhead will now work with the blood of the everlasting covenant to make it effectual for every end and purpose for which it was shed; yea, even the Father's justice, from which they had most to fear, is as much bound to save those who seek to be cleansed by the blood of Christ, as his mercy; for infinite justice has been satisfied with the shedding of this blood. All its demands have been fully answered, and justice and mercy are now alike engaged to receive those sinners who come to Jesus to be made clean. Think of this, thou afflicted soul, tossed with doubts and fears, and not comforted. Why cannot that blood satisfy thy conscience, which has satisfied the infinite justice of God? The Lord deliver thee from unbelief, and help thee to rely upon the blood of the everlasting covenant, until thou find every thing that is said of it in scripture to be infallibly true by thine own experience.

The wonderful property, then, of this fountain comes from hence, that there is in it the most precious blood of Christ, which has a divine virtue and power to cleanse, as the whole scripture bears testimony. Under the ceremonial dispensation, whenever any person had broken the law, he was pronounced unclean, and was shut out of the camp, until he was cleansed by blood. He was to bring his sacrifice to the priest, who was to slay it, and then to sprinkle the blood of it upon the unclean, that he might be sanctified to the purifying of the flesh. Thus the Mosaic ceremonies, which were figures of good things to come, then taught the sinner, that as his sin shut him out of the congregation of the Lord's people below, so would it shut him out of the congregation above, into which nothing unclean can enter; and then they further taught him the infinite efficacy of Christ's blood to do away sin; for if the blood of the sacrifices could cleanse outwardly, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself, without spot, to God, purge the conscience from dead works to serve the living God

Thus the ceremonial law showed that blood could cleanse, and referred the sinner to the blood of the Lamb of God, by faith in which he might be made clean. The New Testament refers him to the same fountain, and has given such descriptions of it, as ought to silence doubts and fears, and to enable every convinced sinner to rely upon its virtue, and to wash and be clean. All that Jesus has purchased; all that the Holy Spirit has to apply; all the graces of time, and all the blessings of eternity, are ascribed to the merit of his most precious blood-shedding. Thus the scriptures set forth its inestimable value. By it the price of our redemption was paid. The debt was so immense, for which justice had seized upon our persons and estates, that we could not be redeemed with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. The blood alone of that God-man was sufficient to pay our ransom, and he paid it to the utmost farthing, as these scriptures testify: "In whom we have redemption through his blood," Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14. And as the redeemed of the Lord could thus say by faith, "we have redemption through his blood;" so we read, in Rev. v. that the redeemed of the Lord in heaven sang a new song, when the sealed book was given to the lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, who alone prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof, saying, "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood." Through his blood also we have remission and forgiveness of sins. Without shedding of blood there is no remission, and no blood could merit remission but his, as he says himself: "This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins," Matt. xxvi. 28. And the apostle, speaking of himself and of the Colossians, says, by it they had remission: "In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins," Col. i. 14. And the apostle John thus praises Christ for this blessing: "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen." Rev. i. 5, 6. And as believers have redemption and remission of sins through the most precious blood of Christ, so have they also through it another inestimable privilege, even free justification, according to what is written, Rom. v. 8, 9. "While we were yet enemies, Christ died for us. Much more, then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him." And we are thus justified and saved through faith in his blood;—for "we are justified freely by grace through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 24, 25. And being thus justified by faith in his blood, we have another privilege, greater than the world can give, and such as the world cannot take away, even peace with God: "But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ: for he is our peace," Eph. ii. 13, 14. He was constituted and appointed by the covenant the Prince of peace, who was to reconcile God and man: "for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven," Col. i. 19, 20. And when the sinner is reconciled to the Father by faith in the blood of his Son, then the sense of this peace will enable him to rejoice in God, through Jesus Christ his Lord, by whom he hath now received the atonement. And when he is thus redeemed, and his sins are forgiven, and person justified, and the peace of God rules in his heart, then there is another blessed privilege received by the blood of Christ, even sanctification. "The bodies of those beasts," says the apostle, "whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burnt without the camp: wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate," Heb. xiii. 11, 12. His people are delivered from the dominion as well as from the guilt of sin by the merit of his blood: for he "gave himself for them, that he might redeem them from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works," Titus ii. 14. He gave himself to death for them, that he might redeem them from the power of iniquity, as well as from the guilt and punishment of it, as the apostle witnesses, Col. i. 21, 22: "And you, that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your minds by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled, in the body of his flesh, through death, to present you holy and unblamable, and unreprovable in his sight." And when believers are thus, through obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ, renewed day by day in the spirits of their minds, then they have another exceeding great and precious privilege, namely, liberty of approaching God, and access with confidence unto him, as their reconciled Father. Their happiness in this respect is greater than can be expressed. They can cast all their care upon him, and thereby ease themselves of the burden, and they can lay all their wants and complaints before him, knowing that their God will supply all their wants out of the riches of his glory in Christ Jesus. And this inestimable privilege comes to them through the blood of Christ, as the apostle has proved, Heb. x. 19, 20, &c.: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the vail, that is to say, his flesh; and having a high priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith."

These are some of the privileges which believers receive from the most precious blood-shedding of Jesus Christ: and are not these sufficient to demonstrate the infinitely cleansing virtue of the fountain of his blood? For by it they are washed from every pollution and defilement of sin, and are presented without spot or blemish before God. Did sin bring them into captivity? The blood of Christ redeems them from all their enemies, who led them captive—from sin and Satan, from death and hell. Did sin bring guilt into the conscience? The sprinkling of the blood of Jesus takes it out, and speaks pardon and forgiveness. Did sin make us unrighteous, and condemn us at God's bar? There is now no condemnation to them, who are justified by the blood of Christ. Did sin provoke a holy God, and arm his justice to execute the pains and penalties of the broken law upon the transgressors? Christ has made peace by the blood of the cross, and he gives them peace in their consciences, when they are justified by faith. Are we by nature sold under sin, and under its power and dominion? The blood of Christ has merit and efficacy in it to purge our consciences from dead works to serve the living God. Did sin shut the door of mercy against us, so that God would receive none of our prayers or services? The blood of Christ has opened new and living way, and believers may with boldness enter into the holiest with their petitions; for whatever they ask of the Father in his Son's name, he will give it them. Thus the blood of Christ saves from all iniquity. Whatever pollution or guilt iniquity had brought upon the soul, all is done away in the fountain of his blood. And these scriptures have so particularly described its virtue, that convinced sinners might have strong encouragement to rely upon its power to cleanse from all sin: for the Lord God has appointed it for this purpose, and it cannot fail of answering it, because he is almighty to render his own appointment effectual. The blood of Christ cleanses by a divine virtue, which nothing can resist. God has engaged and promised that his almighty power shall work in the application of this blood, and that not only in the present life, but also in the next. He has given to it an infinite and eternal virtue. It can cleanse for ever. Oh! doubt not then of any lesser virtue ascribed to it in scripture, since it has the greatest that possibly can be. Surely it can cleanse in time, since it can cleanse to eternity. "Christ by his own blood entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us," Heb. ix. 12. "For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," Heb. x. 14. And when the beloved apostle saw in a vision the great multitude, whom no man could number, standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands, and one of the elders asked him, "What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said unto me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," Rev. vii. 13, 14. These precious robes, in which they appear before God, and stand confirmed for ever and ever in bliss, were washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb; and this gives them an eternal purity and endless glory.

Has not the fountain, then, which was opened for sin and for uncleanness, a divine property, since believers receive from it all the blessings of time and all the blessings of eternity? The scriptures which I have quoted ascribe to it the wonderful power of cleansing from all sin, and that for ever. Sins of the greatest guilt, scarlet, crimson sins, whose deep dye cannot be taken out by any other means, washed in the blood of the Lamb, become as white as snow: and the fountain which has this infinite virtue stands open, night and day. It cleanses freely, without money and without price. Whosoever will, let him come and be made clean. The Spirit and the bride invite him, and say, Come; and let him that heareth say, Come; and let him that desires to be cleansed, come. Come, and try its virtue, and it will infallibly succeed. Though thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand sinners have washed in it, and been made clean, yet it has lost none of its virtue. Still it is almighty to do away sin. Whosoever is washed in the blood of Christ, is made clean and pure to all eternity. My brethren, do you believe this? And do you desire to experience its cleansing virtue? Have you been convinced of the polluting nature of sin, and how it has defiled your souls, and rendered them in the sight of a holy God more filthy and abominable than the most loathsome object is in our eyes? and would you be made clean freely by the blood of the Lamb of God? Is this the prayer of your heart? "I am convinced that God is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity, and I am nothing but iniquity." "Oh! that the Lamb of God would take pity on me, and out of his mere love and mercy cleanse my polluted soul from every spot and stain of sin. I believe nothing else can cleanse me but his most precious blood; and it cannot cleanse unless it be applied and received by faith. Lord, apply it then for thy mercy's sake, and wash my soul in the fountain which was opened for sin and for uncleanness." If these be your real desires, you will follow me, profitably, to the consideration of the Fourth particular I was to treat of; namely, By what means and in what way sinners receive and partake of its cleansing property. Although Christ has shed his blood, and although it can cleanse from all sin; yet it cannot cleanse unless it be applied. You can have no benefit from it unless it be sprinkled upon your consciences. By the shedding of it he obtained merit to cleanse; but the efficacy of it in cleansing comes from the application. The law pointed out this in the sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifices, and particularly in the cleansing of the leper. When the priest had examined him, and found the plague of the leprosy was healed, then the leper was to bring his sacrifice, and it was offered for him, and its blood was shed; but he was not pronounced legally clean until the blood was sprinkled upon him. The shedding of the blood did not cleanse without the application. And these figures of the law are applied to Christ in the New Testament. The apostle Paul speaks of the sprinkling of the heart from an evil conscience; and the apostle Peter shows what it is which is able thus to cleanse the heart; namely, the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. This speaketh better things than that of Abel. Abel's blood cried for vengeance; but Christ's blood cries for mercy; and when it is applied, it sprinkles the heart from an evil conscience, and purges it from dead works to serve the living God.

This consideration brings us to meditate upon the offices of the Holy Spirit. As Christ covenanted to shed his blood, so the Holy Spirit covenanted to apply the merits of it, and to render it effectual to the sinner's heart. This is his office-character: he was to take of the things of Christ, and to show them unto us, to show us our want of them, and then to show us our interest in them. And in the present case he was to convince sinners that they wanted cleansing, and that there was a fountain opened for uncleanness, and by his grace he enables them to wash and be clean. As there can be no outward washing away of any pollution, but by an outward application; so there can be no inward cleansing, but by his spiritual application. If there were a bath famous for curing some particular disease, you know it could not cure the diseased person unless he was bathed in it; so neither can this fountain. It was opened for use; and whoever is cleansed by it must be washed in it, inwardly and spiritually, by the Holy Spirit. He applies, and faith receives, the benefit of that blood, which cleanses from all sin: for the apostle, speaking of Christ, says, "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 25. The shedding of his blood had merit to cleanse; but faith apprehends it, and receives its cleansing virtue. That faith which is the gift of the Holy Spirit, and is wrought in the heart by his operation, relies upon the blood of Christ, and puts its whole trust and confidence in its power to cleanse, and then finds the heart sprinkled with it from an evil conscience, guilt being taken out, and peace brought in, with love and joy, and all the graces of the Spirit of God.

From what has been said, it appears, that there is a fountain open for sin and for uncleanness, and that the blood of Jesus Christ can cleanse from all sin. It had this virtue given it by the covenant of grace, when the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity agreed to give their power to it; and nothing can resist the power of the Godhead. He who shed it was God and man in one person. As God he was coequal and coeternal with the Father, and when he took our nature, that in it he might obey and suffer for sinners, nothing could be wanting to render his obedience and sufferings absolutely complete: for all the works of God are perfect; nothing can be added to them, or taken from them. When Jesus shed his blood upon the cross, it was the will of the ever-blessed

Trinity that this blood should be of infinite efficacy to take away sin. It cannot want power to cleanse, because the whole power of the Godhead is engaged to make it effectual. It is the blood of the everlasting covenant. The Son has shed it, and the Father has received it as a full satisfaction and atonement for sin, and the application of it is now in the hand of the eternal and almighty Spirit; and when he applies it, and gives the sinner faith to rely upon it, what can then resist its power, or hinder its efficacy? My brethren, how do you find your hearts affected with these great truths? Do you see the polluting nature of sin, and do you desire to be cleansed from it in the fountain of Christ's blood? And do you therefore desire it, that you may be made holy as well as righteous? Would you have the blood of Christ to save you by its efficacy from the dominion of sin, as well as to save you by its merits from the guilt of sin? Sirs, what say your hearts to these things? Do you really wish to be cleansed from the power, as well as from the pollution of sin? If you do not wish for it, what do you think of the text? Is it true that there is a fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness? and has the blood of Christ the cleansing virtue here ascribed to it? Can it take out the guilt of sins of the deepest dye? Are scarlet, crimson sins washed in it as white as snow? Surely they are; for it can cleanse from all sin. By the shedding of his blood, Christ obtained infinite merit to cleanse sinners; but in order to their being cleansed, it must be applied; and the application is now made by the grace of the Holy Spirit. Has he then applied it to you or not? This is the main point. Have you been washed in this fountain and been made clean? What are you the better for its cleansing others, if it never cleanse your souls? You can be benefited only from its application to you in particular, and by your experiencing the power of it in your own hearts. Let each of us, then, examine ourselves concerning this particular; and may we do it, through the assistance of God, with profit and improvement!

1. It is not unlikely but there may be some persons here who are not thoroughly acquainted with the defiling nature of sin, and who never heartily desired to be cleansed from it. This is the case of all unawakened sinners. They see not the pollution of their hearts, and lives, and therefore they are easy and content in their present state, without ever desiring to be cleansed by the blood of Christ. Does any one's conscience speak to him at present, and say—"This is my case; I have not been cleansed from my sins; nor do I desire it. My sins are so sweet and pleasing to me, that I should be very unhappy if I were to part with them." But are they more sweet and pleasant than heaven? and would you part with heaven rather than part with them? Consider this matter a little. You must part with one or the other; for hear what God says of you in his word. You are the objects of his hatred. "Thou, O God!" says the Psalmist, "hatest all workers of iniquity," Psal. v. 5. Yea, so great is his hatred, that he cannot suffer you to appear before him. "Thou art of purer eyes," says the prophet, "than to behold evil, and canst not look upon iniquity," Hab. i. 13. And if you die in your iniquity, without the blood of sprinkling, you can never enter into heaven: "For no unclean person hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God," Eph. v. 5. To which agree the words of St. John in his description of the heavenly Jerusalem, "there shall in nowise enter into it any thing that defileth." This awful scripture will be fulfilled in you. In nowise shall you enter into the city of the living God, unless your polluted souls be washed in the Redeemer's blood. You will be shut out of his presence and glory, and your eternal habitation will be with unclean spirits, in the regions of torment and despair.

But, bad though your present state be, yet the gospel sets before you perfect deliverance. You are invited to come and be made clean. The fountain is open; and if you now find it in your heart to make use of it, you may be washed in it without money and without price. All is free. Your sins shall be freely pardoned, and your pollutions freely cleansed. Free grace shall do all for you, and all in you. And this day you have an offer of all its blessings. Close in with it, and they are all yours. But if you now reject them, you cannot pretend that you never heard of your danger; for you have now been warned of it. You cannot plead your ignorance of the merits of Christ's blood; for you have now heard what great things the scripture says of it. From it are received all the graces of time, and all the blessings of eternity; and you have been invited to come, and to be cleansed freely in the fountain that was opened for sin and for uncleanness. If, then, you still refuse to be washed in this fountain, you are without excuse: for if you reject this wilfully, and harden your hearts against it, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. Meditate upon this scripture. Think seriously what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God. And may the eternal Spirit set in with this consideration, and so effectually convince you of the pollution and guilt of your sins, that you may seek to be made clean, and may find the blood of Jesus Christ, cleansing you from all sin.

2. Are there any of you, my brethren, who are now desiring to be made clean, and to be washed from all your sins? For you the fountain stands open; and what should hinder you from making use of it? Do you doubt of its power to cleanse you? Remember it is the blood of the everlasting covenant. It cleanses in virtue of the covenant of the ever-blessed Trinity, and consequently by the power of the Godhead. Father, Son, and Holy Spirit have agreed to make it almighty to do away sin; so that it cannot cleanse only in time, but it can also cleanse for ever and ever. This is the plain doctrine of scripture, and if you believe it, why do you not find great joy and peace in believing it?

Perhaps you think it can cleanse, but you are afraid it is not appointed for your cleansing. Nay, my brethren, reason not against your own comforts. For whom was it appointed, if not for you, who see your want of it, and who are desirous of experiencing its divine power? You have the warrant of God's word, authorising you to wash and be clean. The text says, the fountain was for the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for the professing members of the visible church; that, whenever any of them were convinced of their uncleanness, they might make use of this fountain, and have their hearts cleansed from an evil conscience. Oh! reject not then the offered blessing. Take it upon the warrant and authority of God's word, and doubt not but the fountain is open for you.

Why, then, are you not cleansed in it? Are you afraid that your sins are so many and so great that you cannot be made clean? As to their number, it can cleanse from all sin; and as to their greatness, it can take out the guilt of scarlet, crimson sins—the greatest that possibly can be: therefore this is no objection. You may come with all your sins and be washed freely from all in the fountain of Christ's blood.

Come then—But you draw back; you fear it would be presumption in such a sinner as you are. What! Is it presumption to believe in the word of God, which cannot be broken, and to rely upon the promises of God which are as unchangeable as himself? No. It is glorifying God, and honouring his word: whereas you make God a liar by your false modesty, as if he could break his word to you, and as if you might be disappointed when you claimed the fulfilling of his promises. My brethren, these things cannot be. God's word and promises are, like himself, without any variableness or shadow of turning; and whatever they offer you is yours, when you rely upon him for the receiving of it from his free grace. And since you have the authority of God's word and promises to silence your doubts and fears, are you resolved in the strength of grace to rely upon them? If you be, then they shall be made good to you. Heaven and earth shall pass away, rather than one tittle of them shall fail. Your robes shall be washed in the blood of the Lamb; and whatever graces and blessings Jesus has to give his people, shall be yours, in time and in eternity.

3. Perhaps some persons may inquire, Of what use is this fountain to believers? The uses of it are many and great. All their graces flow from it; all their duties are to be washed in it; and all their comforts are maintained by it. Surely, then, it is of great and infinite service to believers. Under the third head of this discourse I considered the high character given in scripture of this fountain. From it are received redemption, forgiveness of sins, justification, peace with God, sanctification, freedom of access to God, as a reconciled Father, eternal redemption, and the robe of everlasting righteousness, in which the saints stand confirmed in bliss. All these graces and blessings flow from the fountain of Christ's blood, and flow freely. They cost us nothing. They are the free gifts of our loving Saviour, which, of his abundant mercy, he bestows upon his people; and this makes his blood very precious to them, that the gifts, which are inestimable, they receive from it freely; and by their repeated trials of its worth and value they grow in the knowledge and love of its preciousness: for they find it not only necessary for their sins, but also for their duties. The holiest duty, which was ever done by a mere man, wanted washing in this fountain. The ceremonial law taught this doctrine in a very clear manner; for upon the holy crown of the high priest there was a plate of pure gold, with this inscription, Holiness to the Lord: "And it shall be upon Aaron's forehead, that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts; and it shall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the Lord," Exod. xxviii. 38. Herein he represented the office of the high priest of our profession, who bears the iniquity of our holy things; for there is imperfection in every duty, in every act of obedience some short coming, which requires the atoning blood of Christ, that it may be accepted before the Lord. There is no believer who loves God in that perfect manner which the spirituality of the law requires. This appears very evidently from their failings in the services which they pay him. When do they pray without some wandering thoughts? When do they hear the word as in the presence of God, and receive it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God? Do they not sometimes hear with great dulness, and at other times are not able to mix faith with what they hear? Are they not negligent in searching the scriptures, and negligent in praying for a blessing, when they do search them? How little do they treasure up in their memories? and how little fruit does the engrafted word bring forth in their lives? When they go to the Lord's table, how often do they complain of their want of devotion and gratitude? And therefore their services, yea, the very best of them, because of these imperfections and short comings, would not be acceptable, unless they were washed in the fountain of Christ's blood. Sensible of this they live by faith upon fresh applications of it, suing for its merit and hoping for its efficacy in every thing they do. And as the acceptance of their duties, so their comforts are derived from the blood of Christ. Their love, their peace, their joy flow from this fountain. This is their continual matter of rejoicing, that the blood of Christ was freely shed for them, and that he, who gave his blood for them, will with it give them all things. This bears them up under trials, strengthens them against temptations, supports them in sickness, and arms them against death. They know that all these things are working together, under God, for their good. Yea, they experience it, and that makes them happy; happy in time, and happy in eternity. What is now their crown of rejoicing below, will be much more so above. Then their joy will be full, when they shall join that innumerable company, whom no man can number, and with them give honour and glory, and blessing and praise to him that was slain, and hath redeemed them unto God by his blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hath made them kings and priests unto God and his Father. Then they will know how to value that blood which brought them to such perfect and eternal blessedness. O Lord! help us to set a greater value upon it than we commonly do. Teach us more of our want of it, and of its worth. Supply us more abundantly with the graces and blessings purchased by its merit, and freely bestowed by its efficacy. And may the dear Lamb of God give his blessing to what has been now spoken, although it has been in much weakness, that, if it be his holy will, all who hear me this day may be brought to see and to lament their spiritual uncleanness, and to apply for cleansing to the blood of Jesus. Oh that the Lord God would direct you all to the fountain which he has opened for sin and for uncleanness; and may he give you faith to wash in it and to be cleansed from all sin, according to what we have been asking this day in the excellent words of our church.

"Grant, we beseech thee, merciful Lord, to thy faithful people, pardon and peace; that they may be cleansed from all their sins, and serve thee with a quiet mind through Jesus Christ our Lord." Amen.

DISCOURSE XI.

THE BALM OF GILEAD.

Is there no balm in Gilead? is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?—Jer. viii. 22.

All men love health. The desire of it is founded in nature. It is one of the natural instincts which never leaves us. So long as we love pleasure and hate pain, we cannot but love health, as the chief of all outward blessings. Indeed, it is to be desired beyond them all, because without it we can enjoy none of them; without it we are unfit for our worldly business and employment, and unfit for the duties of religion. A good man would therefore wish for health with a view to the concerns of a better life, as well as to those of the present life. All men desire it upon a temporal account. But, alas! how few have any real desire for the health of the soul! If the body be in great pain, with what haste do they send for relief! and how carefully do they follow the physician's prescription! But when their souls are wounded with sin, and they may endure the smart and anguish of their wounds for ever (for these are by any human means incurable); and when a divine remedy is proposed, and they hear of a loving and an almighty physician, under whose hands no patient was ever lost; yet they have not one wish to be healed. What can be the reason of this? Why are the very men who, with an invariable affection, love bodily health, so far from desiring the health of the soul, that when they have an offer of being healed of all their spiritual maladies, they neglect the remedy and despise the physician? Is not this unaccountable conduct? What can make the same men in the same case reason so differently? If they had an infallible remedy for the recovery of bodily health, there is not one of them who would reject it; but there is a sovereign remedy for the recovery of the health of the soul; there is a balm in Gilead, and a most kind and able physician there to apply it; and yet spiritual maladies abound. Let us inquire into the cause of this inconsistent behaviour. It is an inquiry in which we are all nearly concerned. Our welfare depends on our being healed of the wounds of sin by this balm of Gilead. We can have no true peace of conscience here, nor no true happiness hereafter, unless we take this sovereign medicine. May the Lord God dispose us all to take it by means of what shall be said in opening and explaining the text; in which there is,

First, Some sickness referred to.

Secondly, A sovereign medicine:—there is balm in Gilead to heal it.

Thirdly, A great physician to apply it: and all the means of healing being thus ready at hand, the question naturally follows, in the Fourth place, Why, then, is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?

If we look back to the 17th verse, we shall find an account of the sickness referred to in the text. The people were stung with serpents and cockatrices, and of the most venomous and fiery sort, whose poison, once infused into the blood, acts like the most raging fire, consuming and drying up the fluids of the body, and in a short time bringing on certain death. "For behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you, saith the Lord." This is a just picture of that more deadly poison which the old serpent, the devil, infused into both body and soul; the effects of which all the human race have felt; for he drew us all into sin, and the dreadful consequences of sin appear in that variety of diseases which bring down our bodies to the grave of death, and in that variety of corrupt and depraved appetites which proves the soul to be alienated from the life of God, and to be incapable, unless it be entirely changed, of enjoying God. It was sin which thus poisoned our nature: for before sin entered into the world, all things were good. There was no evil to afflict either body or soul. But when sin entered, then the sanction of the law took place, "In the day that thou eatest of the forbidden fruit, dying thou shalt die." Gen. ii. 17. In that day thy body shall become mortal, and liable to those pains and diseases, which in a course of years shall destroy its animal life; and thy soul shall be separated from the fountain of spiritual life, and cut off from all communion with God in this world; and in the next it shall be separated from him for ever; which is the second death. O sin! what hast thou done? Thou art the author of all the evils which mankind are capable of suffering in earth and hell. Thou broughtest them all upon us, thou enemy of God and man. And wilt thou afterwards pretend to be our friend? Wilt thou come to court us with promises of happiness, that, by deceiving us, thou mayest more effectually poison and destroy our bodies and souls? Look upon this base traitor, my brethren. Can he be a friend to your nature, who has subjected it to all the miseries of mortality? If you have any true love for yourselves, how can you love and cherish sin, which has made you liable to suffer the first and the second death? What! is this a friend to be taken into your bosom? one that will murder your body, and bring both body and soul into hell? Accustom yourselves to view sin in this light, and it will help you to see the horrible destructive nature of it. When you behold a dead corpse, think what a murderer sin is: for that body would never have died, if sin had not poisoned it. And then turn your eyes inwards, and let each man say to himself—This beloved body of mine, upon which I spend so much time and care, was made mortal by sin; and all the pains and diseases which I can suffer came from the same cursed cause; yea, from it came all the miseries which I deserve to suffer with devils and condemned spirits in the fire that never is to be quenched: and shall I love and delight to serve such an enemy? shall I give up the members of my body as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, and so work out mine own everlasting destruction? God forbid. As sin is the author of all the evil, which I do or can endure, I will therefore fight against it; and may the Lord God save me from the guilt, and deliver me from the dominion of it!

This is the language of every heart which is made sensible of the poisonous qualities of sin. When the awakened sinner feels the malignant venom working in his constitution, he will be led to abhor and to detest it, and the more so, when the scripture discovers to him the execrable foe, who poisoned him with sin; and that was the old serpent. What these serpents are said, in the 17th verse, to have done to the body, in poisoning it, the same did he both to body and soul; and as he did it at first in the serpent, he has therefore been known and distinguished by this name from the time that he deceived our first parents in the subtle serpent. The apostle has given us a very alarming description of him, Rev. xii. 9, where he is treating of the war which was in heaven between Michael and his angels, and the dragon and his angels. "And the great dragon," he says, "was cast out; the old serpent, called the devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole world." Here he is called the serpent, alluding to his crafty wiliness; and the old serpent, to denote his having employed all his wiles to deceive and ruin mankind. As soon as they were created, he plotted their destruction, and he became Satan, their sworn adversary, and the devil, their accuser, who sought to destroy their precious lives with the rage of a dragon; yea, with more rage than common dragons have, even with the burning fury of the great dragon. And, alas! he was successful: for he deceiveth the whole world: he poisoned the whole human race: he corrupted all flesh, and we are now groaning under the dreadful effects of our total corruption. The cursed venom of sin, which he infused into our bodies, still works in them; but its more cursed venom still works, though less perceptibly, in our souls. The poison keeps working in the body, until it bring on sickness and death, and reduce us to the dust, from whence we were taken; and it keeps working in the soul in every hateful and unholy temper, which tends to stir up the wrath and indignation of God, and to separate the soul for ever and ever from him, the fountain of life and glory.

This is the great and universal malady referred to in the text—the malady of sin, with which the old serpent, the devil, has poisoned the whole world. When he deceived our first parents, he then poisoned the fountain; and all the streams which have been ever since flowing from it partake of the direful infection: for the word of truth declares, "That as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned." Here the entrance of sin is said to be the cause of the entrance of death, and we all die in Adam, therefore we all sinned in him; for the wages of sin is death. Now God, being infinitely just and righteous, would not pay the wages, unless there were some sin to deserve them; but infants receive the wages of sin, and consequently they are sinners; they die in Adam, because in him they sinned. "For by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation." Thus was our whole nature, both body and soul, corrupted by the fall; and there is not a sound part or faculty in either of them. They are corrupt and abominable altogether, and in nothing does this total corruption more evidently discover itself than in their entire blindness and insensibility of their dangerous condition. They are poisoned, and yet they know it not; nay, they are so unwilling to know it, that when we inform them of it, they are highly offended. They cannot bear to be told of it, no, not by the ministers of the gospel, whose office and duty it is. We are sure to stir up their rage and hatred, if we discover to them the workings of this poison in their hearts; and if we appeal to the effects of it in their lives, and refer them to the plentiful streams of iniquity, which are continually flowing from the corrupt fountain of the heart, then they cannot bear us; they are like the deaf adder, that stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming ever so wisely. They are resolved not to be disturbed about their sins, and therefore they will not hear of their sickness or of their danger. They had rather die of their malady than be made uneasy about it. Let sin do its worst in the next life, in the present they will enjoy it; and in sweet security, too, if they can. Is not this an astonishing degree of infatuation? Is it not one of the strongest delusions of the devil, that he should make those very men insensible of their spiritual maladies, who are exquisitely sensible of the least bodily malady, whose fears are all alarmed at the thoughts of their dying to this world, but who have not the least concern about their dying from God and glory? Are any of you, my brethren, in this case? Are you easy about the state of your souls, having never been in any distress about original and actual sin? Did you never feel yourselves so sick of both, that you were afraid you should perish everlastingly? If not, consider what it is which keeps you in this fatal security. Are not you sinners? For all have sinned. And has not sin poisoned both body and soul? And is not this one of the sad, stupifying effects of its poison, that, while there is but a step between you and death, yet you have no concern about your being healed? Are these things so? If they be, may the almighty God awaken you to a sense of your danger. Oh that he may set home and fix such a conviction of sin upon your consciences, that, feeling your malady, you may earnestly seek the great physician's help, and may happily find that there is balm in Gilead; which is the Second particular I was to consider. Glory be to God, who hath not left us without remedy. Our disease is dangerous, but there is balm in Gilead, which can heal perfectly and eternally. The country of Gilead was famous for a precious balm which grew there. "Go up to Gilead, and take balm," says the prophet Jeremiah, xlvi. 11. Its healing virtue is described by him, chap. li. 8, where, speaking of the downfal of Babylon, he says, "Take balm for her pain, if so be she may be healed." This sovereign medicine, which then grew in Gilead, could assuage the pain of wounds, and heal them, and thereby was a type of the gracious remedy which God had provided for the healing of the wounds of sin; namely, the most precious blood of the Lamb of God, applied and made effectual by the Holy Spirit: for as this cleanses away all the pollutions, so it heals all the diseases of sin. The scripture has treated largely of its healing virtue; but it is nowhere more forcibly recommended than in the parable of the good Samaritan. Our Lord says, "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead." This certain man was Adam, whose possession was in a paradise of peace and rest; and there he was, innocent, safe and happy: but he left this blissful state of his own accord, contrary to God's express commandment, and he fell among thieves—Satan and his angels—who drew him into sin, stripped him of his raiment, and robbed him of his righteousness, in which his soul had hitherto appeared in immaculate purity before God. This spotless robe they took away, and left poor fallen man naked and wounded. They wounded his body with those pains and diseases which bring it down to the dust, from whence it was taken; and they wounded his soul in all its faculties; his understanding with darkness; his will with a vicious choice; and his affections with worldly-mindedness; so that he placed his love upon the creature instead of the Creator: they wounded his conscience with guilt, and with fear of death and of hell. "And they departed, leaving him half dead;" for his soul, the better part, was separated from God, and already dead in trespasses and sins, and the body was dying. When man was fallen into this helpless state, the patriarchal dispensation took place from Adam to Moses, under which the first-born was priest, and had a right to offer up the appointed sacrifices; but these could not give life to the sinner, and therefore the priest came and looked upon him, and passed by on the one side, being unable to raise him up from the death of sin. Next succeeded the Levitical dispensation from Moses to Christ: the Levite came and looked upon him, and passed by on the other side, being unable, by any of the legal rites and ceremonies, to raise fallen man to his former righteousness and perfection. "But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was." Samaritan signifies a keeper; and it here stands for the keeper of Israel, whose compassions fail not: "for when he saw him, he had compassion on him." His love disposed him to use his power for the sinner's recovery. He was almighty, and he resolved to use his almighty power to heal him. He went up to him, and applied the balm of Gilead—"he bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine; wine, the established type of the most precious blood of the Lamb of God; and oil, the known emblem of the salutary influence of the Holy Spirit. Pour these into the deepest and most dangerous wounds of sin, and they will infallibly work a perfect cure; for the blood has a divine virtue to heal, being appointed and ordained of God for that very purpose. It cleanseth us, says one who had experienced its virtue, and by cleansing healeth us from all sin. And no wonder; because it is the blood of God. He who shed it was God and man united in one Christ, and therefore it had infinite and divine merit: and when he stood in the place of sinners, obeyed and suffered for them, and was obedient even unto death, his obedience and sufferings could want nothing to render them as satisfactory as the law and justice of the Father could require; because his blood had virtue as a release to discharge believers from all the pains and penalties to which they were subjected for their sins, and as a purchase to put them in possession of their forfeited estate. The apostle describes its operating as a release, when he says of it, "that we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins;" and as a purchase, when he says, "that Christ, having washed us from our sins in his own blood, hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father."

Now, since the blood of Christ has this sovereign healing virtue, and since we have through it redemption, even eternal redemption from all the pains and miseries of sin, surely, then, it is an essential ingredient in that precious balm of Gilead, which has virtue to heal every sinner who takes it, let his case be ever so dangerous. But then it must be taken. A sick man may have a very good remedy at hand; but if he never take it, it can never cure him. In like manner, it is not enough that the blood of Christ can heal, but, in order to heal, it must be applied. The application makes it effectual, and therefore we read of the blood of sprinkling both in the Old Testament and in the New. The blood must be sprinkled upon the conscience, in order to heal the wounds of sin; and this is the office of the Holy Spirit. He applies the blood of Christ: he brings this healing balm to the wounded soul. And as oil was the emblem of his salutary influence, therefore, in the good Samaritan's prescription, we find the medicine was made up of oil and wine; of the blood of Christ; and of the grace of his Spirit; which two, sweetly joined and tempered together, make up the healing balm of Gilead. There is not a wound of sin so deep, a disease of sin so desperate, but the blood of Christ, applied by the Holy Spirit, can heal them: for God hereby healeth the broken in heart, and giveth this medicine to heal their sickness. Although they be half dead, yet it can recover them; because it operates by a divine and almighty power. The blood of Christ can raise the deadest soul to justification of life, and through sanctification of the Spirit this life is renewed and strengthened, day by day, until every spiritual malady of sin be removed, and sorrow and sighing be done away for ever. Hear this, ye mourners in Sion, and lift up your drooping heads. Looking into yourselves, you may have reason to grieve. Your sins are many and great. They have wounded your consciences. You feel the smart, and your distress is exquisite. But despair not. Lo! there is balm in Gilead. The blood of Jesus is an infallible remedy. The Holy Spirit is almighty to apply it; and he has already showed you your want of it. Oh that he may give you grace to wait until he supply your wants, and you feel its sovereign virtue healing your wounded consciences! And to encourage you to seek and wait until you find, remember that there is not only balm in Gilead, but also that there is a physician there; as I am, in the Third place, to consider, Under whose hands you cannot fail of a perfect recovery; and he is no less a person than the great physician of souls, who is also God over all, blessed for ever. He who created all things, visible and invisible, and who supports them by the word of his power, vouchsafes to heal his people of their sins; so there can be no doubt of his power, because he is almighty to heal. And can there be any doubt of his love? Did not his love bring him down from heaven to the lowest humiliation, even to veil his divine glory under a covering of flesh? and did not his love then lead him to put forth his divine power to heal every one who applied to him for a bodily cure? Whereby he demonstrated to us his readiness to exert the same power to heal the spiritual infirmities of those who come to him for his assistance. The eternal God, whom angels and archangels worship and adore, was pleased to be manifested in the flesh; so that God and man were one Christ, and the one Christ, the God-man, stood up in the place of sinners, as their representative: for them he obeyed the law, and suffered the pains and penalties due to the breach of it, that by his stripes they might be healed: he was obedient, even unto death, and then rising from the dead, as their representative, he wrought out an all-perfect righteousness for them, which being imputed unto them by faith, they thereby received justification to life, and all the deadly wounds of sin are healed. Thus the great physician of souls has demonstrated his love. You may read it in every action of his life, and in every suffering unto death. You may read it engraven in every wound of his crucified body. What were the marks and scars which the crown of thorns made in his head, and the whips and scourges made on his back, but visible signs and seals of his love? The love which led him to his agony and bloody sweat, to his bitter cross and passion, was greater than that of the strongest instinct and natural affection in the human breast: "For can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion upon the son of her womb? Yea, they may forget, yet will not I forget thee, saith the Lord: for I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands." While he looks upon them, he cannot forget his people; because on the palms of his hands are the prints of the nails by which he was fastened to the cross; and these prints are the precious engravings of his wonderful love. Look upon the crucified Jesus, my Christian brethren, as wounded for your transgressions, and bruised for your iniquities, and see if ever there was love like his. Every wound speaks forth his love; every bruise loudly proclaims the greatness of it. His death demonstrates his love to have been stronger than death, and his pierced side showed that he had set his people as a seal upon his heart; for from thence there flowed blood and water; water to cleanse the pollution, and blood to heal the wounds of their sins. Surely, then, he who shed his heart's blood for them cannot want love. Let this encourage poor dejected souls to wait upon him. Why are ye so troubled, as if God had not provided a medicine to heal the broken-hearted? Is there not balm in Gilead? Is there not a physician there? Oh! wait upon him, then, for his kind assistance, and you will certainly find that the fountain of his love is not dried up. He is now indeed on the throne of glory, king of kings, and lord of lords; but he has the same tender heart which once bled to death upon the cross. Apply to him for relief, and he will not cast you out. You can have no distemper but what he has power to heal; for he is an almighty physician; and no distemper but what he has love to heal; for God is love, and the Saviour, the Lord Christ, is God. How great soever the wounds of sin may be, yet, if you fall low at his footstool, crying for mercy, he will not reject your suit. What! was it ever known that he cast out the prayer of the poor destitute? No. There never was, and there never will be such an instance. When he was upon earth, he never refused to hear any one who asked his help. He never sent one single person away unrelieved, whatever his disease might be, or however unworthy he was to be healed of it. He cured all that came to him; and he did not half-cure them; but it is written, "they were made perfectly whole." Perfectly does he heal all the wounds of sin, and eternally. He heals for ever. His medicines restore his patients to everlasting health. He forgiveth all their sins, and healeth all their infirmities, and thus admits them into the city of the living God, the inhabitant of which shall not say, I am sick; for the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity, and so freely and fully forgiven, that God will remember it no more. And is this indeed the character of the great physician of souls? Is his heart so full of love, that he is always disposed to use his power for the perfect recovery of convinced and afflicted sinners? Is he as willing as he is able to heal them? No doubt he is. Let such persons, then, seek his help, and look up unto him for medicine to heal their wounded consciences. He hath wounded you out of love, and he will heal. He hath convinced you of your wants, in order that you might wait upon him to have them supplied. Wait, then, and he will give you abundant reason to admire and to praise the wonders which he will do for you and for your salvation. He will pardon you freely, and will heal all the wounds which sin has made, and then he will enable you to declare upon your own happy experience, that there is balm in Gilead, and a physician there.

Now, since this is the case, why do men labour under the maladies of sin? Since the blood of Christ is the sovereign balm, and Christ is the physician, whose power and love are able and willing to heal the most desperate disease, and the Holy Spirit is almighty to apply the healing balm, may we not then reasonably inquire, Why is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered? And this is the Fourth and last particular to be considered. Why are any men sick when they have an offer of health? Do they choose, do they love sickness? Yes. The same men, whose every pulse beats after bodily health, choose and love spiritual sickness. They are alarmed at the least disorder which attacks the body, and yet they have no concern about the soul, although it be wounded with sin, and sick unto death, yea, just ready to perish. How absurd is this conduct! Thus to prefer the health of the meaner and baser part of their constitution to the more noble and exalted part, is a flagrant absurdity. Nay, not to desire the health of the soul, when it is offered them, is acting unnaturally against their own interest. To reject it, when the great physician himself offers it in his word, is treating him with vile ingratitude; and not to receive this inestimable remedy at his hands, when he sends out his ministers to invite sinners to take it, to spurn it from them, as if it was a thing which they did not value, or did not want; this is the height of sin and wickedness; for whosoever thus accounteth the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, and thereby doth despite unto the spirit of grace, for him there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking-for of judgment and fiery indignation.

This being the case, the question returns, What can be the reason that the health of the daughter of my people is not recovered? Here is the all-healing balm of Gilead; here is an all-wise and an almighty physician; and why then, my brethren, will you not for his sake, for your own sakes, receive the sovereign medicine at his hands? What other cause can be assigned, but that you love your disease more than health. Sin, with all its infirmities, is dearer to you than the full enjoyment of the pleasures of a perfect recovery. Sin, although you die of it, is more precious than to receive life from the hands of our redeeming God. Sin, although it send you to hell, is more desirable than health in heaven. Sin, although it bring on you never-ending torments with devils and condemned spirits, is sweeter to you than these eternal joys which are at God's right hand for evermore. Oh! what a wonderful delusion is there in sin, that it should thus make men love it more than health and happiness! How strong is the delusion, since the same men reason in the things belonging to the body directly contrary to what they do in things belonging to the soul! Propose immediate relief to any of them lying in a severe fit of the gout or stone, they embrace the proposal with eager joy. Propose immediate relief from the pains and miseries of sin, they will not hear of, much less take the remedy. There is balm in Gilead, a physician is there, even the Lord Jesus, the sovereign physician of souls, and yet they will not apply to him. Sick as they are, and ready to expire with the infirmities of sin, yet they had rather perish than be beholden to him for a cure. All his attributes, his power, his wisdom, his goodness, cannot win them. All his graces, his pardoning, justifying, sanctifying grace, have no influence. He may be a God almighty to save, but the charms of sin, though but for a season, seem to them preferable to the blessings of his present and eternal salvation.

But whence is it that sin should be capable of deluding men so far as to make them prefer sickness to health? The true cause is this: Sin blinds their eyes, and hardens their hearts. It stupifies and deadens the senses, so that they feel not their spiritual in the same manner as they do their bodily diseases. The understanding is in darkness; they know not that it is diseased. When they know it, the memory is short and soon forgets it. When they remember it, yet conscience is fast asleep; it neither checks the will in the choice, nor the affections in the love and enjoyment of sin. Thus has sin impaired all their faculties, and they have no desire to be healed, because they are insensible of their malady. When we endeavour to convince them of it, they will not believe us; and because they do not feel the immediate smart of their sins, they will not therefore give credit to us when we declare, from the word of God, that they will smart for them, and to eternity, unless they come to the physician of souls to be healed. And this will be the case, so long as they are intent upon their present pursuits, and live entirely to sense and to its enjoyments. All this time their own hearts deceive them; for it is one of the greatest delusions of sin, to keep men ignorant of the true state of their souls. It flatters them with peace, while the Almighty is at war with them; and it promises them happiness in the enjoyment of those things which will bring on them eternal torments. And while it keeps them in this state of carnal security, nothing can appear to them more absurd than to hear that they are sick when they fancy themselves to be in perfect health.

1. My brethren, are any of you in this state? Do you feel no pain, and do you apprehend no danger from your sins? Are you entirely secure, although your sins be unpardoned, and God might glorify his justice by immediately inflicting the deserved punishment? Nay, do you not find part of sin's punishment already inflicted? and why, then, should you hope to escape the remaining part? For have you not suffered some of those pains and sicknesses which, in a course of years, will infallibly bring down your bodies to the grave, and inflict the sentence on them, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return?" The body was not at first liable to this sentence, until sin poured its cursed poison into it, and infected it with those painful maladies which no art of physic can heal, and which wear it down to the grave of death. Every pain which it feels; every sickness which it labours under; all the outward and inward dangers which threaten its mortal life; are owing to sin: for the wages of sin is death. All the harbingers of death, which afflict and weaken men's bodies, and thereby prepare the way for his seizing on them, and carrying them prisoners to the dark and cold regions of the grave, all these derive their power over us from sin: for, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men; for that all have sinned. Sin has most undoubtedly wounded your bodies with pains and sicknesses, with mortality and death: and what a madness, then, and infatuation is it to think that sin has not wounded your souls as well as your bodies? For what says the scripture? "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Is not that a desperate wound? It shall "die." How! Can the soul die? Yes. It may be dead in trespasses and sin. Its death consists in being separated from God, the fountain of life, and in having no communion with him, either in this world or in the next. And is not this a greater punishment than the death of the body? and is it not infinitely more painful too, thus to die from God and glory, and to be tormented with the worm that never dieth, and in the fire that never shall be quenched? What! is not that a wound indeed which thus alienated you from the life of God? Yea, a most dreadful wound, the torment and anguish of which you may suffer for ever and ever? Men and brethren, are these things so? Examine the evidence, and determine. Is not sin the great murderer, who has wounded your bodies with pains, and diseases, and mortality, and has separated your souls from God, the fountain of life, and made you subject to the first and second death? Is not the proof of these truths as complete and full as the case will admit of? Does it not amount even to a demonstration? And do you not then stand in need of some sovereign balm to heal you? and do you not want a physician? You certainly do, as much as ever dying men did. And why, then, do you neglect the remedy, and slight the physician?

But perhaps some persons may say, How can these things be? Am not I in perfect health? and how then can I labour under those diseases which you are mentioning? Yes, my brother, you may be in health, your body may be perfectly well, but you have a miserable, sinful soul within you, which is infected with the plague and foul leprosy of original sin, and which has been wounded with thousands of actual crimes. This is your case, and it is most deplorable. All the powers in nature can give you no relief. There is no remedy in heaven or earth, but the blood of Jesus Christ applied by the grace of his good Spirit; and yet sin has such power over you as to persuade you to neglect that precious medicine, without which you must perish everlastingly!

What! say you, Can I be in this desperate condition, and not know and feel it? Yes, you may. It is an undoubted matter of fact, that sin brought as many diseases upon the soul, as it did upon the body. Indeed, it left the soul entirely sick, and without any soundness in it, as we daily confess in the words of our church—"there is no health in us." And if there be no health in you, surely, then, you are sick in every part? And you have no sense of your malady, because sin has so impaired all your faculties, that you have no spiritual discernment. You do not discern your case to be dangerous, which is one of the worst symptoms you could have. It proves you to be far gone in a spiritual lethargy; so that the less sense you have, the greater is your danger. And is not this a dangerous disease which makes the patient insensible? For how can he avoid perishing of it, while conscience, which ought to give the alarm, is seared with a hot iron, and the other faculties of the soul are past feeling? This is the scripture account of your condition; and if it has not convinced you, may the Lord God Almighty make you sensible of your malady, that you may apply to the great physician of souls for the balm of Gilead, along with those convinced sinners who are now waiting upon him for the sovereign remedy.

2. When sinners are first brought to a sense of their guilt and of their danger, and conscience begins to do its duty, they are apt to write bitter things against themselves, and through unbelief to reject the offered mercies of the gospel. They feel the wounds of sin more sharp and painful than ever its pleasures had been sweet and delightful. The law stirs up guilt, terrifies their consciences with its threatenings, sets God before their eyes as armed with almighty justice to inflict the threatened punishment, and they see no way open to escape. Speak to persons in this distress of the balm of Gilead, the remedy appointed of God for their disease, they cannot believe it is able to heal them; or if they are brought to believe this, yet they reject the comforts of the blessed medicine, for want of faith to apply it to themselves.

Let us consider this case a little. My brethren, sin has wounded your bodies and souls, and you are become sensible of the malady. You feel the anguish of it, and you desire to be healed. What objection have you to the remedy which the Lord God had appointed for your recovery? Has it not virtue to heal your wounded conscience? You know what the remedy is: It is the balm of Gilead, the most precious blood of the Lamb of God, applied by the eternal Spirit; and it heals not by any natural or physical qualities, but by a divine and spiritual efficacy. The power of God is always present with it to heal. You cannot therefore object against medicine; because God has provided it, and he, with his own arm, renders it effectual for the cure of wounded consciences.

True, say you, I believe the remedy is infallible; but how do I know that God will apply it to my soul? You are wounded, and it is balm for wounded consciences, therefore for yours. God has awakened you; he has brought you to the knowledge of your disease, and you feel the pain of it. For what reason has God done this? but that the sense of your misery might send you to the physician for his advice and assistance. When the enemy of souls sees you thus escaping out of his hands, he would try to persuade you that the remedy is not for you; whereas you are the very persons to whom the gospel offers it. Christ says, he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; and you are sinners; you feel the misery of sin; and therefore Christ came to call you. Since you are sick, he calls you, as much as if he had called you by name in the gospel, to receive of him the balm of Gilead to heal all your spiritual infirmities.

You think you should be happy, if you could believe this; but you find so many and such desperate wounds, so many soul-murdering sins, that you dare not believe the remedy is for such as you. But why not? Is not the medicine for sin-sick souls? And the more sick you are, the more you want the medicine; and be your case the worst that ever was, yet the virtue of the medicine is almighty. If, from the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head, there was no soundness in you, but in every part wounds and bruises, and putrefying sores, yet the balm of Gilead can make a perfect cure; yea, if you have ten thousand more wounds than you have, it could heal them all. Consider, then, how greatly you disparage and vilify the love and power of our divine physician by supposing your sins more able to kill than he is to heal. Is not he the Lord God Almighty? and are not all things possible with him? Oh! be not faithless, then, but believing.

But perhaps guilt suggests to you, My case is singular; I have sinned against light and conviction. Often did I resolve to leave my sins, but I as often broke my resolutions; and therefore I fear that I have sinned away my day of grace, and that there is no mercy for me. Your case is bad, but not desperate. Looking back on your past life, you should be humbled, but not despair; for are you not convinced of your want of the balm of Gilead? and does it not, by a divine virtue, heal all manner of sins? Sins against light, against many solemn resolutions, and against many warnings of conscience, as well as other sins? The medicine certainly can heal them all; because it is appointed of God for that purpose, and by his almighty power he renders it effectual; and therefore whatever keeps you from relying upon its power to heal you, is an enemy to your soul. Oh! pray against unbelief; for that is at the bottom of all your objections against this sovereign medicine; and may the Lord give you faith to be healed!

What! can it heal me, says some poor dejected broken-hearted sinner, who sees nothing but sin in his heart and life? Yes; it is appointed for you by name. "He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds," Psalm cxlvii. 3. The great physician has an especial regard for your case. He says, he was sent to heal the broken-hearted. But not such as I am, says one; my heart is worse than broken; it is dead to God and to the things of God. Be it so. Our physician is famous for raising the dead. It is his office and his glory. In the parable of the good Samaritan, he healed the man who was half dead. His soul was as dead to God as yours is. But the precious balm, which was applied to him, made him alive to God. The same remedy can quicken you, although you have been dead in trespasses and sins; and as you are so far quickened as to see your want of this remedy, may you soon experience its sovereign virtue, and receive from it saving health.

After many doubts and fears have been silenced, new ones still arise. Unbelief may perhaps have been suggesting to some of your hearts; the medicine certainly can heal all cases; but I have nothing to recommend me to the physician. Have you nothing? Then this is your best recommendation. He always relieves poor distressed dying objects, who have nothing to bring him but their sins and their miseries. He is therefore a physician, that he may relieve such; for, by healing those whom none else can heal, he gets all the glory; and by healing them freely, he exalts his sovereign grace. Thus he acted in the parable of the good Samaritan. What had the wounded traveller to recommend him? Was it not, that he was miserable and helpless? This moved the Lord's compassion, and he showed him mercy. "Go, and do thou likewise." Apply to the great physician, because thou art sick, and canst not heal thyself, and then he will exalt his rich grace and love, by freely forgiving thee all thy sins, and by pouring the balm of Gilead into thy wounded conscience, to heal all thine infirmities.

When this objection, which arises from pride and unbelief, is removed, and we would persuade the convinced sinner to rely upon the promises of health and salvation, which God has made in his word, he has still difficulties to get over. He is afraid it would be presumption in him to rely upon the promises, and to take comfort from believing that he shall have his share and interest in them; whereas he is the very person to whom the promises are made. His particular case is described in Luke iv. 18. Our Saviour says, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed and commissioned me with full powers to relieve every distressed object that shall apply to me for help. Are you a poor afflicted sinner? He has good news for you: he was ordained to preach the gospel to the poor. Have you a broken, contrite heart? He is sent to heal the broken-hearted. Are you in bondage to sin and Satan? He is sent to preach and to give deliverance to the captives. Is your understanding blind and ignorant of spiritual things? He is sent to preach and to give recovery of sight to the blind. Are you fast bound with the chains of sin? and has the iron entered into your soul? He is sent to set at liberty them that are bruised. Here is your character: you are poor broken-hearted captives, blind and miserable. Here is your promise: Christ is appointed of God, and has a divine commission to supply all your wants. Is it presumption, then, in you to apply this promise to yourselves? What! after God has graciously made it for the comfort of your afflicted consciences, will you say, it would be presumption in us to take comfort from it? My brethren, the promise cannot be broken. By relying upon it, it is yours. Your dependence upon it calls upon God's faithfulness to fulfil it to you. And it is no presumption; it is a high act of faith, not to stagger at the promise through unbelief, but to give glory to God, by relying upon it. May he enable you thus to give glory to him! and you shall find that his promise is, like himself, unchangeable, and that his word cannot be broken.

Since, then, there is balm in Gilead for wounded consciences provided purposely for you, and since your objections against receiving it are groundless, why, my brethren, will you not apply to the almighty physician, and now ask his help? Oh! that this may be the accepted time, and this the day of your salvation! Fall down at his feet, implore his assistance, and his tender heart will melt with compassion towards you. If you are discouraged in your addresses to him, it is because you have not clear ideas of his power and love. He is almighty. He can heal the most broken heart and the most wounded conscience; and his love never failed to influence his power to heal such cases when they came before him. Keep not, then, poring upon your wounds and sores. By looking too much at them, you cherish your doubts and fears. Look unto Jesus; remember his advice; "Look unto me, and be ye saved." You should look into yourselves, to see your want of salvation, and look unto him for a supply of your wants; and, that you may be supplied out of his fulness, believe his promises. Rely upon his faithfulness to fulfil them to your souls, and thereby you engage his power to give you health and salvation.

3. Blessed be his holy name, for exerting his divine virtue at this day, and for healing all manner of spiritual sickness and all manner of disease among the people! Great numbers, now alive, are witnesses for him, that his hand is not shortened. Still he saves his people from sin, and from all the maladies brought upon them by sin. You, my Christian brethren, who have had experience of his divine power and love, ought to show forth his praise. It becometh you well to be thankful. Much has been forgiven you; therefore you should love much. The sweet Psalmist of Israel calls upon you by his example to a grateful acknowledgment of the Lord's mercies—"Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits; who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thine infirmities," Psalm ciii. 1—3. After you have received such great benefits, it will be your delight to praise him with your lips, and with your lives. The health and strength which he has freely given you, you will use in his service and to his glory, until he take you to himself, and give you more happy experience of his great salvation, by delivering your soul from every infirmity and corruption; and the time will not be long before he will raise your bodies from the grave, and make them like his own glorious body. And then he will get himself honour indeed, when he shall heal both body and soul of all the wounds of sin, and shall heal them for ever and ever. That is the glory of our physician: he heals to eternity: he makes the spirits of just men perfect; and they stand before the throne of God without any spot or stain of corruption. And in the morning of the resurrection, this corruptible body shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality. Thus he bestows eternal health and salvation upon both body and soul. Where is there, nay, where can there be, such a physician? There is none like unto thee, O Lord! glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders. Still thou art displaying the wonders of thy power and love, and administering thy sovereign balm for recovering the health of the daughter of thy people. Oh that thou wouldst display thy divine virtue among us this day! Arise, thou Sun of righteousness, upon all this congregation, with healing under thy beams, and save us from every malady of sin, from the pollution, from the guilt, and from the power of it; and save us from the punishment of it with thine eternal salvation. Hear us, thou almighty Saviour, and answer us to the glory of the Father, and of the Holy Spirit, three coequal and coeternal persons in one Jehovah, to whom we give honour and worship, and blessing and praise, now and for ever. Amen and Amen.

DISCOURSE XII.

UPON THE PROMISES OF GOD.

Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises.—2 Peter i. 4.

When the Lord God first published his law, in Paradise, he enforced it with proper sanctions. He promised to our first parents the continuance of his favour and immortal life, if they continued to keep the law; but if they should transgress it, he threatened them with the loss of his favour, and with the first and the second death. Upon their transgression, the promises became null and void. All right and title to them was forfeited, and the sovereign lawgiver was bound to inflict the threatened penalties. His truth, his justice, his holiness called upon him to put the sanctions of the law in force: accordingly, the offenders were arrested and brought to his bar; and being examined, they confessed their crime, but studied to throw part of the blame upon their tempters. The man could make no other defence, but that the woman offered him the temptation; and the woman had no plea to urge, but that the serpent beguiled her. Upon this confession they were found guilty; but the Lord God, whose mercies are over all his works, was pleased to make a discovery to them of the covenant of grace. He revealed to them his mind and will concerning the pardon of their transgression, and promised them a Saviour, who should bruise the serpent's head, and thereby destroy his power. The serpent's poison lies in his head; and when this is bruised, he can do no more mischief. The promised seed was to undertake this work, and for this purpose was the Son of God to be manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. This first promise, and all the following promises of grace and mercy centre in Jesus Christ: for all the promises of God in him are Yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God. In him they are Yea; he undertook to ratify and to make them good;

and in him they are Amen; they are confirmed and fulfilled to believers. Every promise made in Christ is an act of God's free grace, and which being made, his perfections bind him to fulfil; for he has engaged, in the promise, to give the grace and blessing therein mentioned to those who believe in Jesus Christ; so that the believer's happiness consists in living by faith upon the promises. Faith apprehends and receives Christ as held forth in the promise, and thereby gets possession of the promised blessing. While faith is kept thus in act and exercise, the believer walks safely and comfortably: although he has many enemies, and is in the midst of many dangers, yet he has a promise of God's help to support him in every estate and circumstance of life, and to carry him through all trials and troubles. If he rely upon this promised help, he cannot be disappointed; for the promise cannot possibly fail. All the perfections of God stand engaged to see it fulfilled; and when faith calls upon God, and relies on him for the fulfilling of it, he cannot deny himself, or break the word that is gone out of his mouth. Faith brings down his almighty power to make a way for the fulfilling of the promise, and thus the believer receives a support under all dangers, safety against all enemies, and a cordial against all troubles. This is his happiness. He staggers not at the promise of God through unbelief, but is strong in faith, giving glory to God; and God gives grace to him and makes his faith stronger, by which he finds more of the sweetness and riches of the promises. My brethren, I wish you were all in possession of this happiness; and it is my present design to direct and to encourage you to seek it. The scripture which I have chosen for this purpose affords us some very powerful motives. May the Lord God render our present consideration of them useful and profitable to all our souls, that we may know clearly,

First, The nature of the promises of God;

Secondly, The character of those to whom the promises belong; and

Thirdly, Their exceeding greatness and preciousness. And while we are considering those particulars, may we have the Lord's presence with us. We have a promise of it: "Wherever two or three," says he, "are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Oh that he may be present with us at this time! May he send the Holy Spirit of promise into all our hearts to teach us,

First, the nature of the promises of God. I define a promise to be an act of God's free grace, whereby he has engaged, in his word, to bestow upon believers all the blessings which come to them through the obedience and sufferings of Jesus Christ. The promise can spring from no other cause than from free grace. God had no motive to induce him but what arose from his own abundant and unmerited love, and there was no power to compel him to make any promise to fallen man. He had broken the law, and was subject to all the pains and penalties threatened to transgression; and if God had left him in this state without any promise, he would have dragged on a miserable life under the terrors of his guilty conscience, until the executioner came to call him to God's awful bar, and being tried there, and found guilty, how could he escape the damnation of hell? To fallen man, thus subject to the present and eternal punishment of sin, God was pleased to make a revelation of mercy. He took compassion on him, and provided for his salvation, by the covenant of grace, which is a covenant of promises. Such is the exalted grace of God, that he has made a free promise of deliverance from all the miseries of sin; and that convinced sinners might be enabled to rely upon the promise, and to find comfort in it, God revealed it in his word, which cannot be broken. There it is written and entered upon record; and what he has there engaged to bestow upon believers, shall be made good to them for ever and ever. To them he will freely give without money and without price, both in time and in eternity, all the blessings which are the fruit of the obedience and sufferings of Jesus Christ. To them he gives freely what cost him an infinite sum. The merit of all that he did and suffered is made theirs by faith; and faith is one of the blessings which he obtained among the rest; for it is one of his precious gifts which he bestows upon his people by the operation of his good Spirit, who works with and animates the incorruptible seed of the word, rendering it the means of forming faith in their hearts. The word of promise begets faith in them, by the Holy Spirit's enabling them first to rely upon it, and afterwards to experience its sweetness and richness, and then they know the truth of the fore-mentioned definition, namely, that a promise is an act of God's free grace, whereby he has engaged, in his word, to bestow upon believers all the blessings which come to them through the obedience and sufferings of Jesus Christ.

Now since this is the nature of the promises, there is but one point to be cleared up, and it is this—What security has God given for the fulfilling of the promises? The Lord knew what power unbelief had over careless sinners, and how hard it was to bring convinced sinners to believe, and how believers would be tempted by their remaining corruptions to entertain doubts and fears; and therefore he provided the most full and perfect evidence that the case will admit of.

First, Every promise stands confirmed in his revealed word; which word is the mind and will of God made known to his creatures, and which is therefore as perfect and unchangeable as God himself is. His word cannot be broken. It is impossible to break it. What weapons would you use? force of arms? What force can you use against the almighty God? His mind cannot alter or change, and thereby suffer his word to be broken; for with God there is no variableness or shadow of turning. And since nothing from without, and nothing from within, can cause any variableness in him, his word therefore will stand fast for ever and ever. God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent. Hath he said, and shall he not do it? Or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? What should hinder him? Is not his hand almighty to fulfil what he hath spoken with his mouth? Here, then, is safe ground for faith to stand upon. You can rely upon one another's word. When a man has a fair character, and is known to be of good principles, you can trust him; and you have a saying among yourselves, That an honest man's word is as good as his bond. And may you not give better credit to God's word? For what suspicion can you entertain of its ever being broken? He, who is truth itself, has said, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away;" they shall not pass away, because my almighty power shall establish them in time and in eternity. And is there not, then, sufficient reason to rely upon those words which God declares shall not pass away? And is there not abundant evidence to encourage the convinced sinner to trust to that word of promise, which can never fail, but shall stand fast, when heaven and earth shall pass away, and the place of them shall no more be found? Even then, when all things else fail, the promises will be receiving their full completion. Surely, then, the word of God, which cannot be broken, is a good security for our relying upon the promises.

But, secondly, God, who knoweth our hearts, out of tender compassion to our infirmities, has been graciously pleased to confirm his promises, not only by his word, but also by his oath. The oath was the obligation which the persons of the ever-blessed Trinity entered into to fulfil their distinct parts and offices in the covenant of grace; and they entered into this obligation for the sake of those who should flee to Christ for refuge, that they might see the immutability of God's counsel to save them; because he had confirmed it by an oath, and had thereby given them two immutable things to rely upon. The apostle has reasoned thus upon the subject: "When God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself; for men verily swear by the greater: and an oath, for confirmation, is to them an end of all strife. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath, that, by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us." In which words we have a clear account of the nature of the oath, "God sware by himself," and of the persons for whose sakes he sware, namely, the heirs of promise, and the design of his swearing, namely, to put an end to all strife in their consciences concerning his faithfulness to fulfil his promises to them. And the apostle's argument stands thus: when there is any dispute or strife among men, and the matter comes to be tried in a court of justice, the cause is finally determined by examining the parties and their witnesses upon oath. And there being a strife between God and sinners, on his part he proclaims his grace, promising them full pardon, if they seek it through Christ, binds himself to give it, by his word, and confirms his word by his oath. And ought not this oath, for confirmation of the word of promise, to put an end to all strife in the sinner's conscience? For how can God's oath be broken? Here are two immutable things, which cannot possibly fail—the counsel of God to save the heirs of promise, and the oath of God to carry his counsel into execution. His counsel is what he decreed in the covenant of grace, when all his attributes determined to bring many sons unto glory by Jesus Christ. This divine counsel, revealed to his creatures in his word, was sufficient evidence, and ought to induce them to believe: but he was "willing more abundantly," more than was needful, if they had not been very faithless and unbelieving, to convince them, and therefore confirmed his counsel by an oath; so that here are two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, and which consequently ought to make the faith of the heirs of promise immutable. The foundation upon which faith stands can never fail. It relies upon the unchangeable word of promise, and the promise is confirmed by the counsel of God; of which he says himself, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure," Isa. xlvi. 10. "Yea, the counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, and the thoughts of his heart to all generations," Psal. xxxiii. 11; and the promise is also confirmed by the oath of God, which is immutable and cannot be broken: "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent." He will not repent of his oath, unless he could cease to be wise, or could be perjured, which to suppose possible, would be the highest blasphemy. Oh! what full security, then, has a gracious God given to the heirs of promise? He would not have them to doubt of his love, or of his power to save them, and therefore he condescends to give them two immutable things for the support of their faith: but knowing whereof they were made, and how slow of heart they were to believe, he has been pleased to exalt his free and sovereign grace by giving them a

Third immutable thing, to enable them to rely still more steadfastly upon his promises; and that is the unchangeable covenant. The ever-blessed Trinity, moved by mere love and rich mercy, contrived the gracious plan of the sinner's redemption; and each person was to get himself glory by sustaining a distinct office in the economy of the covenant. The Father was to glorify the truth, justice, and holiness of the Godhead, by demanding full satisfaction for sin. The Son covenanted to pay it, and to glorify the wisdom and love of the Godhead by satisfying all the demands of law and justice. And the Holy Spirit was to glorify the power and grace of the Godhead by raising the dead in sin to life, and quickening them together with Christ, and then enabling them to walk against all opposition in his steps and after his example, until they attain eternal life. This is the covenant of promise. And what could induce the holy Trinity to make it? What, but the divine love and mercy? And what can hinder the fulfilling of this covenant? Can any thing resist and defeat the will of the Almighty? No. His power will carry his will into execution. But may not the will of God change? That is impossible. The covenant is everlasting: and how, then, can it change? Though it be but a man's covenant, yet, if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth or addeth thereto; and since a human covenant is not liable to change, certainly the everlasting covenant is alike ordered in all things, and sure: for he that cannot lie, hath said, "My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my mouth," Psal. lxxxix. 34. It cannot be broken; it cannot alter; and how then can one tittle of it ever change or fail? All things else shall pass away: "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee," Isa. liv. 10.

This is the security which God hath vouchsafed to give for the fulfilling of his promises, and it is the most full and complete evidence that any promise can have: and what, then, can the heirs of promise desire more? Has not God been willing more abundantly to show them the immutability of his counsel? For he has given them his word to rely upon, which cannot be broken; his oath, of which he will not repent; and his covenant, which he will not break or alter. It is impossible any of these securities should fail, and why, then, should unbelieving doubts arise in their minds, and tempt them to think they could fail? My brethren, if you give way to those doubts, they will soon rob you of your peace and comfort: for although you be heirs to a great estate, yet it is chiefly in reversion. You have very little in possession at present but the promises. You are heirs of promise: and if you lose your reliance upon the promises, you lose sight of the evidence of your estate, and the comfortable hope of your inheriting it. Oh! remember then how dishonourable this is to God, after he has provided such immutable things for faith and hope to rest upon, and how hurtful this is to your own interest; and therefore, whenever doubts and fears begin to tempt you, ask yourself, "What am I going to do? Shall I fancy that God can lie, or be perjured, or be a covenant-breaker? Would not this be blaspheming his word, and his oath, and his covenant? O Lord, keep thy servant from this great wickedness, and strengthen my faith, that it fail not!" And if you thus go to the throne of grace for help, you shall find it in time of need. God will enable you not to stagger at his promises through unbelief, but will make you strong in faith, relying steadfastly upon his fulfilling them all to your souls.

Some persons, perhaps, may be thinking, "God has provided full and complete evidence for the certainty of his fulfilling his promises; and I think I could rest upon this security, if I did but know that I was an heir of promise." Rely upon the promise, and it is yours. Live upon it, and you are undoubtedly an heir of promise. But this point comes to be more particularly considered under the scripture character of the persons to whom the promises belong, which is the Second general head of my discourse. When our Lord gave his apostles a commission to preach, it was in these words: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." The gospel brings the glad tidings of the covenant of promise made in Christ, and full security for all the promised blessings of the covenant. You have the gracious call this day. In my master's name I stand up, and invite every unpardoned sinner to come and receive of him free mercy and forgiveness. "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come; and let him that heareth say, Come; and let him that is athirst come." Ho! every one that thirsteth for redemption in the blood of Christ, even the forgiveness of sins, come to the blood of sprinkling, that you may be made clean from all your sins. And if you find it in your hearts to accept of this free invitation, let not the sense of your unworthiness keep you back. Jesus is able to save you, be ye ever so unworthy; for he can save to the uttermost. All is finished on his part. He is able; he is also willing; and he engages to use his almighty power for you, if you ask it. He freely calls you, without money and without price, to take pardon, righteousness, holiness, glory. He promises them in his word, binds it by oath, and confirms it by covenant. All he has of blessedness and glory to give his people shall be yours, if you will accept his call, and rely upon his promise.

But you are thinking still with yourselves, the promises are indeed freely offered to all, but they belong to none, except to the heirs of promise. That is very true; and therefore it concerns you to be assured that you are an heir of promise. Do you desire to be so? Would you willingly be an heir to the unsearchable riches of grace and glory? Oh! say you, from my heart I desire it: what would not I give to know that the exceeding great and precious promises in scripture belong to me! But how came this desire into your heart? Was it from any uneasiness in your mind about your sins? Have you been awakened to see that all the threatenings of the law belong to you, and that you have an interest in none of the promises of the gospel? and was it from hence that you waited upon God for mercy, desiring to experience his promised grace and salvation? And are you now waiting, deeply humbled under a sense of your sinfulness and helplessness? If this be your case, thus far you are right; for this is the first work of God's Spirit upon all the heirs of promise. He begins with convincing them of sin. They are lying in the same mass of corruption with other men, under the law, under guilt for breaking it, subject to death and hell.

The Holy Spirit makes them sensible of their being in this state, and apprehensive of their danger, and puts them upon seeking deliverance. They seek, but cannot find, for want of faith. They hear and read in scripture of the love and power of Christ to save such sinners as they are; but they have no faith to rely upon the promises. This is not a comfortable state; but it is the way to get comfort: for none will ever ask faith of God, whose gift it is, until they know the want of it, and therefore the Holy Spirit convinces all the heirs of promise that they have no faith, and they find that without faith they cannot take comfort in any of the precious promises: upon which they look up to him, who, by his mighty operation, is alone able to work faith in the heart. And let every one of you, who are thus waiting upon God, seek, and you shall find. He that put the desire into your heart, will give you possession of the blessing desired. The Spirit of God will enable you to rely upon the word of promise, and to apply it to your own soul, and thereby he will speak peace and comfort to your conscience. And by acting faith thus upon the word, you will be brought to the knowledge of your union with Christ. United to him by the bond of the Spirit on his part, and by faith on yours, you will be a member of his mystical body, and will derive influence and nourishment from him for the growth of your spiritual life. And being thus one with Christ, and Christ with you, you will have an interest in all that he has. His grace shall be yours, his Spirit yours, and all his promises shall be yours; for all things shall be yours, whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all shall be yours, because ye are Christ's.

This is the experience of every heir of promise. The Spirit of God has convinced him of his sinfulness and of his misery. He has been brought to see his lost and helpless state; and in his guilty conscience he was self-condemned, finding himself to be a child of wrath, and an inheritor of everlasting torments. After the Holy Spirit had thus humbled him, he discovered to him the excellency of the Lord Christ, the infinite dignity of his person, and the infinite perfection of his righteousness; and then, by the grace of the same good Spirit, he was led to rely upon Christ for salvation, and to trust the word of promise, which engages to give free and full and eternal salvation to every one who believeth in the name of the only begotten Son of God. And after the Holy Spirit has enabled the soul to believe, and to rely upon the word of God, he carries on his work, until faith be grown exceedingly, even up to full assurance. This the scripture calls the seal of the Spirit, which he sets upon all the heirs of promise. Sealing comes from believing, and is a fresh evidence in confirmation of it. "After that ye believed," says the apostle, "ye were sealed with the Spirit of promise." First, he enables the soul to rest upon the promise, and to apply it in this manner—He that believeth shall be saved: I believe therefore I shall be saved: and then he confirms this with his own testimony, and seals it to the heart; so that the sealing is for the believer's assurance, and not for God's. The Lord knoweth them that are his: their names are written in his book. He knoweth their weakness, and how to strengthen them with might in the inner man. And when temptations are strong, and trials great, then the Holy Spirit commonly strengthens faith with his inward witness. He honours faith with his own seal, bearing testimony with the believer's spirit, that he is a child of God. Every child of God has this seal set upon him some time or other. When it is most for his advantage, and most for God's glory, then the Spirit gives him this earnest of his inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession.

But perhaps some person may inquire, How shall I know that I am sealed by the Spirit of God? You may know it by these scripture marks. First, have you been deeply convinced of sin, and of Christ's power to save you from sin? Have you been convinced of your damnable estate without faith, and have you been asking faith of God? And has he enabled you to rely upon the word of promise, which offers you free and full salvation? and are you verily persuaded that God cannot break his word to you, who are relying upon it? And have you been waiting for the seal of the Spirit, hoping he would give you the inward witness of your adoption? All this is right. This is the work of the Holy Spirit, by which he puts his seal upon the heir of promise; and if this be your experience, you need not doubt but the witness is from heaven, when the Spirit of God beareth testimony with your spirits, that ye are the children of God: for, secondly, in the act of bearing witness with your spirits, he will give sufficient evidence that it is his testimony, both for his own glory, and for the assurance of your faith. He comes to bear witness to a matter of fact, that there may be no more doubt concerning it in the court of the believer's conscience. The fact is this—"Thou art now a child of God through faith in Christ Jesus." He seals this testimony upon the heart with his own seal, that it may be authentic and lasting, and then doubts and fears vanish, conscience is assured that all enmity is now slain, and that God is a loving reconciled Father; upon which the soul is led out into acts of praise and thankfulness, and with a holy triumph can say, "My beloved is mine, and I am his."

But some may think it is an easy matter to be deluded in this case. No; there will be no room for delusion, if your experience, by the testimony of the Spirit, was such as I have been mentioning, and if you attend, thirdly, to what follows after it. Does the witness abide? Is conscience at peace? Is your heart grateful? Is your faith lively and active? Not, perhaps, in so high a degree as when the Spirit did bear his testimony, but still in some good degree. In this case there can be no delusion; because that which has thus drawn your heart up to God, did certainly come from God. If the seal had not been from the Holy Spirit, how could this fruit of the Spirit have been produced? The impression which is left demonstrates that it was made by a divine hand; for when the Holy Spirit seals the soul, he not only seals it for Christ's property, but he also stamps the image and likeness of Christ upon it, which appears outwardly by its love to Christ, and by the acts of love. The soul is in love with the person, and with the offices and excellencies of Christ, and evidences this love by its love to his life and to his example, following and pressing close after them, and by its love to his graces, desiring strength from God so to walk even as Christ walked. This constant love to Christ proves the soul to be sealed by his Spirit, and the person thus sealed to be an heir of promise: for now he lives by faith upon Christ, and believes that all the promises made in Christ shall be made good to him. He has the earnest of their completion in his heart, and he has some of them fulfilled to him every day for a daily pledge of the perfect completion of the rest.

This is the character of the heirs of promise: and if any of you are thinking with yourselves, some part of this character is agreeable to our experience, but not the whole of it, and therefore we doubt whether we are heirs of promise or not: you should remember that the heirs of promise grow up to this character by several steps and degrees; and if any part of it be yours, you ought to press on to the attainment of the other parts. The fathers in Christ were once babes in Christ. The Spirit begins his work with conviction of sin, which is necessary to put the sinner upon seeking the promised mercies of the Gospel. If you are seeking, that is another step towards your reliance upon God's word, and believing him faithful to fulfil his promises to your soul. And if you can rely upon his word, you have advanced one step farther towards the assurance of faith and the seal of the Spirit. So that if any part of this character be yours, doubt not but the rest will be yours also; only press you on to the attainment of what is yet before. Let what has been done in you encourage you to proceed. You have some evidences of your inheritance; endeavour to get more, looking up to him who has begun, and praying him to carry on his own work, and fear not but you shall be brought to know that Christ is yours, and that all the promises made through him are yours also. And may this consideration stir you up to press forward, that what you are seeking is of inestimable value, and the happy possession of it will be eternal. When you are once heirs of promise, you will be heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, born to inherit the riches of grace, and the riches of glory. All the blessedness which God has promised to give his children in time and in eternity is yours. You are heirs to the exceeding great and precious promises; and this brings me to the Third general head of discourse, under which I was to treat of their exceeding greatness and preciousness. They are great in quantity, containing the greatest blessings which God has to give; yea, exceeding great beyond all description; and they are as good as great, they are exceeding precious, containing every thing truly valuable in earth or heaven. The greatness of the promises might be proved from many considerations. I shall mention at present but three or four. And the

First, is the state from which the promises offer to save man. He is fallen into a most miserable and helpless bondage, and to the worst of enemies; and none but an almighty arm can deliver him. Before the promise is brought to him, he is a transgressor of the law, under the curses of it, liable to be cut off every moment, and to suffer them in everlasting torments. And when justice comes to inflict the curses of the law upon him, what satisfaction can he make? What has he to plead, why sentence should not be immediately executed? He is silent. His mouth is stopped. He is self-condemned, and owns the sentence to be just, which assigns him over to the tormentors, to suffer with them the vengeance of eternal fire. This is the desert of every son and daughter of fallen Adam. Sin has made them subject to all this misery, and has left them totally helpless; they can no more save themselves from the second death than they can from the first. While the long-suffering of God bears with them in this mortal life he sends them his promises; in which he offers to save them from guilt and misery, to cleanse them from the pollutions, and to heal them of the wounds of sin. And are not these great promises, which engage to see such an almighty work performed? Surely they are exceeding great, since it requires the arm of the Lord God omnipotent to fulfil them by saving poor, guilty, helpless man from sin and Satan, from death and hell. Must not that be an exceeding great promise, which engages to save man from exceeding great misery? And this greatness appears evidently, in the

2. Next place, from what the promises offer to bestow upon the sinner. They not only engage to save him from all evil, but also to bestow upon him all good. They offer him a free pardon, that his sins may be forgiven, and he may be justified by faith, and reconciled to God, and may have the love of God shed abroad in his heart, and may walk, as an adopted son of God, worthy of his high calling unto all well-pleasing. And in this holy walking heavenwards, the Lord promises him every grace and blessing which shall be needful for him; yea, he has engaged to make all things—sickness, reproach, persecution, trials, and troubles of every kind—work together for his good. Are not these great promises, which engage to bestow pardon, justification, peace with God, adoption, sanctification, and grace to profit under every dispensation of providence; yea, are not these exceeding great promises, which bestow upon the sinner such exceeding great blessings? And bestow them upon him,

3. Upon the greatest motive that possibly can be, even the free grace of God. Deliverance from the evils of sin, and the bestowing of the blessings of salvation, is all of grace, proceeding wholly from the unmerited love and mercy of God. He is the sovereign Lord of heaven and earth. All creatures are his, bound to obey his holy will, and, in case of disobedience, bound to suffer the threatened punishment; and when man had disobeyed, he had a right to nothing but punishment; and if it was remitted, yea, but for a day, this was an act of grace; but how much greater an act was it to pardon the sinner, to put honour upon him, and to restore him to a better state than he was in before he fell. If a friend bestow upon you a free gift, you acknowledge yourselves to be under a greater obligation than if he were to pay you the same sum for a just debt. How much, then, are you indebted to God? For he had no motive, but mere love, to induce him to make you any promise. Consider this motive; consider the promises; consider from what a state of misery to what a state of happiness God offers to raise you; and then admire and praise the greatness of that love which led God to make you such great promises. Well might the apostle call upon us to behold what manner of love it is: for it passeth knowledge, it is so exceeding great. The blessings which his free grace has promised surpass all understanding. Even the souls of just men made perfect, who are now inheriting the promises, cannot adequately set forth the greatness of them; for they are eternal. And this is another—

4. Consideration, which exalts the greatness of the promises. They are of everlasting duration, and can never fail. When nature itself shall be dissolved, and heaven and earth shall pass away, then the promises shall be established. Not a tittle of them shall suffer in the universal conflagration; but they shall be then in their full extent most gloriously fulfilled. Many of them are reserved for the wonders of that great day. The raising of the body, free from corruption and mortality, admitting it to the vision of God, putting upon it and the soul never-fading glory, a crown of righteousness, and palms of victory; and then bringing them to drink of those rivers of pleasure which are at God's right hand for evermore; these are some of the exceeding great promises which are to be completed at the Lord's coming to judgment. In that day the redeemed of the Lord will find that his divine power will fulfil the greatest of his promises. When the captain of their salvation has brought them to the heavenly Canaan, the promised land of everlasting rest, then he will put them into the actual possession of all the promises. Like as Joshua, when he had brought the people into the promised land, called upon them to be witnesses for God, that every promise had been fulfilled to them, so may our almighty Joshua say to his redeemed people in the same words, "Ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you: all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof," Josh. xxiii. 14.

Let these considerations suffice to set forth the greatness of the promises. They are exceeding great in offering to deliver us from all evil, and to bestow upon us all good; the motive for doing this is the infinite love and sovereign grace of God, which advances the greatness of the promise by the freeness of it, and still further advances it by what grace has promised to do for us in glory, even to give us the actual possession and eternal enjoyment of all the promises.

And are these things so? If they be, who then would not wish to be an heir of promise? Are the promises thus exceeding great? Why then do they not appear so to every one of us? What is the reason that the generality of men had rather be heirs to any other estate than to the promises? The text tells us the true cause; they know not the preciousness of them. They are exceeding great in themselves, but they are not apprehended to be so without faith. As the apostle says of Christ, "to them that believe he is precious;" so we may say of the promises, to them that believe they are precious; and therefore their greatness doth not strike any man until he by faith tastes something of their preciousness. Christ is the sum and substance of all the promises. Christ himself is the first promise, and all the rest are branches from that radical promise. They are all made in Christ, and in him they are all completed. God has no good to give to sinners, but in relation to Christ, and all the promises of good are made in him, in consequence of his meritorious life and death, his resurrection and ascension, yea, the Spirit of promise is given as the blessed fruit of Christ's intercession. Now no man sees any thing precious in Christ without faith; so neither without it does he see any thing precious in the promises. Christ has no form or comeliness that he should desire him, and the promises have no such charms as to persuade him to live upon them. But faith gives a substance, a substantial presence to the things hoped for in the promises, and gives evidence of the believer's interest in the things not seen by the bodily eyes, and thus it enables the soul to experience the reality, and to find something of the value of the good things contained in the promises.

Perhaps you may be convinced of the necessity of faith to discover the preciousness of the promises, but you do not clearly understand how faith acts upon them when it first discovers and afterwards lives upon their preciousness. The word of promise is the established means in the hand of the Spirit of begetting faith, and of strengthening it: for a sinner can expect no good from God, unless he vouchsafe to give him a free promise. The scripture is a revelation of God's will, in which he engages, for Christ's sake, to bestow graces and blessings upon his children; but the unawakened sinner sees no want of those graces and blessings until the Holy Spirit convince him of sin, stir up guilt in his conscience, and make him sensible of his danger. Then he is glad to hear of a promise, and is asking, Who will show me any good? The Lord God sends him the gospel with a free title to all good, and out of his infinite grace to enrich him with the unsearchable riches of Christ. The Holy Spirit enables him to receive the gospel, and to rely and to act faith upon the word of promise. Faith looks at the word, sees what God has promised therein, rests and stays upon him for the fulfilling of it, and by this dependence and reliance upon the word of promise the believer calls upon and engages the divine power to fulfil it. And the fulfilling of it gives it a peculiar sweetness and preciousness to the believer's soul. Every fresh proof of God's faithfulness to fulfil it strengthens the believer's reliance and dependence upon it, and thereby it grows more precious to all the faculties of his soul. The understanding sees and acknowledges the promises to be important realities; the will chooses them for its inheritance; and the affections love them and live upon them. Thus they become more and more precious. Tried promises are precious promises. Every time the believer goes boldly to the throne of grace, and asks, through Christ, the fulfilling of any promise, and receives it, then his faith grows, and as his faith grows exceedingly, so the promises grow exceedingly precious.

But all our experience here is only an earnest and foretaste of their future preciousness. The chief part of them is to be fulfilled beyond the grave, and many of them at the last day; and even then there will be no adequate description of their preciousness. The saints in glory will be able only to set forth half their praise, the promises being still completing through the endless ages of eternity, so that it will require an eternity to show forth all their praise. May it be your happiness, my brethren, now to experience, by faith, the greatness and preciousness of the promises, and to have reason daily to praise him, in whom they are made, and by whom they will be all made good for ever and ever. Such are the promises They are exceeding great and precious. They are certainly so in themselves, but do they, my brethren, appear so to you at present? If they do not, consider a little what your state is before you are interested in the promises. You are transgressors of that law, which has decreed, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Under this sentence you live, subject to whatever is meant by the soul's dying from God. You are liable to the wrath and justice of the Almighty, and to those eternal torments which he has threatened to inflict upon sinners; and was it not for his long-suffering, which of you would have been spared to this hour? And while the long-suffering of God is waiting, he sends his ministers with the glad tidings of the gospel to call you to a free pardon. They invite you in Christ's name, and in Christ's words. They assure you of his readiness to receive you into his favour, and to forgive, and to forget all your offences. For your encouragement, they relate unto you his promises, which cannot be broken. They earnestly press you to accept of them, and to be happy in the enjoyment of them. But in vain. Their message is ineffectual. You had rather have the realities of sin, than the earnests of the promises. And what is this but absolute infidelity? For if you knew what sin is, and believed the divine promises to be so great and precious as they are, you would certainly prefer them to the delights of sin; whereas you neither believe the word, nor the oath, nor the covenant of God; which is really practical atheism; for you are without Christ; you are strangers from the covenant of promise; you have no hope; and you are without God, atheists in the world. You may not, perhaps, deny the being of God; but you live without Christ, and without God in the world; and therefore you are practical atheists. While you are in this state, you cannot possibly have any true happiness; not in time, because your sins are unpardoned; not in eternity, because then you will receive the punishment of unpardoned sin. And is this a true description of your guilt and of your danger? You know it is; the word of God will not suffer you to doubt of it, unless you deny its authority. And how then do you determine to act? What! will you still seek your happiness in the ways of sin? God forbid. Turn ye, turn ye unto the Lord; certainly he bids higher for your hearts than Satan can. His promises are greater than sin, or the world, can make. You know they are. And still his promises follow you, although you have often turned a deaf ear to them. Once more I call and invite you in his name. Oh that he would speak to your hearts, and call effectually. My brethren, ye are sinners; God offers you pardon. You are guilty; he offers you free justification. He promises you his Son to be your Saviour, his Spirit to be your sanctifier, his grace to be your strength, his glory to be your eternal inheritance. He opens his treasury, and invites you to come, and to receive freely of him unsearchable and inestimable riches. Come, then, at the invitation of this gracious God, and hearken no longer to the lying promises of sin. If the Lord has now put it into your hearts to seek the fulfilling of the great things, which he has engaged to give his people, may he enable you to seek until you find him faithful and just to fulfil all his promises!

2. There are many of you seeking and waiting for the fulfilling of them. You are convinced of the sinfulness of your hearts and lives, and are humbled under a sense of your vileness and helplessness, and you find the necessity of being saved from your sins, but you cannot rely with such confidence upon the word of God, as to believe that you shall be heirs of promise. But why not? To whom are the promises made? Are they not made to sinners? and are they not discoveries of God's gracious intentions towards them in the Son of his love? And since you are sinners, convinced of sin, and waiting for mercy, surely the promises are made to you, and by relying on them they are yours.

But you are afraid to rely upon them. What! are you afraid God will break his promise? Consider what has been before said of the security which God has vouchsafed to give you, in order to silence your doubts and fears, and to put an end to all strife in your consciences. He has given you his word, and his oath, and his covenant. These are immutable things; and why, then, should you fear to rely upon those things which cannot possibly change or fail?

Perhaps you believe that the promises are immutable, and yet you are afraid to rely upon them, because of the greatness of your sins. The greatness of your sins should humble you, but not drive you to despair: for are there not great promises for great sinners? yea, exceeding great promises for exceeding great sinners? Is it not written, "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool?"

But still you are afraid to rely upon the promises because you have got such a wicked heart: you think there is not any person in the world, whose heart is so wholly set in them to do evil, as yours is Be it desperately wicked, yet can you desire God to create in you a clean heart, and to renew a right spirit within you? If you can, then hear what he has promised: "A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you."

Why then do you stagger at the promises of God through unbelief? Are you complaining of your corruptions, and are they so many and strong, that they tempt you to think there is no mercy for you? Bring them to the blood of sprinkling, and when you are cleansed from the guilt of sin, the Lord has promised that his grace shall be sufficient for you, and that sin shall not have dominion over you. Your corruptions, be they ever so many, or ever so strong, shall be subdued by his almighty grace.

What, then, still hinders you from relying on God's promises? Can they ever fail? No. On God's part all is fixed and immutable; and whatever it be, on your part, which makes you stagger at the promises, has itself a promise, that you shall be delivered from it; which renders your unbelief more inexcusable. Whatever sin it be, or guilt, or corruption, or misery, the Lord has promised you salvation from it. He will redeem you from all evil; from all the evil of sin, and from all the evil of punishment. He has given his word, and his word cannot be broken. And why, then, cannot you rely upon it, especially since God has promised to deliver you from that very thing which hinders your reliance upon his word? Is this, indeed, the case? And are you convinced of it? Why, then, do you make God a liar, by not believing the record which he hath given of his Son? Oh! beg of him to enable you to give glory to his word of promise by relying upon it, and by setting to your seal, that God is true; and then God will set to his seal, and the Spirit of promise will seal you to the day of redemption.

3. Blessed be his rich grace and love, who is daily fulfilling his promises. Many of you have had happy experience of his faithfulness to fulfil them. You ought always to remember, my Christian friends and brethren, that whatever you enjoy of grace, or hope for in glory, is freely promised and freely given you in Jesus Christ; and let your gratitude bear some proportion to his mercies. He has opened the treasury of his promises, and has put you in possession of his unsearchable riches. Oh, what manner of love is this, that he should raise you from the lowest beggary, to such an exceeding great and precious inheritance! Every promise made to you in this life is a bank-note of heaven; and when you go to the throne of grace to demand the payment of it, he cannot send you away with a denial. If you plead the promise, and desire the fulfilling of it in the name of your Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, he cannot deny the word that is gone out of his mouth. His divine power will give you all things that pertain to life and godliness. For when he gave you Christ, with him he gave you all things. In Christ there is all that you can want treasured up for you: for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell. There is a fulness of wisdom to teach you the true nature of the promises, and a fulness of salvation to deliver you from every thing that hindered your relying upon them, and a fulness of power to put you into the eternal possession of them all. Having, then, these promises, dearly beloved, let us live upon them, and we shall thereby live to his glory, in whom they are all made. Let us beg of him to act as our prophet for the enlightening of our understandings, that we may see the great promises made through him, and as our priest, to pardon and to forgive us our sins, that we may have by faith the earnest of our inheriting the promises, and as our king to rule in us and over us, until he bring us safe to the promised inheritance. In these three offices, Christ has engaged to act for his people here below. He was to be their wisdom, their righteousness, and their sanctification; and they find him faithful to fulfil his offices, and to perform his promises. And this experience keeps their minds stayed upon him for the performance of what remains as yet unaccomplished. They have no reason to doubt of his love: for they continually find his power exerted in their behalf. Happy men, who have the Lord for their God, a faithful promise-keeping God, who will be their God for ever and ever. His covenant mercies shall never fail. They shall be receiving their perfect accomplishment hereafter, when time shall be no more. May he, in whom they are all made, and in whom they are all established, now get himself glory by enabling every one of us to rely upon his promises; and may we at this time find the promise, which he has made to us while we are here gathered together, fulfilled to us all! He has said, "Wherever two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of you." Oh that we may all find his spiritual presence! If there be any poor deluded worldlings here, who had rather have the possession of this world's goods than the riches of the promises, may the Lord convince them this day of their guilt and of their danger, and put them upon seeking the promised mercies of the gospel. And may he be graciously pleased to vouchsafe his presence to those who are seeking him, that they may no more by their unbelief dishonour his word, and his oath, and his covenant. Put an end, blessed Lord, to all strife in their consciences, that they may no longer stagger at thy promises. Enable them to believe to the saving of their souls, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ may be given to them that believe. And accept of thanks and praises from thy redeemed people. Oh! make us more thankful for thy great and precious promises, and for faith to apply them, and to live upon them. May they grow more precious to us every day. Fulfil, Lord Jesus, what remains, that we may be receiving continually, out of thy fulness, strength of faith, increase of grace, power over sin; and may at last be more than conquerors, through him that loved us. Hear us; for we ask those things according to thy promise, and grant us them for thy great name's sake, to the honour of the Father and of the eternal Spirit, the holy, blessed and glorious Trinity in one Jehovah; to whom be equal honour and glory, and blessing and praise, in earth and heaven, in time and in eternity. Amen and Amen.

A TREATISE

ON

PREFACE.

The design of this little treatise is to display the glory and all-sufficiency of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to encourage weak believers to glorify him more by depending and living more upon his all-sufficiency. Whatever grace he has promised in his word, he is faithful and he is almighty to bestow; and they may receive it of him freely by the hand of faith. This is its use and office, as a hand or instrument, having first received Christ, to be continually receiving out of Christ's fulness. The apostle calls this living by faith; a life received and continued, with all the strength, comforts, and blessings belonging to it, by faith in the Son of God; and he also mentions the work of faith, its working effectually in the hearts and lives of believers, through Christ strengthening them, and its growing in them, yea, growing exceedingly from faith to faith, by the power of him who loveth them. This is the subject; and it properly belongs to those only who have obtained the true faith, given them of God, and wrought in their hearts by his word and Spirit. Such persons meet with many difficulties every day to try their faith, and to hinder them from depending continually upon the Lord Christ for all things belonging to life and godliness. By what means these difficulties may be overcome, is plainly taught in scripture, is clearly promised, and is attained by faith, which becomes daily more victorious, as it is enabled to trust that he is faithful who promised. The strengthening of it I have had all along in view, hoping to be the means, under God, of leading the weak believer by the hand, and of removing hinderances out of his way, until the Lord thoroughly settle and establish him in the faith that is in Christ Jesus.

But I must admonish the reader, that I do not expect this merely from what I have written. It is too high and great a work for any mere man. Faith is the gift of God; and he alone who gives it can increase it. The author of the faith is also the finisher of it; and we do not use the means to set the Lord of all means aside. No. We use them, that we may find him in them. It is his presence which makes the use of them effectual. By this, and this only, can any reader of this book be rendered stronger in faith. Being well assured of this, I have therefore looked up to him myself, and it will be for thy profit, also, reader, to look up to him, in prayer, for his blessing. Entreat him of his grace to countenance this feeble attempt to promote his glory and his people's good. Beg of him to make thy reading of it the means of thy growth in faith, and to accompany it with the supply of his Holy Spirit to every believer into whose hands it may fall. And forget not in thy prayers and praises to remember the author.

I bless God, who has enabled me to revise the press, and to put my last hand to the work, by making such additions and alterations as seemed to me necessary to render the subject more plain to common readers. In this and in all things, I desire to approve myself to my Lord and Master, whose I am, and whom I serve; and whatever good I have or do, to him be all the praise. Blessed be his name this day, henceforth, and through the day of eternity!

THE LIFE OF FAITH.

The just shall live by his faith.—Hab. ii. 4.

The persons for whose use this little tract is drawn up are supposed to be practically acquainted with these following truths: they have been convinced of sin, and convinced of righteousness. The word of God has been made effectual by the application of the Holy Spirit to teach them the nature of the divine law; and upon comparing their hearts and their lives with it, they have been brought in guilty. They found themselves fallen creatures, and they felt the sad consequences of the fall; namely, total ignorance in the understanding of God and his ways; an open rebellion against him in the will; and an entire enmity in the heart; a life spent in the services of the world, the flesh, and the devil; and, on all these accounts, guilty before God, and by nature children of wrath. When they were convinced of those truths in their judgments, and the awakened conscience sought for ease and deliverance, then they found they were helpless and without strength. They could take no step, nor do any thing which could in the least save them from their sins. Whatever method they thought of, it failed them upon trial, and left conscience more uneasy than before. Did they purpose to repent? They found such a repentance as God would be pleased with was the gift of Christ. He was exalted to be a prince and a Saviour to give repentance. Suppose they thought of reforming their lives; yet what is to become of their old sins? Will present obedience, if it could be perfectly paid, make any atonement for past disobedience? Will the broken law take part of our duty for the whole? No. It has determined that whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. And let him be ever so careful in doing what the law requires, or in avoiding what the law forbids; let him fast and pray and give alms, hear and read the word, be early and late at ordinances; yet the enlightened conscience cannot be herewith satisfied; because by these duties he cannot undo the sin committed and because he will find so many failings in them, that they will be still adding to his guilt and increasing his misery.

What method, then, shall he take? The more he strives to make himself better, the worse he finds himself. He sees the pollution of sin greater: he discovers more of its guilt: he finds in himself a want of all good, and an inclination to all evil: he is now convinced that the law is holy, just, and good; but when he would keep it, evil is present with him. This makes him deeply sensible of his guilty, helpless state, and shows him that by the works of the law he cannot be saved. His heart, like a fountain, is continually sending forth evil thoughts; yea, the very imaginations of it are only and altogether evil, and words and works partake of the nature of that evil fountain from whence they flow: so that after all his efforts he cannot quiet his conscience nor attain peace with God.

The law having done its office, as a schoolmaster, by convincing him of these truths, stops his mouth, that he has not a word to say why sentence should not be passed upon him. And there it leaves him, guilty and helpless. It can do nothing more for him than show him that he is a child of wrath, and that he deserves to have the wrath of God abiding upon him for ever; for by the law is the knowledge of sin.

The gospel finds him in this condition, as the good Samaritan did the wounded traveller, and brings him good news. It discovers to him the way of salvation contrived in the covenant of grace, and manifests to him what the ever-blessed Trinity had therein purposed, and what in the fulness of time was accomplished. That all the perfections of the Godhead might be infinitely and everlastingly glorified, the Father covenanted to gain honour and dignity to his law and justice, to his faithfulness and holiness, by insisting upon man's appearing at his bar in the perfect righteousness of the law: but man having no such righteousness of his own, all having sinned, and there being none righteous—no, not one—how can he be saved? The Lord Christ, a person in the Godhead coequal and co-eternal with the Father, undertook to be his Saviour. He covenanted to stand up as the head and surety of his people in their nature, and, in their stead, to obey for them, that by his infinitely precious obedience many might be made righteous, and to suffer for them, that by his everlasting meritorious stripes they might be healed. Accordingly, in the fulness of time he came into the world, and was made flesh, and God and man being as truly united in one person, as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man. This adorable person lived, and suffered, and died, as the representative of his people. The righteousness of his life was to be their right and title to life, and the righteousness of his sufferings and death was to save them from all the sufferings due to their sins. And thus the law and justice of the Father would be glorified in pardoning them, and his faithfulness and holiness made honourable in saving them. He might be strictly just, and yet the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

In this covenant the Holy Spirit, a person coequal and coeternal with the Father and the Son, undertook the gracious office of quickening and convincing sinners in their consciences, how guilty they were, and how much they wanted a Saviour, and in their judgments how able he was to save all that come unto God through him, and in their hearts to receive him, and to believe unto righteousness, and then in their walk and conversation to live upon his grace and strength. His office is thus described by our blessed Lord in John xvi. 13, 14: "When the Spirit of truth is come, he shall glorify me; for he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you;" that is, when he comes to convince sinners of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment, he takes of the things of Christ, and glorifies him by showing them what a fulness there is in him to save. He leads them into all necessary truth in their judgments, both concerning their own sinfulness, guilt, and helplessness, and also concerning the almighty power of the God-man, and his lawful authority to make use of it for their salvation. He opens their understandings to comprehend the covenant of grace, and the offices of the eternal Trinity in this covenant, particularly the office of the sinner's surety, the Lord Christ; and he convinces them that there is righteousness and strength, comfort and rejoicing, grace for grace, holiness and glory, yea, treasures infinite, everlasting treasures of these in Christ, and hereby he draws out their affections after Christ, and enables them with the heart to believe in him unto righteousness. And the Holy Spirit having thus brought them to the happy knowledge of their union with Christ, afterwards glorifies him in their walk and conversation, by teaching them how to live by faith upon his fulness, and to be continually receiving out of it grace for grace, according to their continual needs.

The corruption of our nature by the fall, and our recovery through Jesus Christ, are the two leading truths in the Christian religion; and I suppose the persons for whose sake this little tract is drawn up, not only to know them, but also to be established in them, steadfastly to believe and deeply to experience them. The necessity of their being well grounded in them is very evident; for a sinner will never seek after nor desire Christ further than he feels his guilt and his misery; nor will he receive Christ by faith, till all other methods of saving himself fail; nor will he live upon Christ's fulness further than he has an abiding sense of his own want of him. Reader! How do these truths appear to thee? Has the law of God arraigned thee in thy conscience? Hast thou been there brought in guilty? and has the Spirit of God deeply convinced thee by the law of sin, and of unbelief, and of thy helplessness, so as to leave thee no false resting-place short of Christ? Has he swept away every refuge of lies? and thus put thee upon inquiring what thou must do to be saved. If not, may the Lord the Spirit convince thee, and in his own good time bring thee to the knowledge of thyself, and to the saving knowledge of and belief in Christ Jesus, without which this book can profit thee nothing! But if thou hast been thus convinced, and the Lord has shone into thy understanding, and enlightened it with the knowledge of the way of salvation, then read on. May the Lord make what thou readest profitable to thine establishment in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

There are two things spoken of faith in scripture, which highly deserve the attention of every true believer. The first is the state of safety in which he is placed by Christ, and is delivered from every evil and danger in time and in eternity, to which sin had justly exposed him; and the second is the happiness of this state, consisting in an abundant supply of all spiritual blessings freely given to him in Christ, and received, as they are wanted, by the hand of faith out of the fulness of Christ: by which means, whoever has obtained this precious faith ought to have a quiet conscience at peace with God, and need not fear any manner of evil, how much soever it be deserved; and thereby he may at all times come boldly to the throne of grace, to receive whatever is necessary for his comfortable walk heavenwards. Every grace, every blessing, promised in scripture, is his, and he may and does enjoy them so far as he lives by faith upon the Son of God: so far his life and conversation are well ordered, and his walk is even, his spiritual enemies are conquered, the old man is mortified with his affections and lusts, and the new man is renewed, day by day, after the image of God in righteousness and true holiness. And from what he already enjoys by faith, and from the hopes of a speedy and perfect enjoyment, the scripture warrants him to rejoice in the Lord with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

It is much to be lamented, that few live up to these two privileges of faith. Many persons, who are truly concerned about the salvation of their souls, live for years together full of doubts and fears, and are not established in the faith that is in Christ Jesus; and several who are in a good measure established, yet do not walk happily in an even course, nor experience the continual blessedness of receiving by faith a supply of every want out of the Saviour's fulness. These things I have long observed; and what I have been taught of them from the scripture, and from the good hand of God upon me, I have put together, and throw it as a mite into the treasury. I am sure it was never more wanted than at present. May the good Lord accept the poor offering, and bless it to the hearts of his dear people, to the praise of the glory of his own grace.

For the clearer understanding of what shall be spoken upon the life of faith, it will be needful to consider, first, what faith is: for a man must have faith before he can make use of it. He must be in Christ before he can live upon Christ. Now, faith signifies the believing the truth of the word of God: so says Christ, "Thy word is truth:" it relates to some word spoken or to some promise made by him, and it expresses the belief which a person who hears it has of its being true. He assents to it, relies upon it, and acts accordingly. This is faith. And the whole word of God, which is the ground of faith, may be reduced to two points, namely, to what the law reveals concerning the justification of a righteous man, and to what the gospel reveals concerning the salvation of a sinner. A short examination of these points will discover to us a great number of persons who have no faith at all in the word of God.

First, Every man in his natural state, before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, has no faith. The scripture says, God hath shut up all that are in this state in unbelief: and when the Holy Spirit awakens any one of them, he convinces him of sin, and of unbelief in particular. When the Comforter is come, says Christ, he shall convince the world of sin, because they believe not in me.

Secondly, A man who lives careless in sin has no faith. He does not believe one word that God says in his law. Let it warn him of his guilt, and show him his great danger; yet he sets at nought the terrors of the Lord. He acts as if there were no day of judgment, and no place of eternal torments. He has no fear of God before his eyes. How can such a practical atheist as this have any faith?

Thirdly, The formalist has not true faith. He is content with the form of godliness, and denies the power of it. The vail of unbelief is upon his heart, and the pride of his own good works and duties is ever before his eyes, that he finds no want of the salvation of Jesus, and is averse to the grace of the gospel. All his hopes arise from what he is in himself, and from what he is able to do for himself. He neither believes God speaking in the law nor in the gospel. If he believed his word in the law, it would convict him of sin, and forbid him to go about to establish a righteousness of his own; because by the works of the law shall no flesh living be justified; yet this he does not believe. If he believed the word of God in the gospel, it would convince him of righteousness, of an infinitely perfect righteousness wrought out by the God-man, Christ Jesus, and imputed to the sinner without any works of his own: for unto him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is imputed for righteousness. To this he dare not trust wholly for his acceptance before God; therefore he has not true faith.

Fourthly, A man may be so far enlightened as to understand the way of salvation, and yet have not true faith. This is a possible case. The apostle states it, 1 Cor. xiii. 2: "Though I understand all mysteries, and all knowledge, yet I may be nothing." And it is a dangerous case, as Heb. x. 26: "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." Here was such a knowledge of the truth, as left a man to perish without the benefit of Christ's sacrifice; therefore he wanted that faith, which whosoever hath shall be saved.

What great numbers are there under these delusions! Reader! art thou one of them? Examine closely; for it is of eternal moment. Prove thine own self, whether thou be in the faith. If thou askest how thou shalt know it, since there are so many errors about it; hear what God's word says: Whoever believes truly has been first convinced of unbelief. This our Lord teaches, John xvi. 8, 9: "When the Comforter is come, he will convince the world of sin, because they believe not on me." He convinces of sin, by enlightening the understanding to know the exceeding sinfulness of it, and by quickening the conscience to feel the guilt of it. He shows the misery threatened, and leaves sinners no false refuge to flee unto. He will not suffer them to sit down content with some sorrow, or a little outward reformation, or any supposed righteousness, but makes them feel that, do whatever they will, or can, still their guilt remains. Thus he puts them upon seeking out for salvation, and by the gospel he discovers it to them. He opens their understandings to know what they hear and read concerning the covenant of the eternal Trinity, and concerning what the God-man has done in the fulfilling of this covenant. The Holy Spirit teaches them the nature of the adorable person of Christ, God manifest in the flesh, and the infinitely precious and everlasting meritorious righteousness which he has wrought out by the obedience of his life and death; and he convinces them that this righteousness is sufficient for their salvation, and that nothing is required, except faith, for its being imputed unto them; and he works in them a sense of their being helpless, and without strength to rely upon this righteousness, and through faith in it to have peace with God. He makes them see that they cannot, by any power of their own, in the least depend upon it: for all their sufficiency is of God. It requires the same arm of the Lord, which wrought out this righteousness, to enable them with the heart to believe in it. They are made clearly sensible of this from the word and Spirit of God, and from their own daily experience, and thereby they are disposed to receive their whole salvation from the free grace of God, and to him to ascribe all the glory of it. These are the redeemed of the Lord, to whom it is given to believe. They are quickened from a death in trespasses and sins; their consciences are awakened; their understandings are enlightened with the knowledge of Christ; they are enabled in their wills to choose him, and in their hearts to love him, and to rejoice in his salvation. This is entirely the work of the Holy Spirit; for faith is his gift, Eph. ii. 8. Unto you it is given, says the apostle, Phil. i. 29, in the behalf of Christ, to believe on him: none can give it but the Spirit of God; because it is the faith of the operation of God, and requires the same almighty power to believe with the heart, as it did to raise Christ's body from the grave, Eph. i. 20. And this power he puts forth in the preaching of the word, and makes it the power of God unto salvation. The word is called, 2 Cor. iii. 8, the ministration of the Spirit, because by it the Spirit ministers his grace and strength. So Gal. iii. 2, "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" It was by hearing faith preached, that they received the Spirit: for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, which is therefore called the word of faith. And thus the word is the means, in the hand of the Spirit, to dispose the hearts of those who hear it, to receive and to embrace Christ; whereby they retain the righteousness of faith, as Rom. x. 10: "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." The heart is the chief thing in believing; for into it Christ is received, and in it he dwells by faith. The vital union between Christ and the believer is manifested and made known in the heart, and therein it is cemented and established. With joy can the believer say, "My Beloved is mine, and I am his;" happy for me, we are but one person in the eye of the law, and our interests are but one. Blessed state this! Christ gives himself freely to the believer, who also gives himself up in faith to Christ; Christ, as the believer's surety, has taken his sins upon himself, and the believer takes Christ's righteousness; for Christ makes over all that he has to the believer, who by faith looks upon it and makes use of it as his own; according to that express warrant for his so doing, in 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23. All things are yours, because ye belong to Christ.

This vital union between Christ and the believer is largely treated of in scripture. Christ thus speaks of it in his prayer for his people, John xvii: "I pray for them who shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us. I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one." And in John vi. 56, he says, "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him;" and this in-dwelling is by faith, as Eph. iii. 17: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith." And it is the office of the Holy Spirit to manifest this union to their hearts, as John xiv. 20: "At that day, when the Spirit of truth is come, ye shall know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you." And besides these and many other plain words, this union is also represented by several striking images, such as that of husband and wife, who are, in law, but one person; the husband being answerable for the wife's debts, and the wife sharing in her husband's honours and goods. It is set forth by the union between a building and the foundation upon which it stands secure; between a tree and its branches, which live because they are in the tree, and grow by the sap which they receive from it; between the head and the members, which by holding under the head live and grow, having a supply of nourishment administered to every part. Under these beautiful images the scripture sets forth the reality and the blessed fruits of this union. The Holy Spirit makes it known to the believer by enabling him to rely on God's word as infallible truth, and to receive Christ's person as the almighty Saviour; and he strengthens it by enabling the believer to make use of Christ's fulness, and to live by faith upon him in all his offices, for the partaking of all his promised graces and blessings.

That faith which is of the operation of God always produces the knowledge and the fruits of this blessed union, and enables the soul to give itself up to Christ, that it may be one with him, not in a figurative, metaphorical way, but as really and truly as the building is one with the foundation; as much one in interest as husband and wife; one in influence, as the root and the branches, the head and the members. So that this is not an empty notion about Christ, or some clear knowledge of him, or a mere approving of his way of salvation, but it is an actual receiving of him into the heart for righteousness to justify, and to dwell and reign there to sanctify; a receiving him as a perfect Saviour, and living upon him and his fulness; waiting upon him to be taught daily; trusting wholly for acceptance to his blood and righteousness; resting, relying, leaning, upon his promised strength to hold out unto the end; and hoping for eternal life as the free gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. The saving faith thus receives Christ, and thus lives upon Christ.

Now, reader, examine and prove thyself, whether thou hast this faith. Dost thou believe with thy heart unto righteousness? Thou canst not live upon Christ, unless thou art first in Christ. Thou must be first persuaded of thine interest in him, before thou canst make use of it, and improve it; and therefore the knowledge of thy union with him must be clear and plain, before thou canst have a free and open communion with him. There must be faith, before there can be the fruits of faith; and strong faith, before there can be much and ripe fruit. Little faith will receive but little from Christ. The weak believer is full of doubts and fears; and when he wants comfort or strength, or any other things which Christ has promised to give his people, he is questioning whether he has any right to expect them; and therefore he does not receive them; because he has not boldness and access with confidence to God by faith in Christ Jesus. From hence appears the necessity of being established in the faith. The believer must have clear evidence of his interest in Christ, before he can live comfortable and happy upon Christ: therefore he must look well to the foundation, and see there be no doubts left about his being settled upon it. Christ being the sure foundation, how can he safely build thereon all his salvation, unless he be first satisfied that he is upon it? The peace with God in his conscience, every act of spiritual life, and the whole walk and well ordering of his conversation, depend upon the settling of this point. It ought to be finally determined, and brought to this issue: "Christ is mine; I know it from the word of God. I have the witness of the Spirit of God, and Christ allows me, unworthy as I am, to make use of him and of his fulness for the supply of all my needs; and I find I do make use of him, and thereby I know, from daily experience, that I am in him, because I live upon him." According as this point is settled, so in proportion will be the life of faith. If the believer be thoroughly grounded in it without any doubt or fear, then he may and will with confidence improve his interest in Christ; but if he still leave it in suspense, his faith can be but little, and therefore he will obtain little comfort or strength from Christ.

Reader! art thou one of the weak in faith? Dost thou feel it? Dost thou mourn for it? and dost thou know from whence thy faith is to be strengthened? Who can increase it but he alone who gives it? Oh! pray, then, to the Lord God to give thee the spirit of wisdom and revelation, that the eyes of thy understanding may be enlightened to see the infinite sufficiency of Christ's person, as God-man, and the everlasting merit of his life and death to save his people from their sins. And whatever hinders thee from seeing the fulness of Christ's salvation, and resting comfortably by faith upon it, earnestly entreat the Lord to remove it. If it be sin, beg of God to make thee more willing to part with it. If it be guilt, pray him to ordain peace in thy conscience through the blood of sprinkling. If it be much corruption, it cannot be subdued until it be first pardoned. If thou hast got under the spirit of bondage, look up to the Lord Christ for that liberty, wherewith he makes his people free. Whatever it be, as soon as it is discovered to thee, make use of prayer, believing God's word of faithfulness, that what thou asketh thou shalt have, and that he will so establish thee that thou shalt go on from faith to faith. May it be thy happy case! Amen.

Reader! if thou art an awakened man, convinced of sin by the word and Spirit of God, all thine enemies will try to keep thee from the clear knowledge of thy union with Christ. The reason is plain; because then thou wilt not be able to depend upon Christ's promised strength, and to make use of it by faith, which is almighty to defeat them all. Hearken not, therefore, to any suggestion, nor be afraid of any opposition, which would hinder thee from seeking to be fully convinced of thine interest in Christ, and of thy being a branch in the true vine. Satan will use all his wiles and fiery darts; and all carnal professors will be on his side; and they will have close allies in thine own breast, in thine unbelief, in thy legal spirit, and in thy lusts and corruptions. Consider, why do these enemies fight so hard against thy being safely settled, and comfortably grounded upon Christ by living faith? Is it not because thou wilt then be an overmatch for them, through the strength of Jesus? And does not this plainly show thee the absolute necessity of knowing that Christ and thou are one? Till this be known, thou wilt be afraid to apply to him and to make use of his strength; and till thou dost use it, all thine enemies will triumph over thee. Oh, beg of God then to increase thy faith, that thou mayest be fully convinced of thy union with Christ, and mayest live in him safe, and on him happy. Hear and read his word, and pray for the effectual working of the Lord the Spirit in it, and by it, that faith may come and grow by hearing, until it be finally settled without doubt or wavering, that Christ is thine, and thou art his.

After the believer is thus grounded and established in the knowledge of his union with Christ, it behoves him then to inquire what God has given him a right to in consequence of this union; and the scripture will inform him, that in the covenant of grace it has pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell in his Son, as the head, for the use of his members. He has it to supply all their need. They cannot possibly want any thing, but it is treasured up for them in his infinite fulness: there they may have it, grace for grace, every moment, as their occasions require; and they have it in no other way, and by no other hand, than faith, trusting the word of promise, and relying upon Christ's faithfulness and power to fulfil it; as it is written, "the just shall live by his faith," Hab. ii. 3: having received justification to live by faith in the righteousness of Christ, he depends on Christ to keep him alive, and makes use of Christ's fulness for all the wants of that spiritual life which he has given. He trusts him for them all, and lives upon him by faith for the continual receiving of them all; and according to his faith, so is it done unto him.

Let this be well weighed and considered, that the justified person lives and performs every act of spiritual life by faith. This is a very important lesson, and therefore it is taught in scripture as plainly as words can speak. Every thing is promised to, and is received by, faith. Thus it is said, Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus; and if children, then heirs according to the promise, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, who of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, and holiness; made for their use wisdom to teach them, righteousness to justify them, and holiness to sanctify them; yea, he has all things in his fulness for their use, as the free grant speaks, 1 Cor. iii. 21, &c. "All things are yours, whether Paul or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." Consider, believer, what a large estate this is: thy title to it is good, and thou enterest into possession by faith. See, then, that thou make use of thine inheritance, and live upon it. Do not say, when thou wantest any thing, I know not where to get it: for whatever the God-man has of wisdom, righteousness, holiness, power and glory, he has it, as the head of the body for thee as one of his members, for thy use and benefit, and he has promised it to thee in his word. Make free with him, then. Go to him with confidence. Thou canst not do him greater honour than to receive from him what he has to give. That is glorifying him. It is putting the crown upon his head, and confessing him to be a perfect, all-sufficient Christ, when it pleaseth thee, as it did his Father, that in him should all fulness dwell, and when thou art content to live out of thyself upon his fulness for the supply of all thy needs, in time and in eternity. To live thus upon him is his glory, and it is thy privilege, thy interest, and thy happiness. In every state, spiritual and temporal, and in every circumstance, thou canst possibly be in, thou art commanded to look up to Christ, that thou mayest receive out of his fulness, and to depend upon him to save thee from every evil, and to bestow upon thee every good. In thy walk heavenwards, and in every thing thou meetest with by the way, put thy trust in Christ, and expect from him the fulfilling of all his promises. He has all power in heaven and earth for that very purpose. Still rely upon him, and cast thy burdens on him, when thou art tempted, when old corruptions arise, when the world and the devil assault thee, when under a sense of weakness and dulness in duty, when in darkness and desertion, in persecution and trouble, in pain and poverty, in sickness and death. This is the life of faith. Thou wilt live like a Christian indeed, if, being in any of these cases, thou believest that Christ is able, because he is almighty, and willing, because he has promised, to supply thy wants, and then canst trust in him for that supply. Depend upon it, thou shalt have it, and it shall be done unto thee according to his word.

After the believer is become one with Christ, and through him has a right to all the riches of grace, and may by faith make use of them as his own, why is he so long in learning this lesson perfectly? Being adopted into the heavenly family, and an heir of the heavenly inheritance, why does not he immediately live up to his privilege and to his estate? His title is good. The inheritance is sure. All things are become his; for all fulness is in Christ, and, by virtue of his union with Christ, this fulness is his, and he may by faith be always receiving out of it every grace and blessing which Christ has promised. Why, then, does not he at once attain to this happy life of faith? Sad experience proves that young believers do not. They meet with so many difficulties, that they grow up slowly into Christ in all things. They do not attain to a solid establishment in the faith in a day. Enemies without and within stop their progress, insomuch that they often continue little children for a long time. They have the same right to Christ, the same privileges, and the same promised grace, which young men and fathers in Christ have; but they have not learned by experience how to improve their interest in him, and to make the most of it. The difficulties and temptations which weaken their hold of Christ, and stop their growth in him, are many; some of the chief are these:—

1. They continue little children and weak in faith, because they do not presently attain a solid acquaintance with the person of Christ, and are not thoroughly satisfied how able he was and sufficient for every thing he undertook, and how perfectly he has finished every part of his work.

2. This keeps them ignorant of many things in which the glory of his salvation consists: hence they have not clear believing views of its fulness, and of its freeness.

3. By which means they labour under many doubts about the manner of their receiving this salvation. A legal spirit working with their unbelief puts them upon reasoning continually against being saved freely by grace through faith; and,

4. These legal unbelieving reasonings gain great power from their unskilfulness in their warfare between nature and grace, the old man and the new, the flesh and the spirit; and,

5. All these difficulties are mightily strengthened from their hearkening to sense, and trusting to its reports more than to the word of God. While believers are under these difficulties, their faith meets with many checks in its growth; and, until they be enabled to overcome them, they continue to be little children in Christ. Their weak faith receives but little from Christ; and it continues weak, because they have but little dependence upon the effectual working of Christ's mighty power. The exceeding greatness of his power is able to strengthen them, and he has promised it, but they dare not trust him. Consider therefore, reader, if thou art one of these babes, why thou dost not grow up faster into Christ.

The first thing that stops thee is the ignorance which is in thy mind about his person, and the prejudice against him, which is in thy carnal heart. These are in all men by nature; and these Satan will work upon, in order to hinder the increase of thy faith. He will use all his cunning and his power to keep thee from growing in that knowledge of Christ which is eternal life. He will inject into thy heart blasphemous thoughts against his Godhead; and when thou art reading in scripture, or hearing about his being God manifest in the flesh, he will try to puzzle and perplex thy imagination with a How can these things be? He will represent the union of the two natures in Christ as a thing not to be understood, and as if they, who believed it with the clearest evidence of God's word and Spirit, had only some fancy about it. He has an old grudge against Christ, and will not scruple to tell any lies of him. He was a liar from the beginning, and abode not in the truth. Regard him not. Mind what the word of truth says, and pray thou mayest understand it: for the more thou knowest of the Lord Christ, that blessed God-man, the more wilt thou be settled, and established in him. It is written of him, first, that he is God, true and very God, in the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, a person coequal and coeternal with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, Isa. ix. 6. Unto us a child is born, who is the mighty God; secondly, that he is Jehovah, which signifies the self-existent essence, Isa. xliii. 11. I, even I, am Jehovah; and beside me there is no Saviour: from whence it is evident that the Saviour is Jehovah, and that he exists in a manner independent of, and distinct from, all other beings and things. St. Jude makes the opposition to this fundamental truth the condemning sin of certain heretics, who denied Jesus Christ to be the only Lord God, and our Lord. In the covenant of grace this divine Person undertook to be made man. He who was true and very God was made true and very man; he had a reasonable soul and human flesh, and was in all points like other men, sin excepted. And as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and man is one Christ. This is the glorious Person, who undertook in the covenant of grace to be man's surety. St. Paul calls him the surety of the New Testament: and what could there be wanting in him for this high office? He is every way qualified to be the surety for man, who is himself true and very man, who is also God as well as man, and therefore has all the perfections of Jehovah to render what he did and suffered, as man's surety, infinitely and everlastingly meritorious.

This is the blessed object of faith—God and man united in one Christ. Consider then, reader, what the scripture says of his wonderful person, in order that thy faith in him may be established. That very self-existent God, who spake, and all things were made, who commanded, and they stand fast to this very hour, was made flesh. He came to be the surety for his people, to obey and suffer in their stead. What could not his almighty power effect? Is any thing too hard for the Lord God? What obedience can his Father's law demand, which he is not infinitely able to pay? What sufferings can satisfy his Father's justice, which he is not absolutely qualified to endure? for he has every perfection and attribute equal with the Father. On this truth thou must rest; and is it not a sure foundation? In the certainty of it thou must seek to be more grounded every day; because, as thou growest in the knowledge of his divine person, thou wilt become more satisfied of his infinite sufficiency to save; and, fully convinced of this, thou wilt be enabled from scripture to answer and silence thine own unbelieving thoughts, and reject the blasphemous suggestions of Satan against the Lord Christ. Observe, then, that he is God, and that he is Jehovah. Read and meditate on what the scripture says of his Godhead, and pray that thou mayest be taught of God to understand it: for no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost. It is his office to glorify Jesus, by enabling thee to believe him to be Lord and God, and to call him thy Lord and thy God, and to prove he is so, by thy humble dependence upon him for every blessing, both in time and in eternity.

It is much to be lamented that believers in general take so little pains to get a clear knowledge of the doctrine of the ever-blessed Trinity; for want of which their faith is unsettled, and they are liable to many errors both in judgment and practice. I would therefore most earnestly recommend it to all that are weak in faith, to be diligent in hearing and reading what in scripture is revealed concerning the Trinity in unity, looking up always for the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit; and I would direct them to a form of sound words in the common prayer-book for Trinity Sunday, which contains the shortest and best account of the subject that I ever saw. "It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty, that we should at all times, and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord, almighty, everlasting God: who art one God, one Lord, not one only person, but three persons in one substance: for that which we believe of the glory of the Father, the same we believe of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, without any difference or inequality." These are precious words. Meditate, reader, upon them, and entreat the Holy Spirit to enlighten thine understanding with the saving knowledge of them, that, being established in the doctrine of the ever-blessed Trinity, and of the Godhead of the Lord Christ, thou mayest be enabled to overcome the difficulties which arose.

Secondly, From thy not being well acquainted with the nature of Christ's salvation. Concerning which young believers are apt to have many doubts. Carnal reason is strong in them. The spirit of bondage resists with many and mighty arguments, and unbelief musters up all its forces, and there is a long and obstinate fight against being saved freely and fully by the grace of Christ Jesus. But the arguments which God has provided in his word, when applied by his Spirit, will prevail and overcome. Meditate upon them for the establishing of thy weak faith. Consider, first, the covenant. Salvation is not a thing of chance, or left to man's will or power, but it was contrived by the blessed Trinity in the covenant of grace, and every thing belonging to it was perfectly settled. It is said to be (2 Sam. xxiii. 5.) an everlasting covenant ordered in all things and sure. O thou of little faith! why then dost thou doubt? What! doubt of God's love? Here is a covenant springing from his mere love, and from everlasting. Doubt of its being well contrived! Infinite wisdom orders it in all things. Doubt of its being well executed! It is in all things sure; sure as God's almighty power and faithfulness can make it. What motives are here for the strengthening of thy faith! May the Lord render them effectual!

Reflect, Secondly, upon the undertakings of the Lord Christ, the Surety of this covenant. There was nothing left out of this covenant; it was ordered in all things belonging to salvation, and Christ undertook to perform all things on the part of his Father, that his law might be magnified, and his justice made honourable and glorious; and on the part of the sinner, that he might be saved from all evil, and entitled to all good. And being God and man united in one Christ, he was a proper surety to reconcile God to man, and to reconcile man to God. May these things, then, sink deep into thy heart, that thy surety has undertaken the whole of thy salvation, to do all for thee, and all in thee, and all by thee. What canst thou desire more for the settling of thy faith?

3. Perhaps thou wilt say, His undertakings were great; but has he fulfilled them? Yes; and so perfectly that he is able to save to the uttermost. He was called Jesus because he was to save his people from their sins; as their surety he was to fulfil the law for them by his obedience, and to suffer the pains and penalties of it by his death and passion. Accordingly, in the fulness of time he was manifest in the flesh, and came to do the will of his Father. Of his obedience to that will, he thus speaks: "I have finished the work, which thou gavest me to do." Of his suffering that will he said with his last breath, "It is finished." Observe, whatever he undertook to do in his life and death was finished; and it was demonstrated that, as man's surety, he had done and suffered every thing ordered in the covenant by his resurrection from the dead; for then did the Father declare him to be the Son of God with power. Will not all this satisfy thee? O thou of little faith! Here is one more cause of thy doubting removed; thou canst not deny but Christ has finished every thing he undertook; and in consequence thereof he has all power in heaven and earth to bestow a full and finished salvation. What canst thou now object?

4. Does a thought arise in thy heart? It is finished; but is it so freely given that such an unworthy creature as I am may partake of it? Yes; it comes to thee in the way of a free gift. Great, inestimable, and eternal, as it is, yet it is all thine in receiving. Not he who worketh, but he who believeth, is justified from all things. It is by faith that believers are justified and sanctified, are strengthened and comforted in their walk; by faith they fight against all their enemies; and by faith they conquer, and lay hold of eternal life: and therefore it is all of faith, that it might be by grace. Salvation is wrought out and finished by thy surety, given to thee freely, continued with all its blessings in time and through eternity; as a free gift, to the praise of the glory of free grace. Why, therefore, art thou discouraged? Hast thou nothing to buy with? Then obey the Lord's command: Come and buy free salvation, without money, and without price. How should this motive still add to the establishment of thy faith! For there thou seest, whatever thou wantest is thine by believing. Thou mayest have it freely by grace: it is treasured up for thee in the fulness of thy dear Saviour, and thou canst not honour him more than to make free use of it. What dost thou say to this? Hast thou anything to object? Canst thou find any fault with the covenant of grace, or with the undertakings of the God-man in it? No, certainly; the covenant was well ordered in all things, and sure; and what the Surety of the covenant undertook, he has perfectly fulfilled. Salvation is finished on his part: he has glorified the law by his infinitely perfect obedience; he has made divine justice honourable by his sufferings and death; he has brought in everlasting righteousness for his people; and will bring them to everlasting glory: for he has already taken possession of it for them as the head of the body the church; and he has all power in heaven and earth to save them day by day, until he make them partakers of his eternal salvation. What can thy heart wish for more than such a Saviour, and such a salvation. Oh! be not faithless, then, but believing; and if thou hast any doubts left, endeavour to have them cleared up by reading and prayer, until thy faith be perfectly settled on the divinity of God thy Saviour, and the infinite sufficiency of his salvation. These two points lay at the very foundation of the Christian religion: they must be supposed in all its principles, and built upon in all its practice; therefore, being of universal influence, if they be thoroughly established, thy faith will be stedfast, and thy life well ordered and comfortable. Examine, then, and prove thyself here before thou readest any farther. Dost thou believe Christ to be true and very God, in every perfection and attribute equal with the Father? and is his a full and a free salvation? All the following directions depend upon, and can only profit thee so far as thou believest, these two points. Look well, then, to thy establishment in them. If it be strong, the life of faith will be steady and prosperous; but if it be weak, thou wilt be liable to be tost about continually with errors, and overcome with temptations, especially with those to which a legal spirit will expose thee, as I purposed to show under the Third general head; in which is to be considered, how the little children in Christ, for want of being established in the belief of his Godhead, and of his full and free salvation, labour under many doubts; a legal spirit, working with their unbelief, puts them upon reasoning continually against being saved freely by grace through faith.

He is of a legal spirit who is under the law, and apprehends himself bound to keep it as the condition of life requiring of him, Do this, and thou shalt live. In his understanding he sees this, and no other way, to life; in his will he is continually inclined to it, and in his heart he loves it; because he fancies it in his own power to attain life in this way, and he can merit it by his own works, which mightily gratifies his self-love, and indulges his pride. The legal spirit reigns over all men in their natural state, but does not discover its tyranny until it be opposed; and then, so soon as the soul is quickened from a death in trespasses and sins, it begins to fight, trying to keep the poor sinner in bondage by its legal workings and strivings, and putting him upon seeking for some good disposition or qualification in himself, on account of which God should love him. Thus the awakened soul, under the spirit of bondage, always seeks deliverance by the works of that law which can do nothing more than bring him to the knowledge of sin, discover to him the exceeding sinfulness of it, and the exceeding great punishment which it deserves; by which means it is always nourishing the doubts and fears of unbelief. And after the Lord has, in a measure, removed them by a clear discovery of the salvation that is in Jesus, and by the gift of faith, yet still this legal spirit will be trying to bring the soul into bondage again to fear; and it too often prevails. Young believers find it the worst enemy they have to deal with. It is a sly, subtle foe, that seems to intend them a kindness, while it is always on the side of their greatest enemy. It would appear to them to be actuated by a zeal for God, but it is to eclipse the glory of the Lord Christ, to take away the all-sufficiency of his salvation, and to rob them of their great joy and peace in believing.

If any one should ask how this legal spirit comes to have such power over mankind; the scripture informs us,

First, that all men, being God's creatures, are under the law to him, bound to keep it, or bound, if they transgress, to suffer the threatened pains and penalties. In this state man was created, and in it all men are by nature; and therefore there is in us all a continual leaning to the law, and a desire to attain righteousness by the works of it. We are wedded to this way of gaining God's favour. The apostle says, there is a marriage union between us and the law, and it, like a husband, has dominion over us as long as it liveth; so that we cannot be married to Christ until that be dead wherein we are held. You may see this in the Jews. How does Moses labour to bring them off from an opinion of their own righteousness? And a greater than Moses has done the same in his discourses against the scribes and pharisees; yea, the apostles of our Lord were forced to write and preach against this leaning to the law, it gave such disturbance to the true disciples of Christ. And notwithstanding the scripture arguments against it, yet we have great numbers among us who seek for a justifying righteousness by the works of the law. And they are put upon seeking this,

Secondly, from their ignorance of the law. They are not acquainted with its nature; for it demands what they cannot pay. It insists upon an obedience, spiritual, perfect, and uninterrupted: for the least offence, if but in thought, it comes with its fearful sentence, "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things, that are written in the book of the law to do them." On him who does not continue in all things (and not one man ever did) this sentence takes place; and if he were to live a thousand years, he could not do any thing to repeal it. The law will always be to him the ministration of condemnation, and the ministration of death; and this is all it can do for him. It provides no remedy, and gives him no hope, but leaves him condemned to the first and to the second death; and yet, such is the blindness of the sinner, that he will be still leaning to the law, and afraid to trust wholly to the righteousness of Christ; and this arises, Thirdly, From his ignorance of Christ's righteousness, which is infinitely perfect and wants no works of the law to be joined with it in the justifying of a sinner, because it is the righteousness of God wrought out by the God-man for his people, and it is the righteousness of faith; they receive it by faith without works; so that it is directly opposite to the righteousness of a legal spirit. Hence we have many among us—great professors too—who are ignorant of God's righteousness: they have not been entirely brought off from a legal bottom, and therefore they talk of being justified without a justifying righteousness, which, if God were to do, he would be unrighteous, and which he has declared he will not do, their fancied justification leaves them still in their sins. They dare not put their whole trust and confidence in the righteousness of Christ imputed unto sinners, and made theirs by faith. They have many fears about imputed righteousness, although the apostle has not scrupled to mention it eleven times in one chapter, Rom. iv; and these fears make them read the scripture with such prejudice, that they say they cannot find the expression, "faith in the righteousness of Christ," in all the Bible. They may find the sense of the expression in Moses, and in all the prophets, and the very words in 2 Pet. i. 1. Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ to them who have obtained like precious faith with us, in the Greek is εις, in the righteousness of God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Here is faith in the righteousness of Christ, with several glorious titles to recommend it; namely, it is the righteousness of God, of God our Saviour, of Jesus Christ. From whence can men's opposition to this way of justification arise, but from their not being convinced by the Spirit of God of the necessity of Christ's righteousness? It is his peculiar office to convince of this truth. No teaching but his can do it. Oh that he may do it in the hearts of those who, out of a zeal for God, though not according to knowledge, eclipse the glory of the Lord, and rob afflicted consciences of their comfort by opposing imputed righteousness! It is a righteousness of so high and heavenly a nature, wrought out by another and so wonderful a Person, is bestowed as a free gift upon the chief of sinners, whereby alone they obtain remission of their sins, and are made partakers of the kingdom of heaven; and they receive it by faith only without works, which a legal spirit always wants to mix with it, that no one could ever believe in it unless it were given him from above. May it be given to those professors who cannot yet submit to the righteousness of Christ to see their want of it, and with the heart to believe in it unto salvation!

Reader! hast thou not found what an enemy this legal spirit is to thy peace and joy, and how it is always inclining thee to some self-righteousness, through thy ignorance of the righteousness of the law, and of the righteousness of faith? And wouldst thou gladly be delivered from it? Know, then, that nothing can subdue it but the bringing into thy conscience a better hope from a better righteousness than that of the law; and when thou art enabled to plead it there against all the charges of sin and Satan, then thou wilt stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made thee free. His is a better righteousness; it is infinitely perfect and everlasting; even the righteousness of God. By faith in this righteousness thou shalt be saved from the law, and shalt receive remission of sins; through it the Father doth accept thee and give thee the Spirit of his Son to lead, and comfort, and sanctify thee; he doth love thee and bless thee, as his dear child, making all things work together under him for thy good, and keeping thee by his mighty power through faith unto salvation: so that, in and on account of this righteousness, thou shalt be saved from all the evils of sin, and receive all spiritual blessings in earth and heaven. And this thou shalt have freely, without any merit, or work of the law; for the righteousness comes wholly by grace, and is for thee a sinner as such, and is to justify thee from the condemnation of the law, to turn its curses into blessings, and its threatened punishments into happiness. And this it can do for thee perfectly and everlastingly; so that, being found in this righteousness, there is no grace promised in time, or glory in eternity, but it shall be thine. The Lord God promises them to thee in the fullest and freest manner; to thee, without any exception or limitation, being a sinner and ungodly, though one of the vilest and basest; yet to thee, as such, is the word of this salvation sent. And it will be all thine in the comfortable enjoyment of it, through believing. Thou art to bring nothing to recommend thee, but that thou art a sensible sinner, and thy right and title to a finished salvation is clear from the warrant of God's word, when thou believest with thy heart in the righteousness of Christ. The divine command is, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ:" the promise is, "Whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, shall receive remission of sins, shall be justified from all things, shall have everlasting life." Why, then, dost thou lean to works, since salvation is by faith? Why dost thou disquiet thyself about attaining the righteousness of the law, and thereby suffer the law to disturb the peace of thy conscience, since thou hast a far better righteousness, which ought to reign there, even the righteousness which is of God by faith? For thou art a believer, and although a weak one, yet thou hast as good a title to Christ and his righteousness as the strongest believer in the world; because thy right comes from the free grant of the word of grace, and is apprehended by faith, by which all things are become thine. Thou art an heir of them all by faith in Christ Jesus. O thou of little faith! why, then, dost thou doubt? Remember, how highly thou dishonourest the infinite love and free salvation of Jesus, and how much thou robbest thy own soul of its peace and of its own growth in grace by thy weak and little faith. Think upon these things, and entreat the Author and Finisher of the faith to strengthen it in thy soul.

But perhaps thou wilt say, How shall I so live upon Christ with my weak faith that it may grow stronger, and I may get the better of my legal spirit? Here is the remedy: may it be to thee effectual! The scripture directs thee to look at Christ God-man as thy surety, who for thee has wrought out a finished salvation, and whatever he has promised in his word relating to this salvation, thou art to trust him for the making of it good, and to depend upon his faithfulness and power to make it good to thee. Whatever, therefore, he has done and suffered to save thee from the curse of the law, and from the spirit of bondage, and to make thee free with the liberty of the children of God, thou art to live upon him for these blessings, and by faith to be always receiving them from him in the fullest and largest measure that he promises them to thee. Look not into thyself, then, for any qualification; but look unto Jesus, that thou mayest experience more of that liberty wherewith he hath made thee free, and mayest be no longer a babe unskilful in the word of righteousness. Hear what he says: If the Son shall make you free ye shall be free indeed, free from the law of sin and death, free from condemnation at the bar of God, and, being freed from the bondage of corruption, ye shall be brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. This is the freedom which God promises thee: it is very extensive, has many noble privileges, and vast blessings. By faith all is thine. See how perfectly believers have received all; and may thy faith be like theirs! "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness to our spirit, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." Rom. viii. 15, &c. Observe what is here said of the believing Romans, and by faith thou shalt experience the same, as perfectly as they did.

1. They were freed from the spirit of bondage, under which they once had laboured:

2. They were so freed as to be under it no more; they were not to fear again, as heretofore: for,

3. They had received the Spirit of adoption, and he gave them the evidence of their sonship. Upon which,

4. They believed God was their reconciled Father, and they had boldness and access to him with confidence. And therefore,

5. They lived in light and walked in love, like his children and heirs, who were to abide in his house for ever.

See also what great freedom the Galatians had, chap. iv. 4, &c.: "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying Abba, Father: wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." Oh what treasures of grace and consolation are there in this scripture, tending to subdue thy legal spirit! Consider some of them.

1. All men having broken the law, and being under the curse of it, Christ was made under the law, that the law might reach him as the surety of his people; accordingly,

2. By his obedience to the precepts, and by his suffering the penalties of the law, he redeemed his people, who were under the law; so that,

3. They are no longer in bondage to it; but being made free, and having received the adoption of sons,

4. They have the spirit of liberty, sent into their hearts to witness to them that Christ fulfilled the law for them; and,

5. That the Father loves them, as his dear children, and they love him and serve him without fear, crying to him, Abba, Father;

6. Wherefore they are no longer servants in bondage to any one, but are made free indeed, being now the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus. And,

7. If sons, then heirs of God, and free to inherit whatever he has promised to give his children in earth and heaven.

These and many more arguments are contained in this one scripture, tending to subdue thy legal spirit, and to bring thee to live more comfortably by faith upon Christ, who, as thy surety, has fully kept the law for thee in his life and death. Thou art to consider thyself now, not under the law, but under grace, and therefore absolutely free from the condemning power of the law. This thou must maintain against all the carnal reasonings of thy legal spirit: "Christ is my law-fulfiller." And thou wilt glorify him for redeeming thee from under the law, and wilt live in sweet peace in thine own conscience, while thou keepest fast hold of this most blessed and eternally precious truth. May all thy reading and prayer, and the use of all means help thee to grow in the knowledge and experience of it!

There is a very strong bias and leaning in weak believers to a legal spirit, which ought to make them read such promises as I have been mentioning over and over again, that God may thereby encourage them to maintain the liberty which he hath given them in Christ Jesus, and to stand fast in it against the fresh attacks of the devil and unbelief. They should be always jealous over themselves, and watchful against their enemies; because, after they have in a truly gospel and evangelical way, through grace, got their legal spirit subdued, yet if it be not in the same way kept subdued, it will break out with more power than ever, and will be likely to bring them into bondage again to fear. And this may, and I have known it, often happen: after they had obtained some great victories over it, and finding it not stir for some time, they flattered themselves they should have but little trouble with it any more. Thus they were drawn off their guard, which gave room to their legal spirit to exert itself again with vigour. This surprised the weak believers, and put them upon reasoning and doubting, whether all had been right with them before; and so, at the very time when they should have taken the shield of faith, and should have been making use of it, they were questioning whether they had any; which left them unarmed in the midst of their enemies, an easy prey to every temptation; but an invisible power kept them safe, although they were not comfortable in themselves.

For the encouragement of persons in this case, that they may presently recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, they should observe,

First, What the scripture says of a legal spirit; describing it to be one of the members of their corrupt nature; one of the affections of the flesh; which will never be quite dead while the breath is in their bodies. It is an enemy that will be always fighting against the Holy Spirit; for they are directly contrary the one to the other; and therefore believers must not dream of any such victory as leaves no more fighting, but must expect sharp battles with their legal spirit as long as ever they live. And,

Secondly, the same means, by which they formerly obtained victory, must be made use of again. As often as the legal spirit is tempting, Christ's strength must be opposed to it, and his strength must be brought into the soul by faith in his righteousness; as it is written, Isa. xlv. 24: "Surely shall one say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Righteousness comes first, and is established in the conscience, that it may be pleaded and maintained there against all the charges and accusations of the law. And as often as these arise afresh, still they must be answered and silenced with this plea:—In the Lord Christ have I righteousness; he is my law-fulfiller; and I depend upon his promised strength to make me stand fast in that liberty wherewith he hath made me free. And the soul must not only thus quiet and stay itself by faith upon the righteousness and strength of Christ for victory over the present temptation, but must also,

Thirdly, continually do this; because there is in our nature a continual opposition to it. The experience of which is the believer's safety. The abiding sense of his being naturally inclined to lean to legal dependencies, and therefore his want of Christ every moment to justify him by his righteousness, and to keep him by his strength, will be the surest way to prevent his falling into bondage; for this will keep him very jealous over himself, and will show him the necessity of living out of himself for righteousness and strength; and while he liveth upon Christ for these by faith, he shall not be overcome by any enemy.

The glory of the incarnate God, and his infinite sufficiency to save, have not a greater enemy than a legal spirit; and therefore I have enlarged upon this point, that believers might be convinced, from the word of God, they were saved from the condemnation of the law. They will never live comfortably till they see the law dead and buried, and then willingly give up themselves to be espoused to Christ, who will make them free indeed. And when they have learned of him to enjoy and walk in their Christian liberty, then they will be better acquainted with the warfare between nature and grace, the old man and the new, the flesh and the spirit, which warfare is the Fourth great hindrance, that stops the growth of faith in weak believers. They are unskilful in it, soon tired of it, and often likely to be defeated. They do not enter into the battle strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, nor are they certain, if they fall in battle, they shall be saved with an eternal salvation. These are great discouragements, and, until these be removed, they cannot fight the good fight of faith, like good soldiers of Christ Jesus.

The case is thus:—There is in every believer an old man, and a new man, nature and grace, flesh and spirit; and these are opposite and contrary the one to the other in their principles and actions; they are always desiring different things, and pursuing different ends, which occasions a continual war between them. The flesh lusteth always against the spirit, and has many and mighty allies on its side,—armies of lusts, the faculties of soul and body to bring forth sin, hosts of fallen angels, and all the world that layeth in wickedness. But the new man, renewed in the spirit of his mind, has a reconciled God on his side, and therefore he need not fear what any enemy can do unto him, but may bravely face the stoutest of them, even death itself, relying upon that sure word of promise, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Here is the believer's encouragement to fight; his God will never leave him. Here he obtains victory every day: his God never forsakes him; and after he has fought the good fight of faith, his God and Saviour will make him more than conqueror: he will send death to kill sin. And then the believer will never more have temptation from it, nor sorrow about it. But till that happy time come, he must be fighting against his corrupt nature and all its allies. No peace can be made with them, not even a truce. He must expect no kind of favour from them; because they are God's irreconcilable enemies, and therefore, as long as he is in the world, he must be fighting against the world; as long as he has a body of flesh, he must oppose it with its affections and lusts, because they war against the soul; and as long as he is in the reach of temptation, he must oppose the tempter, be steadfast in the faith, never putting off his armour until the Lord give him a discharge.

The believer's peace within, and victory without, are closely connected with the clear understanding of this case; and although I have stated it from the word of God, and agreeably to the sense in which the church of God has always interpreted it, yet, for its more full confirmation, some testimonies must be brought, which speak to the very point: first, to the believer's having in him an old man and a new; secondly, that these two are at war; and thirdly, that they fight together till death.

First, the apostle says to the saints at Ephesus, Eph. iv. 22, &c., "put off the old man, put on the new." Mind, the same persons had both in them an old man, corrupt according to his deceitful lusts, daily to be put off, and a new man to be put on, and renewed, day by day, in the spirit of his mind. The old man is described to have a body of sin with all his members, his affections and his lusts; these must not be obeyed, but mortified. "Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof; neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin," Rom. vi. 12, 13. The saints at Rome had sin in them; and it wanted to reign, as it had done heretofore, in the lusts hereof; but,

Secondly, They were not to obey them. There was in them a new man, who was to fight against those fleshly lusts which war against the soul. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would," Gal. v. 17. Here is battle between two: the flesh, the whole nature of the old man; and the spirit of the new man, born again of the Spirit: the cause of it is, the one wills what the other hates; each wants to carry his own will into execution; and these being contrary the one to the other, they fight for mastery; in the battle, the flesh, the old man, is defeated, and the spirit working in the new man conquers; and this lusting and fighting is in one and the same person; in him who is said to be not under the law, to be led by the spirit, and to live and to walk in the spirit. In Rom. viii. 7, the apostle calls the flesh "the carnal mind," and he says, "It is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Since it is enmity itself, there is no reconciling it; it will not, nay it cannot, obey God, but is ever lusting and rebelling against his law. The nature of the battle is described at length in Rom. vii. The chapter consists of three parts: first, the believer's liberty from the law to ver. 6; secondly, he answers some objections made against the law from its nature and properties, and that in his own person, because it had been the means of bringing him to the right knowledge of sin, ver. 7; and sin being discovered by the law through the corruption of nature, raged and rebelled the more in him, ver. 8; and the law had made him sensible of God's anger against sin, and of his deserving death and hell for it, ver. 9 to 14; and from thence to the end of the chapter he describes the conflict between the old man and the new, the one consenting to the law, and the other resisting the law. In this conflict there were sharp attacks: in the first he found in himself two contrary principles of action always resisting each other; the old man fighting against the new, from ver. 14 to 18; secondly, when the will of the new man was good through the opposition of the old man, it had not the desired effect, ver. 19, 20; and thirdly, he felt in himself two contrary laws, both requiring obedience; the law of the members warring and rebelling against the law of God written in the renewed mind: for no sooner did his mind, guided by the Holy Spirit, set about any thing which God's law commanded, but he found the law of the members making a strong resistance. This he groaned under as a heavy burden, and was humbled for it before God, expecting pardon from him, and victory every day, and perfect deliverance at last.

I cannot enlarge upon this chapter. Turn to it, and read it over upon the plan which I have here laid down; remembering all along, that St. Paul is describing himself. He ten times says, it is himself he is speaking of, from ver. 7 to ver. 14, where he is showing of what use the law had been to him when he was first convinced of sin; and from thence to the end, he mentions himself thirty-eight times. I, the apostle Paul, I myself, my very self, and not another; I myself am, now, at this present, at the very time of writing this; I myself, whom the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made free from the law of sin and death; I myself, to whom now there is no condemnation, for I am in Christ Jesus, and I walk after the Spirit, am still at war with sin that dwelleth in me, with the old man, with the flesh, with the law of the members, with the body of sin. Although I have a new nature, and God is on my side, yet it is a hard and a sharp battle. I find it so. The length of it makes it still more painful, and forces me to cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Paul was not out of God's favour, or accursed; but as the word rendered wretched means, he was weary and tired with his continual fighting; troubled with the filthy motions of sin rising and striving and rebelling in him, and giving him no rest: this was such a hard warfare, that he was ever looking out and praying, "Who shall deliver me?" He meant wholly, perfectly, deliver me from this corruption. He sighed for it, not because he doubted of an absolute deliverance, but because he had sure and certain hope of it; not because he was ignorant who his deliverer was, but because he had steadfast faith in him. "Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ." This comforted him, and kept him fighting on with courage. He knew that he should gain the victory, and through Christ, not through his own virtues or works, but through faith in the life and death, in the blood and righteousness of Christ, he should at last be more than conqueror.

Since this was the case with the apostle, who can expect a discharge from this warfare until death? What! says one, is it to continue so long? Yes. The scripture is very clear to this point, as I was, thirdly, to show,

The seat of the corruption of the old man, or of the flesh, is not only in our nature, but is also our very nature itself. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, altogether carnal and corrupt. It is a filthy fountain, always sending forth impure streams; and therefore, while the believer is in the body, he must either be fighting against the flesh, or else be led captive by it. We that are, says Paul, in this tabernacle of flesh, do groan, being burdened with sin and sorrow. And when did they expect an end of their groaning, and rest from their burdens? Not till the tabernacle was dissolved by death. Ourselves, says he, who have the first fruits of the spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. The body will be redeemed from the grave, and raised like the glorious body of Jesus Christ: this is promised, and this we wait for; and until death deliver us from this mortal corruptible body, we shall be groaning under the burden of it. This was St. Paul's case. He had long sighed to be discharged from his warfare, and, like an old weary tired soldier, he wished the hard tedious campaign was ended, that he might enter into rest: but hear with what joy he at last cries out, "I have fought the good fight." Have fought it? What! is the battle over? Yes, just over.—"I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand—I have finished my course:"—My battle and my life are finished together, and so must thine, reader. Thou art to resist unto blood, striving against sin; for thou art called to fight the good fight of faith, until thou lay hold of eternal life. Since thou art a believer, however weak, and hast a new man in thee, as well as an old, they will be fighting against each other till thou finish thy course. And if this discourage thee, consider what God has spoken concerning this warfare, and what exceeding great and precious promises he has made to them who are engaged in it. He has promised to pardon those corruptions of the old man, to subdue them, and to deliver thee from the very being of them. Canst thou desire more? Mark well what he says to thee, and be not faithless, but believing.

First, although the believer has an old man, corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, always warring against the new man, yet the Lord God has promised a free and a full pardon; because he has imputed sin, all thy sin, to the Son of his love, who bore it in his own body upon the tree. After the apostle, in Rom. vii. had described the battle between them, he makes this inference—"There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus,"—to them who are in Christ, united by faith as members to him their head, and thereby partakers of his righteousness, there is now, while they are fighting against their corruptions, no condemnation; "For," says he, "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and of death," Rom. viii. 2. These words demonstrate, that Paul was speaking of himself in the seventh chapter. Although he had the corruption of nature still in him, and was fighting against it, yet, being in Christ by faith, he was made free from the guilt and punishment due to it; therefore he had, and every believer shall have, a full pardon. In consequence of which,

Secondly, He shall subdue the corruptions of the old man. This is promised and shall be made good. The Lord encourages believers to oppose the reign of sin in their mortal body, and not to obey it in the lusts thereof; with this promise:—"Sin shall not have dominion over you," Rom. v. 14. "Ye are under grace, and grace is almighty to subdue sin; because it is atoned for. In like manner he says to the Gal. v. 16, "Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh." Ye shall not fulfil them, either in word or deed. The lusts of the flesh will be in you, but not one of them shall reign over you; the spirit of Jesus will teach you to resist and enable you to overcome them, yea, to crucify and mortify them, day by day. And besides this the Lord has promised,

Thirdly, Deliverance from the very being of thy corruptions. The time is coming, when they shall not exist in the believer, nor any more be suffered to tempt him. He shall be made holy and blameless, without spot or wrinkle of sin, or any such thing. In this perfect state the Father now sees him, and accepts him in the beloved, and after death admits the soul into his presence, cleansed with the blood, clothed with the righteousness, adorned with the graces of his dear Son; and body, soul and spirit, shall be in this perfect state in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ—they shall be unblamable in holiness before God, even our father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints. It doth not yet appear how great a perfection of holiness this will be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall then be like him; for we shall see him as he is.

Such are the divine promises. And dost thou not see from hence, reader, what great things thou art to expect in thy present warfare? If thou sayest, How shall I attain all that is promised? Know that it is to come to thee by faith. Christ and all that he has is thine upon believing, and particularly a free pardon for indwelling sin, as well as for any other. Consider him as thy surety, God-man taking thy sins and sufferings upon himself to save thee from them. By his life and death he has obtained full salvation, which he gives to thee freely. And thou hast received it. Thou canst not deny but thou art a believer, and it is written, "All that believe are justified from all things," from the corruption of their nature, as well as the corruptions of their lives. Know, then, that there is no condemnation to thee. The Judge himself says so. And when he acquits, who shall lay any thing to thy charge? Here thou must hold through the power of the Lord, if thou wouldst have the spiritual warfare successfully conducted. Abide by the sentence of God, and keep condemnation out of thy conscience. Have it ready to plead against all charges, from whatever quarter they come, that Christ hath made me free from the law of sin and of death.

Here I must refer thee back to what has been said concerning Christ and his finished salvation. Thou now seest how necessary it is thou shouldest be well established in the belief of his Godhead, and the infinite sufficiency of his salvation; so that he is both able and willing to save thee from all thy sins, and all the miseries due to them, and to bestow upon thee eternal happiness, and to bring thee by his almighty power safe to the enjoyment of it. All this he will give thee, not for working but in believing. I entreat thee therefore to read again and again what has been before said upon these subjects; and the good Lord help thee to apply it to thy present case, that thou mayest be fully assured thou art in Christ, and that there is no condemnation to thee.

But perhaps thou art ready to say—Stedfastly do I believe all this; but I do not find such victory over my corruptions as I could wish; nay I think, at times, they rage more than ever. Here thou forgettest the Lord thy strength. Thou dost not make use of him, and therefore thou failest. The woman with the bloody issue grew worse and worse till she went to Christ: so wilt thou. Why is it given thee to know Christ in the spirit, but that thou shouldst go to him daily, and plead his promise—Lord, thou hast declared that sin shall not have dominion over thy people. I believe this word of thine cannot be broken; and therefore, helpless in myself, I rely upon thy faithfulness to save me from the dominion of such and such a sin (as then tempts thee). Put forth thy power, O Lord Christ, and get thyself glory in subduing my flesh with its affections and lusts.—And then trust him to make his word good, and wait the event. Sooner shall heaven and earth pass away, than sin, any sin thus left with Christ to be subdued, shall reign over thee.

If thou sayest, I think I seek for victory over sin in no other way, and yet I do not attain it so completely as I desire—Depend upon it thou art under some mistake; for Christ is almighty to fulfil every promise in its largest sense and fullest meaning, and there never was a believer who could justly charge him with the breach of his word. Perhaps thou dost believe that power to subdue sin comes from Christ, and thou art expecting it from him; but hast thou not some legal dependence, some notion of thy own working together with him? Search and see. Dost thou commit all to the Lord, who is to do all and in all? Is the whole battle left to him—wisdom and courage, and armour, and strength, and patience, and victory, are all from the Lord? If thou art not doing this simply, thou art not living by faith upon Christ; but thou art fighting in thine own strength, and depending upon some inherent stock of grace, or knowledge, or experience. While these proud, selfish motives put thee upon asking his help, he will not give it thee; because thou dost not wholly depend upon him for it.

Or perhaps Christ does not appear on thy side because thou art proposing some wrong end. Thou art working and striving against sin to establish a righteousness of thine own, which is to be some part of thine acceptance before God, and thou hast been trying in thine own strength to get thy corruptions quite subdued, but they were too strong for thee, and therefore now thou art glad to make use of Christ's help. And if he would do the work for thee, then thou wouldst have confidence in the flesh, and this thy fancied holiness would be the ground of thy rejoicing before God. Is it not so? If it be, thou wilt never succeed upon this plan: Christ will not give his glory to another, nor put the crown of his gospel-grace upon the head of thy legal dependence.

Or perhaps thou art expecting from Christ what he has not promised—such a victory over thy corruptions, that they shall not fight again for some time, or that they shall be quite dead and buried. And so they shall be in the Lord's appointed time. But now he calls upon thee to fight against them; he provides thee armour for that purpose, even the whole armour of God; and he requires thee to resist unto blood, striving against sin, promising thee daily victory. This is thy present state of warfare. To this thou art now called; and there is no discharge in this war. Oh, beware then, as thou lovest thy soul, of a false peace! Thou wilt be sadly deluded if thou ever supposest that thy fighting is over before thy course be finished. The good fight of faith must continue till death; for till then, corruption being in thee, thou must oppose it, relying upon God for promised victory over it. He is able to save thee from the very being of it now, as well as in heaven. But it is not his mind and will. Here he will have thee to live by faith, which is every moment to keep thee dependent upon Christ, or thou wilt fall. This is to exalt his grace, and to subdue thy selfish legal spirit; to humble thy pride, to put thee upon prayer and watchfulness, to make sin more hateful, and heaven more desirable, and to secure he glory of every victory to him, whose strength is perfected in thy weakness. These are some of his gracious purposes in keeping thee continually dependent upon his strength; and if he has made thee willing to fight and conquer, to the praise of the glory of his grace, then thou wilt experience that blessed promise—" sin shall not have domi-

Reader! if thou hadst fallen into these or any other mistakes concerning the subduing of thy corruptions, mind what is written, and what is promised. Having first received, through faith in the blood of Christ, the pardon of thy sin, then, as one of his good soldiers, thou art to fight against it all thy life. He, being on thy side, promises to subdue sin for thee. Without him thou canst do nothing in this warfare, and therefore thy faith resting on his promise is to wait the fulfilling of it. He has given thee his word, that he will use his almighty power for this purpose. To that word must thou look, believing that Christ will bring thee victory; continually, if thy faith fail not; greater, as thy faith increases; complete, when the good fight of faith shall be ended, and thou shalt rest from thy labours. All this he stands engaged to do; and his power is able to fulfil his engagements; and thy faith will bring thee happy experience of his power. When corruptions rise, temptations are strong, enemies numerous, dangers on every side; that is the time to glorify Christ, by making use of his promised strength. Then put thy trust in the Captain of thy salvation, and fear not. Look unto Jesus, and look at nothing but him. The battle is his. He will fight for thee, and thou shalt hold thy peace. Leave him to direct all, to do all, and to finish all relating to it; and then, as he can get all the glory, thou shalt see what a salvation he will bring thee. Oh, that thy faith did but reach to the extent of his promises! How successful would be thy spiritual warfare! such victories over thine enemies; corruptions so subdued; the world so crucified; Satan so defeated; as thou canst now scarce believe! The Lord increase thy faith. Look up to him for it: because, as thy faith increases, let the battle grow hotter and hotter, thou wilt find thyself safer, and more reason to give thanks to God through Jesus Christ thy Lord.

For want of attending to the important truths already considered, and of bringing them into constant use and exercise, young believers are liable to fall into another great mistake, which keeps their faith weak, and stops its growth; namely, a hearkening to sense, and trusting to its reports; which is the fifth general head I purpose to consider.

They are seeking to be established, and they think that they should have no doubt of their being true believers, if they had but the testimony of sense, and comfortable feelings to assure them of it. And being used to judge in this way in other matters (for it is our strongest evidence in natural things), they are disposed to expect the same in spiritual; and they are the rather disposed to it, because sensible comforts are promised in scripture; which, being very desirable and pleasing to nature, they are apt to covet them too much, and, from not regarding what the scripture says about them, they are apt to seek them in a wrong way and for a wrong end. Sense judges from what it sees, and draws its inference from what it feels; so that its report to the conscience, either of a believer's state, or of his growth in it, is not from unchangeable things, which would settle the conscience in peace, but from changeable things which leave room for continual doubting. Sense also looks at the fruits of faith more than at the object of it; and if the believer has been misled, and taught to confound these two together, he will be at great uncertainty in judging of his state; for, instead of making the word of God, he will make his comforts, the ground of his faith; and as these are more or less, so will his faith be. When he has comfortable feelings, then he will think himself a believer; and when he has none, then he will think himself an unbeliever, changing his judging of himself, as his feelings do, like the wind, and varying as his comforts do, like the weather. This is a common case. I have seen the sad effects of it in the lives of many of my acquaintance, who, from being taught thus to judge of themselves, were tossed about for several years, up and down, now comforted, then doubting, and could not get any solid establishment till the Word and Spirit of God convinced them that sense was not to be the ground of their believing, nor the object to which they were to look. Sense judges by feeling, and reports what it sees. Sense says, Now I am in the favour of God; for I feel it; now he is my God; for I find him so; I am comforted. Now he demonstrates it to me; for I feel nearness to him in prayer, and sweet answers. Now I am sure my duties and services are acceptable; for I am quite lively in them, and I come from them with warm affections. Now I cannot doubt; for I feel the assurance of his love to me. And when sense has lost those comfortable feelings, then it draws contrary inferences:—Now I am not in the favour of God; for I do not feel it. Now he is not my God; for I do not find him so; I am not comforted, &c. What can be the issue of this, but continual wavering and changing? For our feelings are sometimes more, sometimes less, as every believer experiences. What an unsettled state, then, must he be in, who has no way to judge of himself but by those changeable things! What room does he leave for continual doubting! and what trouble and misery does he thereby bring upon himself, as well as dishonour to the unchangeableness of God in his nature and promises!

If the poor weak believer should say, I am convinced of this, and I should be glad to have my faith so fixed, that I might be freed from doubts and fears—Then let it rest upon the word of God, which is the only ground of believing, and is therefore called the word of faith, upon which faith is built, and by which it is nourished and grows up. The believer should receive and rely upon what God hath spoken, and because he hath spoken it; for his word changeth not. It abideth the same for ever: therefore what it truly reports, stands upon an immovable rock. Sense and feeling may report things contrary to it, but the believer can silence them with "God hath spoken it:" for his faith has evidence of things not seen, and he does not form his judgment by the things which are seen, but by the things which are not seen. Generally speaking, faith judges the very contrary to what sense does, and will not believe what sense perceives. Abraham, against hope, believed in hope; so do all his children. They believe the pardon of sin, victory over sin, and the death of sin, the immortality of the body, though crumbled to dust and atoms, the second coming of Christ, and the eternal state of happiness or misery. Faith looks at God's word, calling the things which be not as though they were, and is commonly forced to contradict sense. Sense judges from what it sees—Faith from what God says. Sense is governed by what appears—Faith by what God says shall be. Sense looks inward—Faith looks outward. Faith can answer the seeming contradictions which sense opposes to it, from the word of God which cannot be broken. And when sense is ready to despair, and all its fine frames and feelings are gone, then it is the believer's happy privilege still to trust in the Lord, and to have a good hope because of the word of his grace.

But, perhaps, thou art ready to say, It is written, that there is great joy and peace in believing, yea, joy unspeakable and full of glory. True; these are what faith produces, and not what it is. These are the fruits of faith, which it brings forth in most abundance from the inexhaustible fulness of Jesus. The more simple the believer is, the more he eyes Christ, the object of faith, and the word, the ground of faith; the more clear and distinct will the actings of his faith be; and consequently it will bring greater peace into the conscience, and more joy into the affections. But still, these fruits are not faith; no more than the fruit is the tree. The fruits do not go before faith, but follow it, and grow from it. This is God's order. He gives us his word to be the ground of our believing, and by believing, all things promised in the word are made ours; then we go on comfortably, and are happy: but when sense is put in the place of the word, then the consequence is, that weak believers have got a changeable rule to judge of themselves by, which hinders them from being established in believing, and from attaining the promised peace and joy.

Some may begin to object—What! are you against all lively frames, and sensible comforts? No; God forbid! I would have them spring from the right cause, that they might be more pure and fixed than they commonly are. God's word and promises are an unchangeable foundation to rest upon, even when sensible feelings are gone; because Christ, revealed in the word, and laid hold of in the promises, changeth not. Therefore, reader, for thine own sake, and for the glory of God, take heed what thou buildest thy faith upon. Beware of making any thing that sense reports to thee the ground of it; but rest it upon that which abideth for ever. The word of God is a sure foundation. It will never fail thee.

Thou mayest safely depend upon it, because it cannot be broken, and stedfastly rely upon Christ to make its promises good to thee. There is thy object. Look at him. And since he is thine, thy Saviour and thy God, make use of him as such, and trust body and soul, and all things belonging to them in his hands, and among the rest, thy comforts. Be content he should give them to thee as seemeth him good. Set not thy heart upon them, nor follow him, as the multitude did for the sake of his loaves and fishes, and the dainties that he gave them, who, when these were withheld, soon forsook their kind Benefactor. Thou art by faith to make up all thy happiness in him, and in him only; and he himself, being thine, let him give thee or take away what he will besides, thou hast enough. What! is not this comfort enough, that thou hast got the pearl of great price—the infinitely rich, inestimably precious Jesus, who has the wisdom of God to contrive what is best for thee, boundless love to dispose him, and almighty power to enable him to give it thee; and he has promised it: canst thou desire more? Walk, then, with him by faith, and not by sight. When the word of God is the ground of thy faith, which rests there, and is grown to a fixed settlement, then thou wilt be enabled to go on comfortably, whatever thy frames and feelings be; yea, when these are at the lowest ebb, thou wilt not be thereby discouraged. Suppose thou art walking in darkness, thou canst walk by faith; because thou hast a promise: "Who is among you that walketh in darkness and hath no light? Let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God," Isa. l. 10. Still let him trust and believe. Why? Because God is his God still. Mind that; his God still: this blessed relation still subsists; and faith may draw comfort from it in the darkest hour. Suppose thou art in heaviness, through manifold temptations, the word says to thee, "Heaviness may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning:" here thou mayest quiet thy heavy heart, and rest with confidence, till the Lord deliver thee out of thy temptations. Suppose God hideth his face from thee, thou hast the example of those in the same case: "I will wait for the Lord that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and will look for him," Isa. viii. 17. Wait in faith, looking for him, and thou shalt see the light of his countenance. Suppose all other comforts fail; thou hast one still, worth more than all—"This God is my God for ever and ever. He will never leave me nor forsake me." This is the happiness of the true believer; he is enabled to maintain his confidence, when sensible feelings are no more. And thou seest, reader, how this happiness is attained, and how it is preserved. It is by trusting to things which change not; the word of God, the Son of God and his promises, all which are in him, yea, made in him, and in him, Amen, fulfilled by him. May the Lord help thee simply to trust his word, and to live upon Christ for the fulfilling of it, and then thou wilt indeed get, what thou art now seeking in vain, a comfortable frame, and wilt be enabled to maintain it against all the discouragements of sense. To that end, search the scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation; and let it be thy daily request to the Lord, to make thee strong in faith, that thou mayest not stagger at his promises through unbelief, but mayest, against hope, believe in hope. Beg of him, when sense goes contrary to the word, to enable thee still to believe it, and not to doubt of Christ's faithfulness to fulfil it—and ask for strength to walk every moment by faith, and not by sight. Thus the Lord will carry thee on safely and sweetly from faith to faith, till thou receive the end of thy faith, even the salvation of thy soul. May it be so! Amen.

St. Paul has been my guide hitherto. He says, Heb. v. 13, that a babe in Christ is one who is unskilful in the word of righteousness. To this determination of his I have had an eye all along, and have accordingly endeavoured to remove those hindrances out of the way of young beginners, which chiefly arise from their unskilfulness in the word of righteousness. Righteousness signifies strict justice. With respect to God, it is paying him the full demands of his holy law: in this sense there is none of us righteous, no, not one The God-man, Christ Jesus, the surety of his people, came to work out such a righteousness for them, and the word reveals it, sets it before them in its infinite freeness, and in its infinite sufficiency to justify from all things. The word is also the means, in the hand of the Spirit, of bringing them with the heart to believe unto righteousness, and therefore the scripture is called the word of righteousness; and being unskilful in it signifies want of experience in the management of it; unskilful in the knowledge of the person of the Lord our righteousness, who is true and very God, as well as true and very man; unskilful in the nature of his righteousness, that it is absolutely perfect and everlastingly meritorious, so that any sinner by receiving it will be not only delivered from sin, and all the miseries due to sin, but will also be entitled to life and glory; unskilful in the gift of righteousness, how freely God bestows it, nothing being required to make it the sinner's but receiving it, and therefore it is called the righteousness of faith; because by faith he trusts in it for salvation, and for all its blessings in earth and heaven, and expects them as the fruits of righteousness; unskilful in experience, not knowing how to plead this righteousness against the charges of the law, of conscience, and of the accuser of the brethren, and therefore apt to fall into a legal spirit, to be distressed in their warfare between the old man and the new, and to covet and to rely more upon sensible feelings than upon the sure testimony of God in his word. These are some of the principal difficulties which young believers meet with; and they all arise from their unskilfulness in the word of righteousness, and therefore I have particularly considered some scripture motives for removing them out of the way. And after thou hast perused these motives, have they been the means of settling thy judgment, comforting thy conscience, and strengthening thy faith? Dost thou see more of Christ's grace and power to save thee a sinner than thou didst before, and therefore canst trust him better, and in time of need make more use of his promised grace? If this be thy case, give him the glory, and may he carry thee on from strength to strength. But if thou hast received no improvement from reading thus far, what is the reason? Perhaps thou art under some of the temptations here described. Search, and see: and whatever it be, either in doctrine or experience, which hinders the increase of thy faith, may the Lord discover it to thee, and enable thee to overcome it, that thou mayest be no longer a babe, unskilful in the word of righteousness, but mayest grow up to be a young man strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might!

The apostle Paul has directed me how to speak to the babes in Christ; and another apostle shows how they grow up to be young men, and thereby he furnishes me with matter for the second part of this treatise on the life of faith: "I have written unto you, young men," says he, "because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one," 1 John ii. 14. These young men knew the principles of the doctrine of Christ: they were established in the belief of his Godhead, of the infinite sufficiency of his salvation, of the free gift of all its graces and blessings promised to him that worketh not, and received by faith only, and all treasured up for the believer's use in the fulness of Christ Jesus, to whom he is to bring nothing to recommend him, but the promise of the grace which he then wants, and a dependence upon Christ to supply that want. These young men had attained to a good degree of knowledge and experience in these truths. They began to be able to keep the evidence of their union with Christ clear and distinct, and to improve it by their communion with him in all his offices. But notwithstanding their establishment in these points, they had many temptations and great difficulties; still they knew but in part—still they had a fleshly corrupt nature to watch over, and to fight against, always inclining them to trust to the law, to their feeling, to any thing but Christ, and always disposing them to yield to the suggestions of the devil, and to the allurements of the world. This warfare, instead of ceasing, grows hotter and hotter; but they grow stronger. It is the peculiar character of the young men in Christ to be strong; they have learnt where their strength lays, and they put it forth. They go down to battle, not trusting in any power or might of their own, but strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. He is their strength. When the enemy cometh in like a flood, then to Jesus they look for safety and victory—"O our God! we have no might against this great company that cometh against us, neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon thee." The abiding sense of their own weakness keeps them dependent upon him, so that the more they feel of their helplessness, the stronger they grow; because they live more upon Christ for strength, which illustrates that seeming paradox of the apostle, "When I am weak, then am I strong,"—when I am most sensible of my own weakness, then am I strongest in the Lord; his strength is then perfected in me. And his strength is put forth in the effectual working of it by believing. It is not, neither can it be, inherent in them, who without Christ can do nothing; but it is brought in by faith; nor does faith bring it in to lodge it or lay it up in store till it shall be wanted: but when it is wanted, faith then regards the promise, looks up to Christ to fulfil it, and receives strength out of his fulness. And being his, freely promised, and freely given, it is therefore called the strength of grace: "Thou therefore, my son," says Paul to Timothy, "be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Strong faith gets strong grace from Christ, according as it is written: "All things are possible to him that believeth;" for according to his faith it shall be done unto him. If his faith reach to the full extent of the promises, he shall find all things possible which God hath promised, yea, he shall be able to do all things through Christ strengthening him.

This is the life of these young men in Christ. They are strong in him, living upon his promised strength, and by faith receiving it. They live not upon any thing in themselves, but whatever they stand in need of, and whatever they have a promise for, that they expect shall be given them by the power of God their Saviour. They see themselves poor helpless creatures, full of continual wants, and no means in their own power to supply them. The sense of this empties them of self-greatness and self-dependence, and the abiding sense of this keeps them humble and dependent upon Christ. Thus the Lord teaches them how to live out of themselves, and to be always receiving out of the Saviour's fulness grace for grace. They have his infinite store-house to repair to, in which there is treasured up for them every thing that they can possibly want. Happy for them, their God has promised to supply all their need out of the riches of his grace in Christ Jesus! and by faith they have an abundant supply, to the praise of that God who keepeth his promise for ever.

In him they live—he is the Lord and giver of spiritual life; as Paul says—"I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." They are made strong in him. "The Lord is the strength of my life," says the Psalmist, Psal. xxvii. 1; that life which I live by the faith of the Son of God has all its strength from him.

And is continued by his power—"For none can keep alive his own soul," Psal. xxii. 29. "It is God who holdeth our soul in life," Psal. lxvi. 9.

And is kept by faith—"Ye are kept by the power of God through faith," 1 Pet. i. 5. Whatever strength the believer wants to enable him to bear hardship, endure the cross, fight his spiritual enemies, daily gain victories over them, he expects it from God, and through faith he receives it, and is kept—yea, so kept,

As to be confirmed unto the end. He that is able to keep believers from falling, will keep them until they receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls. Thus the life which Christ begins by his grace he continues by his strength; and every act of this spiritual life is from him. The will, the power is his; for he doeth all, and in all. These young men were so well assured of this, that they lived upon Christ for strength, and they received it; they were strong in him. Their faith viewed him in his exalted state with all power in heaven and earth, and engaged as their covenant head to use it for them; to make them, and to keep them, alive to God. On this power they depended. And whatever promise they had of its being used in their behalf, and pleaded it out at the throne of grace, and trusted Christ with the fulfilling of it, he never disappointed them. They were made strong, and stood fast in the Lord, who never withdrew his supporting arm; therefore they never ceased to put their whole trust and confidence in him.

When the enemy sees them thus strong in the Lord through faith, it stirs up his devilish malice, and makes him burn with envious rage. He leaves no temptation untried to draw them from Christ. He is well skilled in cunning wiles and sly devices for this purpose. He does not begin with tempting them to open sin; that would at once discover his wicked design; but he artfully tries to sap the foundation, and to weaken their faith. If he can get them from their dependence upon Christ, he carries his point; and too, too often he succeeds. Oh! beware, reader, of every thing; suspect it, let its appearance be ever so fair and good, which in the least tends to weaken thy fast hold of Christ. Cleave to him with full purpose of heart, as long as ever thou livest; for the enemy's whole plan is to separate thee from him. Formerly he tried to do this by distressing thee about thy sins—how they could be pardoned—whether being so great, so many, the blood of Christ could cleanse from all: now thou hast, through believing, received forgiveness of sins, he will try to do the same by distressing thee about thy duties. Sometimes he will try to bring guilt into thy conscience by suggesting to thee thy many failings and short comings in them:—the disorder of thine imagination—thy wanderings in thy prayers—thy dulness in hearing and reading the word—the little life and power thou findest in thine attendance upon the ordinances—and the coldness of thy love to God and man. If he can get thee to dwell upon these things so as to forget Christ, then he has made way for this insinuation—How could it be thus with thee, and thou a strong believer? And if he can get thee to reason upon it, then he has thee fast; thou art caught in his snare.

But if the Lord has taught thee not to be ignorant of Satan's devices, as soon as the thought arises, whether thou art in Christ, because of such failings, thou wilt know from what quarter it comes, and wilt immediately resist it. So that the temptation will make thee stand faster; it will drive thee closer to Christ, make thy dependence stronger on his blood and righteousness, put thee upon making more use of him as thy intercessor and advocate with the Father, and help thee to live more out of thyself by faith upon him. Thus Christ becomes precious; thou art more humble. The snare is broken, and thou art delivered.

When the enemy sees this, his implacable malice will soon tempt thee again. He has another deep-laid stratagem relating to thy duties; and that is from their being unsuccessful. Thou hast had something laid much upon thy heart, and thou hast carried it to God in prayer, and thou hast waited long, but no answer comes. Upon this Satan takes occasion to suggest—Now you see God does not give you what you ask, although he has promised, Ask and ye shall have; the fault cannot be in him, therefore it is plain you are not in his favour; his promises do not belong to you. And if he can thus work a little upon thy impatience, he will soon get thee into doubting and unbelief. Here thou mayest see how all the wiles of Satan tend to one point; namely, to separate thee from Christ; and how necessary then is it, that thou shouldest have this settled beyond all question, that Christ and thou are one? If this be maintained in thy conscience, then Satan's stratagem is defeated: for Christ being thine, he will give thee every thing that he has promised; and although thou hast it not just at the time thou hast fixed thyself, yet he knows best. Thou shalt certainly have it, if his infinite wisdom sees it good for thee; and if he does not see it good, his love will give thee something better. Thy faith must wait God's time. Strong faith can wait long. Having such a promise as this to depend upon—they shall not be "ashamed who wait for me," Isa. xlix. 23; thou mayest with confidence wait, and be a follower of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises; who by faith regarded the promises, by patience waited for the fulfilling of them; and although they waited long, yet they succeeded at last, and did inherit every grace and blessing, for which with faith and patience they had been waiting. Go, and do thou likewise.

Upon the failing of these temptations, the enemy has another ready. Since he cannot get thee off thy guard by bringing thee into doubting and unbelief, he will attack thy faith in another way. He will come like an angel of light, and seem to be Christ's friend and thine. He will allow thee to be a child of God, and to be strong in faith. The more clearly thou art satisfied of thy union with Christ, the more will he improve, if thou art not aware, this thy certainty to his own wicked purposes. He will try to keep thine eye upon thy great graces and high gifts; he will flatter thee exceedingly upon them, and will tempt thee to view them with a secret delight; every now and then insinuating, what a great Christian thou art—how few there are like thee—to what an exalted state thou hast attained—what temptations thou hast overcome—what victories thou hast gained over Satan—and how safe thou art now, fast upon the rock! And if he finds this pleasing bait is not instantly rejected with a Get thee behind me, Satan; then he will begin to work upon thy self-love, and to give thee many plausible reasons for self-admiration, so that thou shalt first look pleasing at, then fondly love, and at last sacrilegiously dote upon thy wondrous attainments. Thus he will lift thee up with pride, and will try to draw thee into his own crime, and into his own condemnation. What a dangerous temptation is this! How many have I known who fell into it! If thou sayest, By what means shall I escape it? Mind the first approach; for it is coming upon thee, as soon as thou beginnest to think of thyself more highly than thou oughtest to think. Thou art in thyself a poor, miserable, helpless sinner, and to this very moment without Christ thou canst do nothing. Thou canst not do one good thing, nor overcome the weakest enemy, nor take one step in the way to heaven, without Christ: nay thou canst not think one good thought without him. What hast thou, then, to be proud of, and to stir up thy self-admiration? Nothing but sin. The humble abiding sense of this tends to thy safety: for while this is ever present with thee, "In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing," it will lead thee to live by faith upon Christ for all good things. And being all his, and received every moment from him as his free gift, thou wilt be glorifying and exalting him in all and for all, knowing that he resisteth the proud; but he giveth grace unto the humble. The Lord keep thee humble, and then thou wilt have grace to escape this cunning wile of the devil.

If thou shalt say, Alas! I am fallen into it: how shall I recover myself? Remember his case who in his prosperity said he never should be moved; the favour of the Lord had made his mountain to stand so strong, Ps. xxx. vi. 7. He was too confident in himself, and was moved. How did he recover his standing? "I cried unto the Lord, and unto the Lord I made my supplication. Hear, O Lord, and have mercy upon me, Lord, be thou my helper." His prayer was heard, he found mercy to pardon his offence, and help to raise him up, and his mourning, he says, was turned into joy and gladness. Look up as he did to the Lord Christ. Plead thy pardon through his promised mercy, and beg of him to enable thee to walk more humbly with thy God. Then shall the Psalmist's experience be thine, and thou shalt escape the snare which was laid for thy precious life.

These young men having thus overcome the devices which Satan had contrived to weaken their faith, must expect a fresh attack from him. He will tempt them concerning the ground of faith. He sees they are strong, because the word of God abideth in them, therefore he will use all his cunning and power to weaken their trust in the word and promises of God. By the incorruptible seed of the word faith is begotten, and by the same word it is nourished up, and strengthening, growing exceedingly from faith to faith. The word, which is the sole ground of faith, reveals the covenant made by the eternal Trinity for the salvation of sinners, and makes many free promises of every covenant blessing to him that believeth. These promises may most steadfastly be relied upon, because of the unchangeable nature of God, who makes them. All his perfections are engaged for the fulfilling of his word: so that what he has spoken has an actual being and existence. He says, and it is done—saying and doing are the same with him. Let there be ever so great a distance of time between the word spoken and the thing done, yet this is real as any thing now in being; because it exists in the mind and will of God, is revealed in his word, and by his faithfulness and almighty power is to be established at the time appointed. How is it possible, then, that this word should be broken? There is no matter of fact of more undoubted evidence, nothing in futurity, not even the rising of the sun to-morrow, so fixed and certain as the accomplishment of God's promises to him that believeth. These young men in Christ were most assuredly persuaded of this truth—They knew that heaven and earth should pass away before one tittle of God's promises should fail. They looked upon them all as made in Christ, in him Yea and in him Amen, made in him, and fulfilled to him, as the head of the body of the church, and in him fulfilled to all his members. As certainly as every one of them has been made good to him the head, so will they be made good to his members. He has all power in heaven and earth committed to him for that very purpose. Whoever by believing is joined to him, he has thereby a right and title to every promise, and may boldly sue it out in time of need: and then it is Christ's office and glory to fulfil the promise. If mountains of difficulties stand in the way, the believer need not fear or doubt. Christ is upon the throne. What are difficulties against his almighty power? Besides, Christ has already given him good security. He has put into his hands the pledges and earnests of the promised inheritance, and how is it possible he should fail in fulfilling his engagements, and putting him in due time into actual possession? Read what the apostle says of this subject. Turn to the passage; for it is too long to quote, Heb. vi. from verse 11 to the end of the chapter; in which you may observe these particulars.

1. The heirs of promise are apt to be full of doubt, and to have strife in their consciences, about their right and title to all the graces and blessings of salvation:

2. God was willing out of his infinite mercy to establish their right and title to them beyond dispute, and to put an end to all strife;

3. Therefore he engaged by promise to give them all those graces and blessings; and

4. To show the unchangeableness of his will herein, he confirmed the promise by an oath.

5. It is impossible that God should lie in his promise, or that he should be perjured in his oath.

6. Therefore here are two immutable things to strengthen the faith and hopes of the heirs of promise.

7. While their faith rests upon those immutable things, it will always bring them strong consolation.

8. When enemies, dangers, and temptations attack them, they are safe, by fleeing for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before them in God's immutable promises.

9. This hope will be as useful to them at such times as an anchor to a ship. By it they will ride out all the storms of life, until Jesus their forerunner bring them within the veil, where their anchor is now cast, and put them into eternal possession of all the promises.

With what rich and copious matter does this scripture abound, tending to show the absolute safety of resting upon God's promises! How strong are the arguments to persuade the heirs of promise to put their whole trust and confidence in the faithfulness of their God! who, having provided an infinitely glorious and everlasting inheritance for them, was willing to make it over to them in the strongest manner of conveyance, and therefore he has given them the promise and the oath of God, which cannot possibly change or alter, that their faith might never doubt or waver, and their hope might at all times be sure and stedfast. And until he bring them to the inheritance itself, he has given them many sweet and blessed promises of all things needful for their temporal and spiritual estate, upon which he would have them not only to live comfortably at present, but also to receive them as part of the inheritance, allowed them for their maintenance, till they come to age and enter upon the possession of the whole. And what God intended in his promise and oath, has its effects in a good degree among those who have the word of God abiding in them. They cast their anchor where he commands them, and they are not only safe, but also in time of the greatest troubles and temptations have strong consolation. When enemies come, corruptions arise, and difficulties are in the way; they have a promise, and a promise-keeping God to depend upon. Whatever straits they are in, the word abiding in them brings some promise of support and deliverance: the promise shows what God has engaged to do, and faith receives the fulfilling of his engagements. When they draw nigh to God in duties, in ordinances, they know what he has promised to them that wait upon him, and they judge him faithful who hath promised, and lo! he is present with them. In short, while they live like themselves as the heirs of promise, they are preserved from all evil, and want no manner of thing that is good. This is their happy case; thrice happy, because the means used to deprive them of their happiness are overruled of God for the establishing it. The enemy rages against them, but in vain. He was a liar from the beginning. The word is truth, and he abode not in it, therefore he hates it, and with a greater hatred because the Lord has made it the means of strengthening those believers. He knows that all his temptations will be fruitless, while the word abideth in them. He fears no weapon formed against him, like the sword of the Spirit: he has felt its sharpness and its power; with it the Captain of our salvation cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon; and with it all his good soldiers resist the devil, and make him flee from them. For these reasons he has a great variety of temptations to weaken the believer's trust in the word, and his reliance upon the promises of God.

Sometimes he attacks them in a matter where his hopes are founded in their ignorance: he is cunning to spy out the particular way in which they have been led, and their readiness to maintain their ground by making use of the promises suited to that way. He resolves therefore upon some new temptation, with which they have never been exercised; and he watches the favourable opportunity to inject it with all his strength. Upon his doing it, the soul is put into a great hurry, because it has no promise ready to apply to the present case; for want of which the understanding is confused, faith wavers, doubt enters, and Satan carries his point. This demonstrates the necessity of searching the scriptures, and meditating upon them night and day. In them God has graciously treasured up all sorts of promises. There is not a possible case for a believer to be in, of spiritual or temporal concern, but there is a promise suitable to it, which he ought to have ready against the hour of temptation. If he has not, he neglects the Lord's kind provision, and lays himself open to the enemy's attack. Reader! if thou wouldst not be ignorant of Satan's devices, follow Christ's counsel—search the scriptures. Remember, they are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus: therefore, store up his promises; pray him to sanctify thy memory to retain them, and to enable thee to make use of them in every time of need.

If this temptation fail, the enemy will soon have another ready. I have known him often try, and often succeed in endeavouring to take off the attention from the most easy parts of scripture, and to fix it upon those parts which are hard to be understood. Upon those the believer dwells too much, and puzzles himself: his head grows confused: he consults commentators, and they confuse him more. And if he does not fall from hence into questioning the truth of scripture, yet he certainly neglects the right use of it, forgetting it is the means of building himself up in his most holy faith. Reader! whenever thou art tempted about difficult texts, look up to the incarnate Word, and pray him by his Spirit to open thine understanding, that thou mayest know what thou readest; and if thou still dost not find the meaning of them made plain to thee, pass them by for that time. Do not puzzle and distress thyself about them. Perhaps, when thou meetest with them again, they will appear easy, and Christ will give thee light to see and to comprehend them.

If thou sayest, I do look up to him to teach me, but, nevertheless, I find many hard and difficult texts. Remember thou knowest but in part, and therefore thou standest in need of daily teaching. These texts are profitable, if they humble thee, and make thee live more upon the teaching of the divine prophet. The humbler thou art, thou wilt be the more teachable. The lower thou sittest at his feet to hear his words, thou wilt learn the most. The master himself has declared, "Whosoever shall humble himself as a little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." If these difficult texts thus humble thee, and make thee live more upon Christ's inward teaching, they will be the means of thy growth in saving knowledge. Thy hearing and reading the word, in a constant dependence upon him, will keep thee from the dangerous errors and heresies of the times. Most of those arise from unlearned and unstable men, full of pride and self-conceit, whom God resisteth; but he giveth grace to the humble.

If he has given thee grace to hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast learned and been assured of, the enemy will change his attack, and pursue thee with new temptations. Envious of thy happiness, he will be often assaulting thee, and trying to move thee from thy steadfastness. He will at times insinuate every lie that he can raise against the word of God; and he will not begin with reason or argument, but by way of surprise, with sudden injections darting into the mind doubts like these: How do I know the scripture is inspired? What proof have I? And if these be not immediately rejected, he will follow them like lightning with others. How can that be inspired which is full of contradictions, and full of doctrines above reason? Who can defend the matters of fact related in it? The language is low and mean, unworthy of God; the scripture is false; perhaps there is neither God nor devil.

These blasphemous thoughts sometimes put the believer into a hurry and confusion, and through the suddenness and violence of them greatly distress him. The apostle calls these assaults "the fiery darts of the wicked one"—darts, because he throws them with all his might against the soul, and fiery, because he would have them to catch hold of and to inflame its corruptions and lusts. And they do, if the shield of faith be not ready to stop their force and to quench their fire. This is a piece of the armour of God prepared for the believer's safety at such times; and the right use of it is this: The Lord having promised to be a shield to them that put their trust in him, and to compass them about with his favour as with a shield, the believer looks up when these fiery darts are flying thick about him, and says,—"O Lord God of hosts, who hast promised that thy faithfulness and truth should be my shield and buckler, now establish thy word unto thy servant. In thee, O my God, do I put my trust, save me in this hour of temptation." Then the battle becomes the Lord's. He is engaged to put forth his strength to shield thee from the enemy. Thus thou shalt conquer, and shalt happily experience what is written—"Resist the devil, and he will flee from you."

He will flee for a season, but will return again. He has other temptations, and he will try them all to disparage the word of God, and to lessen the believer's confidence in it. Sometimes he will insinuate, How can these things be?—in what way or by what means can such a promise be fulfilled? If you begin to reason upon the point, he will get you from your stronghold, and conquer you. Beware of his lies, and have always your answer ready—"It is written." What God hath said, put your trust in, if all the world gainsay it; for he is faithful who hath promised, and all things are possible with him.

If this temptation does not succeed, and he cannot bring you to doubt of the truth of the promises, then he will try you about your right to them. When you are in darkness, or walking heavily in sickness or any trouble, and you have been praying for deliverance, but Christ does not presently answer you, then he has a favourable opportunity to suggest—Now you see the promises do not belong to you; Christ will not hear you; and therefore you have been deceiving yourself with a vain notion of faith. This is a common temptation, against which still oppose—"it is written." Thy case, be it what it will, has a promise, either of support or deliverance. If thou art not delivered, yet if Christ support thee, so that thy faith and patience fail not, does not this show his infinite goodness to thee? He will have thy faith tried, and he will put it into the fire, not to consume it, but that it may come, like gold out of the furnace, purer and brighter. And what if thou art in the fire a great while? thou wilt see more of his tender mercies in keeping thee there, and wilt thereby learn to live in a more simple dependence upon him. Cast not away, therefore, thy confidence in the written word. The promises in it stand faster than the strong mountains. If all the powers in earth and hell should join, they cannot defeat one single tittle of them. When the world and all the works therein shall be burnt up, and the place of them shall be no more found, then the promises shall stand fast as the throne of God, and shall receive their full and perfect accomplishment through the ages of eternity.

These are some of Satan's temptations against the young men in Christ, who are strong, because the word of God abideth in them. His design is to weaken their reliance upon its promises. Till he can do this, he despairs of success; and therefore he tries every method which his wicked cunning and rage can invent. His busy, active spirit is night and day plotting against the word of God. See a lively picture of his utter hatred to it in the parable of the sower While the good seed is sowing, the devil is indefatigable in picking it up. He exercises all his wiles to keep it out of the hearers' hearts, and he prevails with the greater part to reject it: among those who seemingly receive it, he cheats three out of four, so that the word does not take root, nor bear fruit to perfection. Since Satan is thus successful, is it not absolutely necessary, reader, that thou shouldst be well acquainted with his devices? And the word abiding in thee—the ingrafted word—will both make thee acquainted with them, and also strong to resist them; because then thou wilt be taught by Christ's wisdom, and strengthened by his almighty power. As thou growest in the sense of thy want of him, and livest in a closer dependence upon him, thou wilt understand more of his word, and experience more of his power: by which means the enemy's continual attacks, driving thee to Christ for the fulfilling of his promises, will make thee continually safe. Let the roaring lion rage; what hast thou to fear? Let him go about seeking whom he may devour; the Lord is thy shield and thy defence: in him is thy trust. Thou hast his promise that he will preserve thee from all evil, and will make all things, even Satan's spite and rage against thee, work together for thy good. How dear and precious, then, should the word of God be to thee! If thou art weak, because it is the means of thy growing, and being nourished up; and if thou art strong, because, by its abiding in thee, thou wilt be established. May it be thy study and thy delight; and may every reading of it bring thee to a better acquaintance with, and a greater dependence upon, the adorable Jesus! And if thou desirest thus to profit from the scriptures, I would advise thee, reader, to observe two things, which will be much for Christ's glory and for thy edification.

First, in thy frequent and careful perusal of the Bible (and mind, thou canst not read it too much) take particular notice of the promises, which are most suited to thy age, state, and condition in life; because these God has graciously made for thy use; and about these the enemy will be most busy with thee. Treasure them up, then, in thy memory, and have them ready against the time of need; looking up,

Secondly, to Christ for the fulfilling of them. All the promises are made in him, and made good by him: thou art, therefore, in a humble dependence upon his faithfulness and power, to expect whatever thou wantest and he has promised. Trust him, and he will not fail thee. Stagger not at any of his promises through the seeming impossibility of their being made good; but depend upon his almighty power, and thou wilt find him a faithful, promise-keeping God, whose word standeth fast for ever and ever.

Thus thou shalt not only be safe, but shalt also overcome the wicked one, which the apostle John makes the last part of their character who are strong in the Lord. They overcome him by the strength of their faith; they hold fast their confidence in the Lord's promised strength; and he fights for them. That mighty arm, which bruised the serpent's head, brings them victory; as it is written of that noble army, mentioned Rev. xii. 11: "They overcame the accuser of the brethren by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony." Through faith in his blood they were pardoned and justified freely, and they knew that in him they had righteousness and strength; therefore they were at peace with God, and the accuser of the brethren could not lay any thing to their charge. Thus they were delivered from his power, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son; and they testified this by adhering to the word of truth. They believed that whatever Christ had therein promised he would fulfil to them, and they bore their testimony to their being safe in depending upon his word in the most trying circumstances. They would not give it up, whatever they lost for trusting to it; nay, they stuck stedfastly to its truth, although it cost them their lives for maintaining their testimony; for it is said of them, "they loved not their lives unto the death;" that is, they loved the truth more than life; they were not afraid publicly to own that their trust and confidence was in the blood of the Lamb, and they believed they should be infinite and everlasting gainers by holding fast the word of their testimony unto death. And the Lord was with them, and mightily strengthened them, so that they joyfully sealed their testimony with their blood, although they died in flames, and in the most exquisite torments. Thus they overcame Satan. A most noble company of those conquerors are now standing round the throne of the Lamb, enjoying his exceeding great and precious promises: he has crowned them with glory—he has clothed them with robes washed and made white in his own blood—he has wiped away all tears from their eyes, and taken all cause of sorrow from their hearts—he has put palms into their hands, to show that they are eternal conquerors, and that they shall stand confirmed in bliss for ever and ever. May thou and I, reader, ere long, join them; and until that happy time come, may our faith be daily more established in the blood and righteousness of the Lamb of God, that we may be growing in our love to him, and in our dependence upon him, until he admit us to see him as he is.

Through much exercise and fighting, these young men, strong and mighty in the scriptures, grow up to be fathers in Christ; whose character is thus drawn by the apostle John, 1 Epist. ii. 14: "I have written unto you fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning," namely, Jesus Christ, whose style and title it is to be from the beginning, as he himself speaks in Prov. viii. 22, 23: "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was." He was a person in the Godhead, coequal and coeternal with the Father, but was set up in his office-character from everlasting to the beginning of the ways and works of God. Upon account of what he was to do and suffer in man's nature according to the grace of the covenant of the ever-blessed Trinity, he was the Creator, and is the Preserver of the universe; for by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible; and by him all things subsist; and he is the beginning, the first cause of all things in nature, and also in grace, the head of the body the church. In the same manner our Lord speaks of himself, Rev. i. 8: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." He is in and from the beginning, being the first cause of all the divine works in creation, in providence, and in redemption, the Author and the Finisher, the First and the Last in all; which shows the great propriety of describing him here by this name. The apostle is treating of the highest state of a believer, and he says it consists in knowing that Jesus Christ is all and in all. Whatever good there is in his kingdom of nature, from him it had its beginning, and by him it is preserved: whatever good there is in his kingdom of grace, he is the author of it; by his power it is continued; and when brought to perfection, he is the finisher. He is the beginning, he is the ending, of all the counsels and of all the works of God. In this light these fathers had learned to consider the Lord Jesus: they knew that he was to do all for them, and in them, and by them; they not only knew it speculatively, but had also experimental knowledge of it. "Ye have known him that is from the beginning;" have known him, and tried him, and found him to be what his name signifies. And this is the right knowledge of Christ—not such as the devil has; he could say, I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God—not such as too many nominal Christians have, who profess that they know God, but in works they deny him—not such as many professors attain, for whom it had been better not to have known the way of righteousness than, after they had known it, to turn from it. These fathers knew Christ by the inward teaching of his Word and Spirit, whereby he made himself known to them, as he does not to others. For he fulfilled to them the great promise of the new covenant—"I will give them a heart to know me, that I am the Lord, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God," Jer. xxiv. 7. The covenant is well ordered in all things, and sure, particularly with respect to the quickening of the soul from a death in trespasses and sins, and to the renewing of its faculties, that they may be capable of knowing God, and to the enlightening them, that the light of the glorious gospel of Christ may shine unto them, even unto the heart, enlivening it with holy and heavenly affection to the person, to the offices, and to the glories of the blessed Immanuel. Whereby the believer, thus taught of God to know him aright, can now trust him, hope in him, and love him; which graces are strengthened from the consideration of God's standing related to him as his covenant God, and of his being one of God's redeemed people; from which relations he has a right to, and by faith may enjoy, every covenant mercy in time, and shall be a partaker of them all in eternity. This is the knowledge, concerning which so many and such great things are spoken in scripture, and which St. John says these fathers had received: they had attained by the Spirit of Wisdom and revelation to that knowledge of Christ, which is life eternal; and the same Spirit enabled them to be continually growing and increasing in the knowledge of Christ. As he shines more clearly into their hearts, he discovers to them more of their wants. He makes them better acquainted with themselves, and lets them feel more of the workings of their corrupt nature, and of their own entire helplessness. Thus by his light they see deeper into that mystery of iniquity which is in them, and they grow in the sense and experience of it all their lives. Day by day some failing, short-coming, infirmity, or temptation, leads them to more lowly and humbling views of themselves, and brings them fresh discoveries of their fallen and helpless state. While they attend to what is passing in their own breasts, every moment something will be speaking for Christ—"Without me ye can do nothing." It is this abiding sense of their wants, and faith in his promises to supply them, which lead them to be constantly looking unto Jesus. Many wants do not discourage them; for his promises are as many as their wants can be—nor great wants, for he has given them exceeding great promises—nor continual wants, for he has promised them grace every moment. As they grow in the knowledge of themselves, they see more need of living upon Christ in the several offices which he sustains. The daily experience which they have of their own ignorance, and sinfulness, and helplessness, endear to them their divine Prophet, Priest, and King. The continual sense of their want of him makes them glad to live in a settled, fixed dependence upon his fulness, and to be always receiving out of it. They would not live otherwise if they could. They know that their dear Saviour will manage better for them than they could for themselves. He has taken their affairs, spiritual and temporal, into his hands, and he can make no mistakes. His infinite love is guided by unerring wisdom, and its blessings are bestowed by almighty power. Happy for them, they and theirs are under the care of this best of friends. They know it, and are sensible of their happiness. Daily experience brings them fresh proofs of the love and power of Jesus; which makes them wish for more, still more faith, that they may glorify their blessed Saviour by trusting him more. However, in this they are growing, increasing day by day, in their knowledge of the salvation, and gaining a closer acquaintance and fellowship with the person of God their Saviour, until they come to see him as he is.

This is the character of those believers who are stedfast in the faith, and are become fathers, able now to teach others also. They have attained to that knowledge of Christ which is life eternal, and they are daily pressing forward. What they already know of him increases their desire to know more. And by being always conversant with him (for without him they can do nothing) they have continual opportunities of making new discoveries. In him are laid up treasures of every thing that is great and good. His riches are unsearchable, infinite, and eternal. There is no coming to the end of them. Believers are persuaded of it, and therefore they try to dig deep into this golden mine. It is all theirs. The farther they go, the more is their faith strengthened, and the more precious Christ becomes: for they find such an excellency in the knowledge of Christ Jesus their Lord, that their souls hunger and thirst to know more of him. The more they attain, the more the appetite increases; and nothing can perfectly satisfy it but the full enjoyment of Christ in glory, when they shall know, even as also they are known. Till that blessed time come, they will be growing in grace, and in the knowledge of God their Saviour.

This is the distinguishing mark of these fathers:—they are pressing forward; they have not yet attained to the perfect knowledge of Christ, but they are going on to perfection; and they make a happy progress. God meets them in, and blesses, the means which he has appointed for their daily growth. In those he requires them to depend and to wait upon him; and he gives them clearer discoveries of the adorable person, and of the gracious offices of the Lord Christ, and thereby enables them to live more by faith upon him, for all things belonging to their temporal, their spiritual, and their eternal concerns. These particulars will include the principal acts of the life of faith; and, while we take a short view of them, reader, may every page be made the means of increasing and strengthening thy faith in the Lord Jesus!

First, they grow in the knowledge of his person, which is altogether wonderful; so that they can never come to the end of his perfections, nor, to eternity, can they show forth all his praise; for he is God and man in one Christ—Jehovah incarnate—Immanuel, God with us. This is the great mystery of godliness, God manifested in the flesh; in which he came amongst us, that he might be the second Adam, who is the Lord from heaven; that as the first Adam by sin had ruined all those who are born of him after the flesh, so the second Adam might save all those who are born of him after the Spirit. And for this end he has all power in heaven and earth committed to him; he has all fulness, yea, the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him, that he might be the head of the body, the church, and that out of his fulness his members might be receiving grace in time and glory in eternity. Of this divine Person all the prophets have spoken since the world began: and what they have spoken in many words the apostle sums up in a short description, Col. i. 15, &c., where he is treating of that Person in the Godhead who covenanted to come into the world to save sinners: "who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature; for by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him and for him; and he is before all things, and by him all things consist. And he is the Head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence: for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." In which words these three glorious truths are declared of Christ Jesus: first, that he created all things visible and invisible; secondly, that he upholds them all by the word of his power; thirdly, that he has redeemed unto himself a peculiar people through his own blood, who are his church: and he is to them what the head is to the body, the head of authority, the first in rank and dignity, and the head of influence, from whom life and motion and sense are communicated to all his members: for in him they live and move and have their being. In all things he is first, or has the pre-eminence; he is Jehovah the Creator and the Preserver of all things, Jehovah incarnate, the Head of his church, and the Saviour of the body. This is the blessed object of faith: and what can there be conceived beautiful, useful, or happy, what excellency is there or perfection, which is not in its highest degree in this most adorable God-man? What can a believer want, what can his heart desire, which is not here treasured up for his use? Here is a surety perfectly qualified, as man to act and suffer for man, as God to merit infinitely and eternally by what he did and suffered, and as God-man he has now all fulness of wisdom, and righteousness, and holiness, and strength, and every thing needful for his people's happiness. Whither then should they go but to him, for every grace and blessing? And to him they do repair, according to the command—"Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth," Isa. xlv. 22. The promise to them who are looking unto him, is very extensive—"My God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus," Phil. iv. 19. By him they expect a continual supply of all temporal and spiritual needs, and therefore on him they would have their eyes ever fixed, looking unto Jesus. While by faith their eyes are kept steady upon him, they will be discovering something new in this wonderful God-man, and receiving something out of his fulness, to strengthen their hopes, and to inflame their affections. He will grow more lovely in their sight; fresh beauties will discover themselves; new worlds of delight will appear; for all the glories of heaven and earth shine in their fullest lustre in his person. The believer sees them at present; for by faith he can see Him that is invisible; and although he has not such a perfect vision as they have, who, standing round his throne, see him face to face, yet he hopes to enjoy it soon; and he has even now this peculiar pleasure in viewing the glories of his God and Saviour, that he can truly say of him, "this is my Beloved, and my Friend;" here I fix, and on him I rest; I want to look nowhere else for any good, since it all meets and centres in one object: for it hath pleased the Father and the eternal Spirit, that all fulness should dwell in the Son of God, and he is my beloved Saviour, and my dearest Friend; he is the Chief among ten thousand in my affection, yea, he is altogether lovely. The more I live by faith upon him, the more I love him; for I experience such tender compassion in his heart, and such a kind concern for me and my interest, that the love of Christ constrains me to love him again. He endears his person to me by continual favours. I do love him, but not so much as he deserves. I would increase, and abound more and more in love to him, as his mercies increase and abound to me; but a grateful sense of them, and love to him for them are his own gifts, for which, as well as for his mercies, I must be content to be indebted to him for ever and ever. Lord, shed more of thy precious love abroad in my heart; enlarge it in true affection to thee, and make all that is within me bless thy holy name.

Reader, stop a little here, and consider: Art thou one of these believers? Hast thou a warm heart for the person of Christ? Dost thou see in him, and in its highest degree, every thing that is lovely? and art thou growing and abounding in love to him? If this be thy present happiness, thou wilt find many powerful motives to increase it in the 45th and 42d Psalms. Read them, and see whether thou canst so mix faith with what is said in them of the incarnate God, as to conclude with David, "Whom have I in heaven, but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee." If thy heart be thus enamoured with his love, then thou hast got a key to the book of Canticles; for thou art the spouse of Christ. Mayest thou experience what is therein said of the glories of thy heavenly Bridegroom, and mayest thou grow in love to his adorable Person, by finding continual tokens of his love to thy soul in the several offices which he sustains for the dispensing of his favours. In these offices he is always endearing himself to his people. And this is the Second thing, whereby the fathers in Christ grow in the knowledge of him. There is not a want which sin has brought upon believers, but there is an office in Christ, where it may be supplied; and the sense and feeling of that want leading them to trust in him upon the warrant of his word and promise, will certainly bring them a supply in the hour of need. His offices are many, but they may be all included in these five:—He is the Saviour, the Prophet, the Priest, the King, and the Advocate of his people.

The Saviour, Jesus, a dear name, descriptive of his infinite grace, and sweetly suited to the sinner's wants. Whatever pollution or guilt he has contracted, whatever misery he deserves to suffer in time or in eternity, Jesus is Jehovah, almighty to save him: for he was called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins. Whatever they stand in need of to make them happy—wisdom, righteousness, holiness, comfort, or strength—it is all in the fulness of Jesus, freely promised, and by faith received; as it is written, "Ye are saved freely by grace through faith," and saved for ever: for Jesus is the Author of eternal salvation. The spirits of just men made perfect in glory are said to be crying with a loud voice, "Salvation to our God, who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever." So that the name Jesus is dear and precious to the saints in heaven; they are happily employed in ascribing the glory of their eternal salvation to the Lamb of God. And the believer has at present a part of their happiness; for Jesus is the Saviour. He can trust him for all the promised blessings of his salvation, and live by faith upon him for the receiving them. As, every moment, some of them are wanted, so the Saviour's love in bestowing them is more experienced; faith in him is thereby strengthened, and love to him increased: and these graces will be continually growing, while the believer views the state of guilt and misery from which Jesus has saved him, the state of safety in which he has placed him, and the blessings which he has promised him in life and death, and in eternity. Must not such a Saviour become more precious for continuing day by day such free and unmerited benefits? And who can receive them, sensible of his unworthiness, without rejoicing in such a salvation, and admiring and adoring the goodness of the Saviour? O most blessed Jesus! increase the faith of thy people, that they may glorify thee more by depending upon thee for all the promised blessings of thy salvation. Teach them how to do this as the great

PROPHET of the house of God. This is another of his gracious offices, suited to the ignorance of his people: for when sin separated them from God, they then lost the light of life, and had no means left in their own power to discover God and the things of God. Hear what two infallible witnesses say to this fact—"There is none that understandeth; there is none that seeketh after God." Mind; here is no exception; the prophet knew not one; neither did the apostle—"All the Gentiles had the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their hearts." To man in this state of ignorance what could be so suitable as a prophet? And what prophet like him, who, being God, is possessed of infinite wisdom, and being God-man, has that infinite wisdom for his people's use? He was made unto them wisdom, that by his divine teaching he might enlighten their understandings, and by leading them into all truth might make them wise unto salvation. He begins his teaching with discovering to them their ignorance, which is a hard lesson to learn, but he uses such mildness and gentleness with his authority, that by degrees he subdues their pride and makes them willing to sit at his feet to hear his words. This is the humble posture of all his true disciples. They receive him by faith for their teacher, convinced that without him they can learn nothing which belongs to their peace, and having been for some time under his teaching, they grow more sensible of their want of it. He discovers to them more of their ignorance, and thereby brings them to a closer dependence upon him for wisdom. And that is the way they rise in his school. Whoever is the most humble and teachable, he is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. The abiding sense of his standing in need of the divine Prophet every moment makes him the highest scholar. And the Lord keeps him in this dependent state, waiting upon him for his continual instruction, in hearing and reading the word, and in prayer for the enlightening Spirit to make the word effectual. The great Prophet could teach without these means, but he has commanded us in the use of them to wait upon him: for in them he has promised to meet and bless his people, and for the fulfilling of this promise they wait. Christ's presence they look for in the use of all means; and they find it. He teaches them how liable they are to err, how little they know, how soon they forget; and thus they grow in a dependence upon, and in love to, their divine Teacher. And as all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are in him, and they can know at present but in part, they therefore will be waiting upon him for more, still more knowledge; and he answers his character; he teaches them wisdom; he shows them danger, discovers to them the devices of Satan, guards them against the errors and heresies of the day, makes manifest the snares of the world, and in all respects fulfils to them the offices of an infallible prophet; for he keeps them from resting upon any false foundation, and enables them to build all their hopes of acceptance with God upon the atonement made by the high PRIEST of our profession Christ Jesus. This is his chief office. He is our Prophet, to teach us our guilty, helpless state, and to bring us to rely upon him to save us from it, by being our Priest. We have all sinned, and have incurred the pains and penalties due to sin. We are all justly liable to the sufferings and death, to the curse, and to the separation from God, threatened in his law to transgressors; and we have no means in our own power to escape them How full, then, of grace and love was the heart of our blessed Immanuel, that he would vouchsafe to be a priest to offer gifts and sacrifices for sin? His gifts were infinitely precious: he gave himself for us—the gift of his eternal Godhead, the gift of his immaculate manhood, body and soul, in which he obeyed perfectly, and so magnified the law, that it may be eternally honourable in admitting those, who have sinned, into heaven—the gift of his prevailing prayer for all that shall believe in him to the end of the world—and the gift of his body and soul to be once offered for sin, in the place and in the stead of sinners, as it is written, "He suffered once for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God—He died for our sins according to the scriptures—He was made a curse for us, that he might redeem us from the curse of the law, and that we who sometimes were afar off might be made nigh by his blood, and might through him have access by one Spirit unto the Father." In these most precious gifts, in this everlasting meritorious Sacrifice, consists the office of our divine priest; and upon him the believer rests. He is enabled upon this foundation to build all his hopes of acceptance. The great atonement made by Jesus' obedience unto death is all his salvation, and all his desire—all his salvation; for he looks no where else, but to Jesus, and him crucified: he depends upon nothing else to save him from suffering and death, from the curse of the law, and from being eternally separated from God. And this is all his desire—to get a closer acquaintance and more intimate communion with the crucified Jesus. This is his one study and delight: I have determined, says he, to know nothing but Jesus, by whom I have now received the atonement. God forbid that I should glory, except in the cross of my Lord Jesus Christ. I would look upon all other things as dross and dung, compared to the excellency of the knowledge of that one offering, by which he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified. In this his priestly office, bleeding and dying for me, he is, beyond description, beyond conception, full of grace and truth; and daily he becomes more lovely in mine eyes. As I discover more of the exceeding sinfulness of my heart and life, my meritorious Priest grows more dear to me: I rest more safely on his atonement, satisfied of its infinite sufficiency to bring me near to God. And finding my faith and hopes established in it, and through it a free access to the Father, Jesus, the sacrificed Lamb of God, becomes day by day more precious to my heart. His blood and righteousness are the continual rejoicing of my soul. Oh! how happy am I in this my royal Priest! for now, even now, have I redemption in his blood, the forgiveness of sins—I am safe from the destroying angel under the blood of sprinkling, and I have also boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus. Daily do I experience more of the riches of his grace, comforting, strengthening, and sanctifying me through faith in his most precious blood. Through this he saves me from hell; through this he bestows upon me heaven; and for this shall be my song of everlasting praise. Unto him who hath thus exceedingly loved me, and hath washed me from my sins in his own blood, and hath made me, the vilest of sinners, a king and a priest (amazing grace!) unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

These are the breathings of the believing soul, now become well-grounded upon the atonement, and living upon the priestly office of the Lord Jesus Christ for peace and joy, and expecting to be established in them continually by his power, which makes another of his offices necessary; for some corruption or enemy, temptation or trouble, will be always trying to draw the eye of faith from looking unto Jesus the High Priest of our profession: and such is the believer's helplessness, that he could not be fixed a moment, were not Jesus a priest upon his throne, almighty to make all his enemies his footstool, and to rule in and over his people as their

KING. In this relation he exceedingly endears himself to them: for they are in themselves weak and helpless. They are without strength to resist the least temptation, or to overcome the weakest enemy. They cannot of themselves subdue one corruption, or get the victory over a single lust. Neither can they perform one act of spiritual life. They cannot make nor keep themselves alive to God by any power of their own; for without Christ they can do nothing. Most mercifully, then, is his kingly office suited to their weakness. He is the great king over all the earth, as God; but he has a peculiar rule in and over believers as God-man, the Head of the body, the church; to which he is connected by as close and near a bond as the members of the body are with the head. He is the first in dignity, as the head is, and in all things has the pre-eminence; and what the natural head is to its members, the same he is to the members of his spiritual body: for he is the Head, from which all the body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God. And for the ministering of proper nourishment and influence to his members, he has all power in heaven and earth in his hand. He is the Lord God omnipotent, whose kingdom ruleth over all. It is not an outward thing, like the kingdoms of the world; but, says he, the kingdom of God is within you. He sets it up within, in the hearts of his people, and there he sways the sceptre of his grace, subduing all the evils within, and conquering all the enemies without, by his almighty arm. He takes them and theirs under his royal protection, and manages all their matters for them, until he bring them by his power unto eternal salvation. The power is his; but by faith it becomes theirs. When they find themselves helpless and without strength, then they look up to him to make them strong in the Lord, and by faith rest upon his promised strength, and thereby receive whatever degree of it is needful at that time. Thus they live by faith upon their almighty king, and they glorify him by trusting in him for strength. By daily experience they become more sensible of their weakness, and learn to live more out of themselves upon him. They find the safety, the comfort of this. They see it is far better for them to be dependent upon Christ, that his power may rest upon them, than that they should be strong in themselves; and therefore they rejoice, they take pleasure in their own weakness, because it illustrates and magnifies the power of Christ, who does all for them, and in them.

Hear one of these happy believers thus describing his case: I was caught up, says he, into the third heavens, into paradise: and I heard there unspeakable words, which it is not possible for a man to utter; and, lest I should be exalted above measure, through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure; for this thing I besought the Lord thrice that he would take it away from me. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: my grace is sufficient to sanctify this cross, and to support thee under it; it will be for my glory and for thy good it should be continued; because my strength is made perfect in weakness:—the weaker thou art, the more will thy strength be magnified in bearing thee up, until faith and patience have their perfect work. This divine answer from my Lord and king satisfied me, and I have for fourteen years had sweet experience of the truth of it. I am a witness to the all-sufficiency of Jesus' grace; but never have I found so much of it, as when I have been the most helpless in myself; and therefore most gladly will I glory in my infirmities and weaknesses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me, that his power may be continually glorified by my continually depending upon him for it; and that I may have fresh evidence of Christ's power working mightily in me. Since the Lord is thus become my strength, I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake, in whatever I suffer for him and his cause: for when I am weak, then am I strong—weak in myself, strong in the Lord; stronger in him the more sensible I am of my own weakness, and then strongest of all, when, finding I can do nothing, I live by faith upon him to do all for me. In this state of weakness and dependence I glory; I take perfect pleasure in it; because it honours the kingly office of my Lord Christ, and makes it plain to myself and others that he keeps me every moment by his mighty power: for since I can do nothing, the excellency of the power which does all in me and by me appears evidently to be of God, and not of man.

Reader, is not this a happy case? Is not that man blessed whose strength is in the Lord, and who can say in faith, Surely in the Lord have I strength? And what hinders thee from being as strong in the Lord as Paul was? Thou hast the same promises, the same God and Saviour to fulfil them; and, for thy greater encouragement to live upon him by faith, for the fulfilling of them to thee, he has another office, in which he condescends to be thy ADVOCATE, freely to take thy cause in hand, and to see it carried in the court of heaven. In this character he would represent himself, as having undertaken to answer all charges against thee, from whatever quarter they come, and to obtain for thee every blessing promised in his word, and for which thou appliest to him by faith in the time of need. In this amiable light he would have to consider him as thy daysman, to whom, being thy Saviour and thy

Friend, thou mayest safely refer thy cause, as the Mediator between God and man, who will transact all thy matters for thee with the Father, and as thy Intercessor, who appears in the presence of God for thee, that every blessing of his salvation may be thine. Under these names the scripture describes the advocateship of the Lord Christ; which office he sustains for thy sake, to encourage thee to come with boldness to the throne of his grace. Thou hast a friend there, who is bound by his word, and also by his office, to see that thou want no manner of thing which is good; and although all things seem to make against thee, and thou canst find no human means of obtaining the promised good, which thou wantest, then look up to the Lord Jesus. Thou wilt glorify him at such a time, if thou canst trust in his intercession, and if the workings of thy faith be such as these—

Although I am less than the least of God's mercies, a vile sinner, and to this moment an unprofitable servant, deserving for my very best works and duties to be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord; yet, glory be to his infinite grace! I have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous; and he is the Propitiation for my sins. All the blessings which he has promised to give his dear people, as their Saviour, their Prophet, Priest, and King, he is my Advocate with the Father to obtain for me:—a righteous Advocate, who asks nothing but what he has a right to, and who never asks in vain. It hath pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell in the Head of the body, the church; and it pleaseth him that the members should, from the fulness of their Head, receive abundantly all the influence they want; for the Father himself loveth them, and out of his infinite love gave his Son to be their head, that he might fill all in all of them. What, then, may not I expect from such an Advocate with such a Father? Already have I received so much, that I know Jesus appears in the presence of God for me. I can trust my cause in his hands. He has taught me to leave all my matters to his management, and I desire more simply to resign them up to him. I find every thing goes on well which is left to his direction, and nothing miscarries but what I undertake without him. Oh for more faith! The Lord increase it, that my precious Advocate may be more glorified by my trusting him more, and that he may have all the honour of conducting my affairs, spiritual and temporal, in earth and heaven, in time and in eternity: Even so be it, Lord Jesus.

After the believer has been taught thus to trust the Lord Christ, and to expect that grace which, in his several offices, he is engaged to give, then his conversation will be well ordered: and as he daily grows in faith and dependence upon Christ, he will walk more in the comfort of the Holy Ghost: his outward as well as inward matters will come under the influence of grace, and will be left to the direction and government of the Lord Jesus, which is another excellency of the life of faith, and which renders it infinitely preferable to any other way of living.

The state of the case is this: Christ has all power in heaven and earth given unto him. As God-man he has a mediatorial kingdom, which ruleth over all created beings and things; for they subsist by the word of his power, and are upheld by his providence, so that whatever, in his infinite love and wisdom, he sees best for his people, he is almighty to bestow it on them. They can want no promised good, nor suffer any outward evil; but he is able to give the one, and to deliver from the other. Their wants are many, their sufferings great. Sin has brought disorder upon the whole creation. The outward state of man in the world is full of misery, not only following him, but also in him, in his very frame and constitution; pain, sickness, mortality in his body, emptiness in his enjoyments, disappointments, losses, worldly cares, something or other, in body or estate, troubling him; for man is born to trouble. What manner of love, then, is this, that God our Saviour would take these things under his government, and manage them for the good of his people, whom he would have to be happy in him in this world, as well as in the next. He has given them many great and precious promises relating to the life that now is, and he is faithful who hath promised to supply their earthly wants, to sanctify their sufferings, and to make all things work together under him for their good He has kindly undertaken their temporal as well as their spiritual concerns; for nothing was left out of the covenant of grace. It was ordered in ALL things. The outward state and condition of believers, their poverty or riches, health or sickness, trials of every kind, how great they should be, how long they should continue, are all appointed and unalterably fixed; nothing left for chance to do. When the Lord God determined to bring many sons unto glory through Christ Jesus, the means by which he intended to bring them unto that end were in his purpose as well as the end itself; therefore all things were ordered and made sure, even to the very hairs of their head; for they are all numbered. What a continual source of comfort is this to believers! Their present happiness is provided for, as well as their eternal, in the covenant of grace. God is become their God, has made himself known to them in this covenant-relation, and has thereby bound himself to give whatever he sees will be the best for them. But because he knoweth their frame, and how apt they are, under hard and long trials of faith, to be discouraged, he has therefore made them many sweet temporal promises for their support. Lest they should be weary and faint in their minds, he has engaged to deliver them from all evil: "Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth them out of them all," Psal. xxxiv. 19. He delivers two ways, either by entirely removing the affliction, or by changing its nature; for he takes the curse out of it, and turns it into a real blessing; he makes it the means of increasing faith and patience, sweetens it with a sense of his presence, and demonstrates that it comes from love, by its increasing love to him in the heart of the righteous. This is the best deliverance, as one of the greatest sufferers for Christ witnesses, who, upon the mention of his afflictions, declares, "Out of them all the Lord delivered me," by saving me from the evil that was in them, and by making them yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness.

The Lord has also engaged to bestow upon believers all good: "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing," Psal. xxxiv. 10. Their loving Shepherd will see that they lack nothing, no good thing will he withhold from them. To the same purpose are the promises in the New Testament, Matt. vi. 33. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things, food and raiment, and all necessaries, shall be added unto you." I your God and Saviour give you my word for it; trust me, and you shall never want. With confidence did he believe it, who said to the Philippians, iv. 19. "My God shall supply ALL your need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus." What a powerful motive is here for the strengthening of our faith, that, be our wants ever so many, ever so great, our God has engaged to supply them all! We may boldly, then, cast all our care upon him, since he careth for us, and may rest assured of his managing our whole outward estate infinitely better than we could for ourselves. What trouble, what burdens shall we be hereby eased of! What peace of mind shall we enjoy, when we can give up all our temporal concerns into the Lord's hands, and by faith see them all conducted for our good, by his infinite wisdom and almighty love! Blessed surely is the man who thus putteth his trust in the Lord his God. He is delivered from the anxious care of getting, and from the fear of losing what he has got: he is easy about the present; the future he leaves to the Lord: his conversation is without covetousness, and he is content with such things as he has, and thereby he escapes thousands of the common troubles of life. In this sweet peace he enjoys his soul, because the Lord has said to him, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," in any state, in any want, or in any distress; I will be ever with thee, to turn all things, seem they ever so afflicting, into real blessings. Trusting to this word, which cannot be broken, he may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me. Let the world persecute me, my trade fail, poverty pinch me, sickness pain me, friends leave me, and all outward comforts forsake me, nevertheless I am a happy man: the Lord Christ is my portion, my all-sufficient portion still; and these things, being of his appointment, are for the best. I find them so; glory be to him! He makes them the means of weaning me from the world, deadening the old man of sin, bringing me to a more intimate acquaintance with himself, and to a greater experience of his goodness to my soul; whereby he enables me to trust all things for time and for eternity in his hands, who hath said unto me (and faithful is he that hath spoken, who also will do it), " I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

But some may say, Are there any persons who live thus above the world, freed from its cares, and fears, and troubles? Yes, thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift. He has promised to make all things to work together for good to them that love him, and he has had witnesses, in every age, of his faithfulness, in fulfilling his promises. Read that little book of martyrs, Hebrews xi., and you will see how happy they were in God, not only in prosperity, but also when all the world was against them. Great were the triumphs of their faith. They chose to suffer affliction rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; they esteemed the reproach of Christ, and set more value upon it than upon riches and honours. And we have a great cloud of witnesses in the New Testament, who rejoiced that they were accounted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Christ, who blessed their revilers, prayed for their persecutors, and took joyfully the spoiling of their goods. Hear one of them speaking the sentiments of the rest: " I account all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and I do account them but dung, that I may win Christ." Still there are some among us of Paul's mind. The Lord hath not left himself without witness. We have a few names, (may the Lord daily add to their number!) who can trust all their temporal affairs in the hands of Christ, and who find the happiness of having them in his management. He does all things well for them: what would make them unhappy, he takes upon himself: " Cast thy burden on the Lord," says he, " and he shall sustain thee;" and he does sustain the weight of it, and thereby frees them from anxious care, and gives them sweet content. They have enough, let them have ever so little of outward things, because they have got the Pearl of great price. Christ is theirs, and the Spirit of Christ enables them to make up all their happiness in him, and not in the things which perish in the using. Christ, with bread and water, is worth ten thousand worlds. Christ, with pain, is better than the highest pleasures of sin. Christ, with all outward sufferings, is matter of present and of eternal joy. Surely these are the only happy people living. Reader, art thou not one of them? Art thou not a partaker of their happiness? If thou art a believer, it is thy privilege; thy title to it is good, and thou enterest into possession by faith; and if it be so weak that thou art not so happy as they are, thou shouldst take shame to thyself for dishonouring God thy Saviour, for robbing him of his glory before men, and for injuring thine own soul, by not committing all thy outward matters unto his guidance. What could he do more, than he has done, to encourage thee to leave them to him, that he might manage them for thee? He has given thee argument upon argument, promises in abundance, bonds which cannot be broken, immutable things, in which it is impossible that God should lie, to convince thee that thou mayest safely trust in him for all temporal things which he knows will be for thy good. Oh! pray then for more faith. Beg of the Lord to enable thee to walk more by faith, and less by sense; that thou mayest commit thy way entirely unto him, and he may direct all thy paths. The more thou trustest in him, the happier he will make thee. Therefore daily entreat him to deliver thee from taking any anxious thought for thy life, what thou shalt eat, or what thou shalt drink; or yet for thy body, what thou shalt put on. Since he knoweth thou hast need of all those things, and hast sent thee to the fowls of the air, and to the grass of the field, to see what a rich provision he makes for them, art thou not much better than they? Oh! pray still for the increase of faith; that all thy worldly matters being resigned, and given up into the hand of the Lord thy God, thou mayest be eased of many weights and burdens, and mayest run with more patience and joy the race that is set before thee.

As these fathers in Christ learn, by daily experience, to live more upon him for the bread that perisheth, so do they for the bread that endureth unto everlasting life. They attain to a fixed, settled dependence upon Christ for the conducting of all things belonging to their state of grace, to their comfortable walk in it, and to their finishing their course happily. They grow in the knowledge of those blessed truths, are more grounded and better established in them, and these, being received and enjoyed by faith, do manifest the excellency of living by it above any other state, except that of glory.

First, they are pardoned and accepted in the Beloved—in him partakers of every covenant-mercy; for he was made of God unto them wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. His whole salvation is theirs. And this is their state of grace, into which he has brought them, and by faith put them into the present enjoyment of it.

This was largely treated of before, but cannot be too much insisted upon, both because there is a growth in the knowledge of the covenant, and clearer evidence daily to be had of the believer's interest in it, and also because the love and wisdom and mercy in contriving, the power in executing, the grace in applying, the blessings of the covenant, are all infinite. The height and depth, the length and breadth of those divine perfections cannot be fully comprehended. They surpass knowledge; so that if a believer knows a great deal of the way of salvation, yet there is still more, far more to be known. So long as he lives he must be learning, waiting upon the divine Prophet for his inward teaching, and he will become more dependent upon him, the more he learns: for, the wiser he grows, the clearer views will he have of his having attained as yet but little wisdom, which makes him press forward. He believes that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are laid up in Christ, and he longs for more knowledge of his gracious undertakings, of his adorable person, and of his full and free salvation. He follows on to know the Lord. He advances from one degree to another, from faith to faith, and is not satisfied with any discovery until that which is in part be done away, and he shall know even as also he is known.

The believer, being thus satisfied that he is in a safe state, looks up to the Lord to keep him, and to enable him to walk comfortably in it, which is another excellency of the life of faith. All things are well ordered in the covenant for every step he is to take: all treasured up in the fulness of Christ, and by faith received out of it. The believer has many enemies opposing him in his way heavenwards; but in Christ he has strength sufficient to conquer them all; and does conquer them. His worst enemy, that gives him most uneasiness, is indwelling sin, which is never at rest, like the troubled sea, always casting up some of its filthy motions and corruptions; so that when he is in prayer, it is ever trying to amuse and distract the mind with a thousand vain and idle thoughts, to weaken faith by its carnal reasonings and doubts, or, when he is in any holy duty, it is ever present with him, to hinder him from doing it so perfectly as he would. Over this enemy there is no victory but by faith. The old man of sin defies all strength, except that which is almighty, and therefore this the Lord has promised; and these believers had experience of his faithfulness, whose iniquities he had pardoned, and who declared, Micah vii. 19, "He will subdue our iniquities." He will do it: he is engaged by promise, by office; it is his glory to save his people from the dominion of their sins. On him therefore they depend for continual victory, and according to their faith so it is done unto them. While they fight against sin, relying on the strength of their almighty King, they always conquer: his arm subdues the strongest lust: but if they attack the weakest without him, they are infallibly conquered. And this has so often happened to those fathers that know him, that is from the beginning, that now they never dare go down to battle but with their eyes upon the Lord. He has taught them to depend wholly upon him for the crucifying of the old man of sin day by day; and in the power of his might, armies of lusts are made to flee before them. The captain of their salvation encourages them to fight on, not only by subduing sin in them, but also by making this the earnest of their having in him an absolute mortification of sin. By faith they see it; and his victorious grace will never leave them until he put them into full possession of it. Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ their Lord, ere long they shall have perfect and everlasting victory over the whole body and being of sin. And of life, and in virtue of this union he lives upon Christ as a member does in the body; and thereby he has communion with the Father, by the bond of the Spirit; and this spiritual life is begun and carried on by faith; it is a life of faith, not as if faith quickened a dead sinner; for Christ is our life; but the sense and comfort, and strength of that life which Christ gives, are received by faith, and these are according as faith is. If faith be weak, so are they; as it grows, so do they; which discovers to us another wonderful excellency of the life of faith, since by it we now partake of a spiritual and eternal life: "For he that believeth hath everlasting life;" hath it now, is already passed from death unto life, and he looks up to the Lord and Giver of it for every thing needful, and expects it out of his fulness. Hear one of these happy believers thus relating his case:—I am dead to the law, says he, yet alive to God; I am crucified with Christ, and am a partaker of the merit and power of his cross, and by faith I have in him an absolute crucifixion of sin; and although the old man is thus crucified, yet the new man liveth: nevertheless I live, yet not I—I live a spiritual life, yet not I as a natural man, I did not quicken myself; I cannot keep myself alive; Christ liveth in me; he is the Author of my life, and on him I depend for the continuance of it in time and in eternity: for the life which I now live in the flesh, while I am in this body of sin and death, I live by the faith of the Son of God: he is the Author, he is the object, of that faith, by which I have received life from him: by an act of sovereign grace he quickened me from a death in trespasses and sins, and united me as a living member into his mystical body, and I am kept alive through his living, acting, and working in me by his Spirit: he dwelleth in my heart by faith; and the more clearly I see this, the more do I love and enjoy the Prince of life, my precious, above all expression, infinitely, eternally precious Jesus, who loved me and gave himself for me, that by his death I might be dead to sin, and by his resurrection might live to and with God for ever and ever. Thanks and praise be to thee without ceasing, thou dear Lamb of God, for thy love to me the chief of sinners! Let all thy people say, Amen.

This is the happy case of those believers who are, like the blessed Paul, strong in the Lord Christ. By his death they are dead to sin; and because he liveth they are alive to God; for they who are joined to the Lord are one spirit: and as their faith increases, they have more spiritual fellowship with Christ in his death and resurrection, not only in the merit, but also in the efficacy of both. They grow more dependent upon the Lord's strength, and he daily mortifies in them the old man of sin; and as he grows weaker, their other enemies have less power over them. By their lusts Satan tempts them; the more these are mortified, the weaker will be his temptations. By their lusts, by the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, the world tempts them; as these are subdued, they will be more crucified to the world. Christ living, dwelling, and reigning in them by faith, will, day by day, weaken the strength of sin and Satan and the world; and by the power of his death and resurrection he will be conforming them more to his own image and likeness: he will by faith enable them to be growing up into him in all things, as long as they live. They will be going on from strength to strength, till sin and death be swallowed up in victory.

Until that happy time come, he has appointed certain means, in the use of which they are to wait for the continual receiving of grace from him to deaden the old man, and for the growth of the new. And this grace they receive, not merely because they use the means, but because they use them in faith, expecting his presence in, and blessing upon them. Believers set the Lord always before them, and look through the means at him: for without him they are good for nothing; but when observed, according to his mind and will, as acts of trust in his promise, and of dependence upon his faithfulness, then they answer the end for which they were instituted, and become the means of spiritual communion with him. And thus legal duties become christian privileges. One of these means is attendance upon public worship; the ground and reason for which is Christ's promise, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Two or three believers make a church, when they are gathered together in the name of Christ's divinity. By faith they expect the fulfilling of his promise, and his presence in the midst of them; and they are then most spiritual worshippers, when they are looking most unto Jesus, and enjoying communion with him. What are their prayers but acts of faith and dependence? "Whatever ye shall ask," says Christ, "in my name, believing, ye shall receive." Which words show us that prayer is nothing worth, unless it be presented in Christ's name, and in faith relying on Christ's promise to hear and answer. The object of prayer is the Godhead in three persons. The address to each is in their covenant-offices; and the petitions to each should be according as they stand related to sinners in those offices; and the communion with the divine persons is thus expressed: "Through Christ Jesus we have access by one Spirit unto the Father;" and whatever we ask, believing, we receive. What is believers' hearing the word? Is it not a continual dependence upon their divine Teacher to make his word spirit and life unto their souls? They expect his presence to enable them to mix faith with what they hear, and then they grow thereby. What is their keeping the Lord's day? Is it not to express their belief of his being risen, and entered into his rest, and of their having, by believing, entered into rest also? and therefore they wait upon Christ in the ordinances to keep them until he bring them to his eternal sabbath, to that rest which remaineth for the people of God. What is their attendance upon the Lord's supper? Is it not the communion of the blood of Christ, and the communion of the body of Christ, a real partaking by faith of his broken body, and of his precious blood-shedding, and of all the benefits of his passion? In these and all other ways of God's appointment, they expect Christ's presence, and therefore they go to them with gladness of heart to meet him. He is the dear object of their love, and he grows more lovely by every day's experience. They taste and see more how gracious he is, and therefore to converse with him in prayer, and to be in his company in the ordinances, becomes more sweet and delightful to them. Oh! what happy moments do they therein spend! All the great, rich, and pleasant things in the world are less than nothing compared to this joy. Communion with Christ is heaven begun; and by faith they enjoy it, and nothing can rob them of it but sin; which makes them careful in their life and conversation to please their gracious Lord. They depend upon him to teach them his will, and to give them strength to perform it, that they may walk before him in all well-pleasing. Whatever is opposite to his will they dread, because it would deprive them of their greatest blessing, even communion with their best and bosom Friend. Sin, viewed in this light, is blacker and viler than all the devils in hell. The love of Christ shows sin in its exceeding sinfulness, and faith working by love to Christ gains daily victory over it. He who has the love of Christ in his heart will be thereby sweetly constrained to fight against and powerfully enabled to conquer sin; so that it cannot separate him from his beloved Saviour; nay, it shall make him live in closer and nearer connexion. The motions of sin within, and temptations without, to which he is continually liable, will show him the necessity of living in a settled dependence upon the grace and strength of the Captain of his salvation, who will lead him on conquering and to conquer, until he make him at last more than conqueror.

The same faith, working by love, has gained the hearts and affections of believers over to the interest of holiness; and the commandments now cease to be grievous. Love to Christ, who is perfect righteousness and holiness, cannot consist with the hatred of either; nay, they are renewed after his image in both, and renewed in knowledge, that they might know his precious image, and renewed in heart, that they might love it; therefore, being thus created anew in Christ Jesus, they will certainly, in the inner man, delight in righteousness and true holiness. He has shed his love abroad in their hearts, has won them to himself, and now nothing is dearer to them than that everlasting righteousness by which he justifies them, and that true holiness, of which they are become partakers in him, which they evidence by a holy walk, and in which he will present them holy and unblamable and unrebukable before the Father. Thus he has perfectly secured the interest of holiness, and the glory of the most holy God; for they are his workmanship, created unto good works, to love them, to do them, to walk in them as the way to the kingdom; and they live by faith upon Christ's strength for will and power to do them, and upon his intercession for the acceptance of them, laying them all upon the golden altar that sanctifieth the gifts. Thus their whole dependence is upon Christ. He is all and in all of their Christian walk. To him they look for every thing needful, to enable them to glorify God in their lives, and to show forth the virtues of him that hath called them; on his grace they rely, that their conversation may be as becometh the gospel of Christ, and that they may adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things; and they find in him a sufficiency of grace, yea they can do all things, and suffer all things, through Christ strengthening them. Whatever difficulties they meet with in the way of duty, leaning upon their Beloved, he carries them through all—Whatever temptations; I will be with thee, says he, in the hour of temptation; look unto me, and thou shalt be saved—Whatever enemies; fear them not, says he, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness—Whatever sorrows; Your sorrows, says he, shall be turned into joy, and your joy no man taketh from you—Whatever sickness; I will strengthen thee upon the bed of languishing, and I will make all thy bed in thy sickness—Whatever poverty; I will be a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy in his distress—Whatever persecution; Blessed are ye, says he, who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; I pronounce you, I will make you, blessed. Thus Christ is with them, and none of the evils or miseries of life can separate them from him. He keeps them safe, and carries them through all their trials by his mighty power, and they, trusting in him, find that he m kes all things work together for their good. What a blessed life is this! Surely there is none like it; for the life of faith is glory begun. The privileges, the happiness of it, are greater than can be described. The strongest believers upon earth may daily know more, and may experience far more of the comfort of walking by faith, because, as they grow more established in it, they will be receiving more power over sin, and will walk nearer to God. Having but one object to look unto and to live upon for all things, here they will be quietly settled. What can so effectually keep them from being tossed to and fro, as to have all fulness treasured up for their use in Christ, and to be brought to a fixed dependence upon his fulness, and to live upon it for all things belonging to life and godliness? Hereby sweet peace will be established within, and there will be a regular walk in the outward conversation. The whole man will experience what the Lord has promised to his redeemed people: "I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters, in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble." He leads them by his Spirit, and causes them to walk by the rivers of waters, where there are abundant streams of grace continually flowing, and he guides them in a straight way, that they shall not stumble or err therein; but shall be kept happily to the end of their course, and shall finish it to their everlasting joy. And

This is another inestimable privilege of believers. Christ has engaged to keep them unto the end; and having begun a good work in them, he has promised never to leave it until it be finished. What a strengthening is this to their faith! and what a glory does it put upon the whole life of faith, that it is a life which cannot perish! Believers have in them the immortal seed of eternal life. This is the crown of all; for how will this bear them up under crosses, support them in troubles, carry them on in their warfare against the flesh, the devil, and the world, and make them defy all dangers, yea death itself, since they are assured, from the mouth of God their Saviour, that none shall pluck them out of his hands. They do not trust themselves, or have any dependence upon grace received, but they rely upon the faithfulness and power of Jesus, who has given them abundant evidence that he will water them with his grace every moment, and hold them up by his strength, and they shall be safe. How confident were believers of this in the Old Testament! One of them, who had attained this assurance of faith, says, "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life;" and he, with many others who had obtained like precious faith with him, declares, "This is our God for ever; he will be our guide even unto death:" they were sure he would be their God, and would follow them with mercy, and guide them, and do them good in life and death. To the same purpose our Lord has promised believers: "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." How confidently did he trust in Christ for the fulfilling of this blessed promise, who said, "I am fully persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Oh! sweet words of comfort! how happy was Paul in this assurance of faith! It is thy privilege, believer, as well as his. Thou hast the same promises that he had, the same God to fulfil them; and thy faith ought to be growing until thou be assured that no creature, not all the powers on earth, nor the gates of hell, can separate thee from Christ. They may as soon get into heaven, and cut off Christ's right hand, which is impossible, as to cut off one of the members of Christ's mystical body.

If thou art ready to say, I see clearly how I should glorify my dear Lord, and how happy I should be if my faith was but like Paul's in this point; but I am so weak and liable to fall, and mine enemies so numerous and mighty, that I sometimes fear I shall never be able to hold out unto the end. Because thou art such, therefore the Lord has given thee his promise that he will hold thee up, and thou shalt be safe. And this promise is part of the covenant which is ordered in all things, and sure. Look at that, and not at thyself. Consider the Messenger of the covenant, in whom it is all ordered, and by whom it is sure. When thy unfaithfulness would discourage thee, think of his faithfulness. Let thy weakness remind thee of his strength. If, indeed, he leave thee a single moment, thou wilt fall; but he has promised, I will never leave thee. If the number and strength of thine enemies make thee fear lest thou shouldst one day perish by the hand of Saul, he says to thee, thou shalt be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. But if thou art tempted to doubt, finding thy revolting heart apt to turn from the Lord, "I will put my fear," says he, "into thy heart, that thou shalt not depart from me." Observe, it is his faithfulness and power, and not thine, which is to keep thee, and has covenanted to do it; and he has all power in heaven and earth, and he has given thee promise upon promise for the establishment of thy faith, that thou mightest be certain he will love thee, and keep thee unto the end. And when he has brought thee to a certainty of it, then thy comfort will be full. Christ will be magnified in thee, now he has made thee one of those fathers, who have known him that is from the beginning. He has taught thee so to know him, as to trust him for all things and in all times. This is his crown and glory. He has enthroned himself in thy heart, as thy perfect Saviour; and his kingdom is within thee, even righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Now thy calling and thy election is sure. Thou knowest that he is faithful who has promised to keep thee, who also will do it. And having this assurance of faith, attended with the rejoicing of hope, and being sealed by the blessed Spirit to the day of redemption, surely thou art a happy man, thrice happy, whom the Lord has thus highly favoured. How infinitely indebted art thou to his grace! Oh! what thanks and praises dost thou owe, more than thou canst ever pay, for what he has already done for thee! And yet this is only the dawning of the perfect day. His present favours are only earnests and pledges of what he will hereafter give thee. Therefore still trust in him, and he will enlighten thee more by his Word and Spirit, he will enliven, strengthen, and establish thee more. Thy faith will daily rest more assuredly upon him, the joy of thy hope will increase, thy love will yet more abound. He will guide thee by his counsel in an even course, and will receive thee into glory.

Thus have I treated, as I was able, of the safety and happiness of living by faith upon the Son of God, and have described the common hindrances which stop its growth, and the victory over them, which the Lord gives his people. I have been forced to be very short, and could only throw out some hints upon this copious subject. May the good Lord pardon what is amiss, and bless abundantly what is according to his mind and will. If thou hast followed me, reader, in thy experience, and art indeed a happy believer, living upon thy blessed Jesus, for his promised heaven; and for all things promised to thee in the way thither, think what a debt thou owest him! how dear and precious should he be to thy heart! He has saved thee from all evil; he will bless thee with all good. As surely as thou hast the earnest, thou shalt have the purchased possession. Oh! what a Saviour is this! he has already bestowed upon thee the exceeding riches of his grace, but how great will be the riches of the glory which he will give thee? Thou wilt soon see him as he is, and then thou shalt be like him. No tongue can tell how great that glory will be, not all the tongues in heaven, after the number of the elect shall be perfected, no not after they have enjoyed it for millions of ages: never, never will they be able to show forth all his praise for making them like himself. Surely then, while thou art waiting for this glory, which shall be revealed, thou wilt be going on from faith to faith, that thy beloved Saviour may become more dear to thee; and that thou mayest have more close and intimate communion with him. Every day's experience should bring thee to love his appearing more. Having tasted how gracious he is, thou shouldst be longing for the marriage supper of the Lamb with fervent desire. And being now a Father in Christ, and strong in faith, thou wilt be often looking up to him, and saying,

Make haste, my beloved, and take me to thyself: let me see thee face to face, and enjoy thee, thou dearest Jesus, whom my soul longeth after. It is good to live upon thee by faith, but to live with thee is best of all. I have found one day in thy courts, conversing sweetly with thee, better than a thousand; but this has only whetted my appetite: the more communion I have with thee, I hunger and thirst still for more. My soul panteth for nearer, still nearer communion with thee. When shall I come to appear before the presence of God? O thou Light of my life, thou Joy of my heart, thou knowest how I wish for the end of my faith, when I shall no longer see through a glass darkly, but with open face behold the glory of my Lord. Thou hast so endeared thyself to me, thou precious Immanuel! by ten thousand thousand kindnesses, that I cannot be entirely satisfied, until I have the full vision and complete enjoyment of thyself. The day of our espousals has been a blessed time. Oh, for the marriage of the Lamb, when I shall be presented as a chaste virgin to my heavenly Bridegroom! How can I but long earnestly for this full enjoyment of thy everlasting love! Come, Lord Jesus; let me see thee as thou art. Come and make me like unto thee. I do love thee; I am now happy in thy love; but not so as I hope to be. I am often interrupted here, and never love thee so much as I desire; but these blessed spirits standing now round thy throne are perfected in love. Oh! that I was once admitted to see, as they do, the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ! Is not that the voice of my Beloved, which I hear answering, Surely I come quickly! Amen, say I, even so come, Lord Jesus. Make haste, my Beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart, upon the mountains of spices.

Are not these, believer, the breathings of thy soul? Since the time for them is short, may they grow warmer and more affectionate every day! Thou wilt wait but a little while before thou shalt see the King in his perfect beauty, and thou shalt be a blessed partaker of his eternal glory. And if he make these few lines any means of bringing thee to see more of his beauty at present, to live more upon his fulness, and to be happier in him; I hope thou and I shall, through his grace, meet him soon, and give him to eternity the glory of this and of all his other mercies. To the Lord I commend thee, on whom thou hast believed. May he strengthen and establish thy faith daily, that it may grow exceedingly until he bring thee to the end of it, and admit thee into that innumerable company, who are ascribing blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, to Him that was slain, and hath redeemed them unto God by his blood: to whom, with the Father, and the eternal Spirit, three Persons in one Jehovah, be equal and everlasting praise. Amen.

A TREATISE

UPON

PREFACE.

Ever since the Life of Faith was published, I have been attending to the doctrines therein advanced, and bringing them into experience. Their truth has appeared to me from the word of God, and has been confirmed by their being accompanied with the power of God. His divine influence attends his own doctrines to this day; and they have the promised effect upon the heart and life of the believer. They are mighty through God for all the purposes of salvation. What is said upon the subject in these volumes is chiefly in this experimental way. My design is to bring the great and leading points of our religion into use and practice, and to show how necessary the doctrines of grace are for the well governing of the Christian walk. Every thing needful is promised, and by faith is received, which can make it even and regular, holy and happy.

The apostle Paul complained of professors who walked not according to the gospel. There has been occasion for the same complaint ever since; but never more than at present. Many walk at this day, who make some profession of Christ, and yet never attain to any steadfastness, but are tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, and at last come to nothing.

Others, pretending to be better settled, attain to some form of godliness, but are without the life and power of it: they appear to have some notions and opinions about the way of righteousness, but not being taught them of God, nor ever brought under the mighty influence of them, their walk is therefore very uneven and irregular, and generally in the end brings great scandal upon the name and cause of Christ.

We have also many at this day, who set out in the ways of religion, but never felt the ruin of the fall, nor the plague of their own hearts: these are commonly very confident and presumptuous; they make a shining profession, and go on with great parade, until they come to be tried, and then in the time of temptation they fall away.

There are others who are the real children of God, and yet do not walk as becometh their high rank and dignity. An even, holy, happy walk with their reconciled God and Father is their privilege, and there is grace sufficient promised in Jesus, and to be received by his Spirit, to enable them to live up to it, that they may walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing. Yea, the apostles call upon them and encourage them to be going on and advancing in the right way —"Furthermore then we beseech you and exhort you, brethren, by the Lord Jesus Christ, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk and to please God, so ye would abound more and more," 1 Thess. iv. 1. How few follow this evangelical exhortation! How very few attain and preserve in their consciences the sense of God's being perfectly at peace with them! It ought to rule there always and by all means: but for want of it, they afford continual occasion for a legal and unbelieving spirit to rob them of their peace, and thereby to distress them in their hearts. As guilt comes in, love goes out. What weakens the cause must also weaken the effect. Love, with its fruits, must decrease in proportion as the believer withdraws his heart-dependence from God. Then he begins to walk uneven and uncomfortable; he grows cold and indifferent about spiritual things; he gets into darkness and discontent; he becomes quite unhappy in his frame, and unthankful in his affections: whatever was the cause of his falling into this decay, it began at the root. His faith was attacked, and gave way. As this yielded, the decay became general; and it was found true, "If ye will walk contrary unto me," saith God, "then will I also walk contrary unto you."

Reader, if thou hast the faith of God's elect, thou knowest that these things are true. Thou findest it hard work to maintain peace with God: and if this be not maintained, if the foundation give way, the building will certainly totter. Look well then to the ground-work. Is all safe there? Dost thou see the infinite glory of the Saviour's work, when he made peace by the blood of the cross? and does this silence guilt in thy conscience? Canst thou at all times draw nigh in love to a reconciled God? Does not the sense of thy failings and remaining corruptions keep thee at a distance from him, and render thy walk uncomfortable, especially when without are fightings, within are fears? If it be very difficult under such trials to preserve a sense of God's loving kindness, yet it should be remembered, there is a gracious provision made for the establishing of the soul so safely in Jesus Christ, that the peace of God may rule in it always, and by all means. Is it not necessary then to inquire what this provision is? how it may be received? and how it may be made use of? for if by daily practice it may be experienced in its divine power, it will then have the same happy effect which it had upon David: "I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou hast set my heart at liberty." May thine heart, reader, and mine, enjoy more of the liberty of the children of God! and then we shall not only go forward, but also run fast; and may nothing stop us from pressing towards the mark, till we win the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

This has been my constant prayer during the writing of the following treatise Itwas the fruit of reading, and meditating, and praying over those scriptures, which speak of the walk of faith. Such reflections as used to occur to myself, I have put down; whether it was in searching my own heart, or in begging the blessing of God upon the text then under consideration. This seemed to me an easy method, and very useful; because the doctrine would lead to practice; and frequent and heart-searching meditations would tend, under the teaching of the Holy Ghost, to an increase of faith. There are some soliloquies, addressed to my own soul, and some exercises of devotion, in prayer and thanksgiving. I would have every believer to consider whether it be not his privilege to join me in them, and to make my words his own. If he cannot follow me in this experience after the 5th chapter, I pray God to increase his faith, that this book and his experience may go hand in hand; and that he may attain to holy fellowship with God in all duties, and to rejoice in God at all times, yea, under the cross itself, and to go on conquering and to conquer, till the good fight of faith be over, and he finish his course with joy.

THE WALK OF FAITH.

CHAPTER I.

Whoever walks with God, must be first acquainted with the way of peace.

It is the constant usage of scripture to represent spiritual things by material, and to speak of the faculties and actions of the soul by terms borrowed from those of the body. Walking is a bodily action, and consists in moving and going from one place to another; hence it is applied to the spiritual walk. The soul, reconciled to God and at peace with him, has an appointed way, in which it is to walk, in order to enjoy the grace promised to them who are in Christ Jesus. This is enjoyed by faith; and therefore the scripture calls the believer's going on in his walk with God from strength to strength, The walk of faith. "We walk by faith," says the apostle, "not by sight."

When man fell from God, he lost his way, and had neither will nor power to return. The Old Testament church makes this confession—"All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned EVERY ONE to his own way." Isa. liii. 6.

The apostle Peter reminds believers of this—"Ye are as sheep going astray; but are now returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls," 1 Pet. ii. 25. To which agree the words of his brother Paul: "There is none righteous, no, not one; there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God: they are ALL gone out of the way," Rom. iii. 10, 11, 12. The whole human race, says the oracles of truth, is gone astray, ALL of them are gone out of the way; they have left the way of God, and turned every one to his own way, they are unable, like a poor lost sheep, the most unable of all creatures, to return; yea, they are unwilling also; for they walk not after the spirit, but after the flesh—carnally minded, and in their carnal mind enmity itself against God and his ways.

It pleased God, in the exceeding riches of his grace, to reveal to those wanderers the way of salvation. He made it known to them upon the fall, and believers from that time forward saw it plainly, and went on in it comfortably. Enoch, Noah, Abraham, &c. are said to have walked with God in the very same way, afterwards marked out by the written word: which was a directory to the Jews, showing them how they should walk in the steps of the faith of their father Abraham. Age after age, God raised up the prophets to bring his people into the King's highway, and to put them upon praying, that they might be kept in it. By the mouth of his servant David, he gave them this promise: "Good and upright is the Lord; therefore will he teach sinners in the way—the meek will he guide in judgment, and the meek will he teach his way." Encouraged by this warrant from the word of God, sinners feeling their wants were led to pray, "Show me thy ways, O Lord; teach me thy paths: lead me in thy truth and teach me," Psalm xxv. 4. It is written in the prophets, They shall be all taught of God; they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord. If any of his children lack wisdom, and ask it of God, he giveth to all his liberally, and upbraideth not. He brings them by his word and by his Holy Spirit to the knowledge of themselves and to the knowledge of the true God.

Divine teaching is necessary to make men acquainted with themselves. They know not their state, nor fear their danger, until the Holy Spirit, according to his office, proceed from the Father and the Son: then he convinces them of sin, of the exceeding sinfulness of it, of the guilt thereby incurred, and of the wrath deserved. He enlightens the understanding with a clear sight of those truths, and he fastens the conviction of them upon the conscience. Then they find that they had been blind and ignorant, rebels in their wills, and apostates in their hearts from God. He makes them feel the corruption of their nature, and the error of their ways, in which, if they had gone on, they must inevitably have perished; for they were without will, and without power, to return to God. When they were made to see it right that they ought to return, and to repent, yet it was not their choice to come to him in the way of believing. They found they could not believe, unless it was given them from above. Faith is the gift of God; and cannot be received, but by the mighty operation of God. He must put forth his divine power, or else the convinced sinner will remain utterly helpless and hopeless, shut up in unbelief.

Thus the Lord teaches all his children. He makes them acquainted with their fallen state, and sensible of their guilt and of their misery. He brings them to the right knowledge of the corruption of every faculty of soul and body, which are always inclining to evil, and incapable of doing any thing truly good. A corrupt tree can bring forth nothing but evil fruit. The judgment is enlightened to see this, the conscience is awakened to feel this, and thereby the convinced sinner is made willing to be taught the way of salvation. The Holy Spirit fulfils his office by teaching him the knowledge of God.

Our blessed Saviour declares, no man knoweth the Son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him; and this he does by the Holy Spirit of wisdom and revelation, who is therefore given to the children of God, that they may know him and believe in him, as their reconciled Father in Christ Jesus. This saving knowledge is hid from the worldly wise and prudent, but is revealed unto the unlearned, whom the Holy Spirit has made simple and teachable people. To them he reveals the things of God. He makes them acquainted with the Nature of the Godhead, which is one. There is one Jehovah, and there is none other. And also with the Personality in the Godhead, Father, Son and Spirit. These three exist in the one Jehovah. They took those names, not to describe their manner of existing, but their manner of acting; not what they are in themselves, but how they stand related to us in the economy of redemption: for the eternal Three entered into covenant before all worlds, and agreed to sustain certain covenant-offices, and assume names, or characters, descriptive of their offices. Father is the title of that divine person, who, out of his infinite grace, gave an innumerable company of sinners to his Son, upon condition that he would be manifested in the flesh, and would become their surety, to work out for them a righteousness in his life, and to make an atonement for them by his death, and then he would be his father and their father. A coequal and coeternal Person accepted the condition, and covenanted to be made man, and to live and die for the many sons whom he was to bring to glory; therefore he took the name of Son, Son of God, Son of Man, &c. Another coequal and coeternal Person covenanted to breathe life into them, to be to them the Spirit, or breath of life, that they might be regenerate from a death in trespasses and sins, and be made the children of God, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ: therefore he is called throughout the scriptures the Spirit, or the breath of life. He makes them acquainted with the covenant as he has promised. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he will show them his covenant," Psalm xxv. 14. He will open to them the nature and uncertainty of all covenant engagements for the establishment and growth of their faith. The covenant was ordered in all things, and sure; it was ORDERED by the counsel and purpose of the eternal Three concerning the heirs of promise, whose salvation was settled by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie—his counsel, his oath. His counsel the result of his infinite wisdom, confirmed by that sacred oath which cannot possibly be broken. All his perfections stand engaged to see the sovereign decree, thus solemnly ratified, carried into execution; for what was ordered is SURE—sure as the throne of Jehovah, unchangeable as his nature, durable as his being. Though it be but a man's covenant, yet, when it has been signed and sealed according to law, none disannulleth or addeth thereto. None can disannul God's covenant, and he himself will not: "My covenant will I not break," says he, "nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips," Psalm lxxxix. 34. I will not add thereto, nor diminish from it; for I have ordered it in ALL things. I have not left one single thing out, not the least circumstance: I have settled the whole plan by mine unerring wisdom; and I will fulfil every tittle of it by mine almighty power. According to my will the course of nature and grace is infallibly directed, even the most minute events. Every hair is numbered. Not a sparrow falls but by my divine decree.

How safely, then, may the heirs of promise depend upon a covenant God! and whenever they flee to Jesus for refuge, what strong consolation may they draw from hence, that their salvation is fixed by the immutable counsel and inviolable oath of the blessed Trinity!

The same divine teacher, who enabled them to believe those truths for the further establishment of their faith, led them to discover the FREENESS of all covenant mercies. They are promised as free gifts. They are bestowed to the praise of the glory of free grace. They are not conferred upon the worthy, but upon enemies, upon the ungodly, upon sinners as sinners. No conditions are required, no pre-requisites are expected. The motives which determine God to show mercy to sinners are not taken from any good in them, or foreseen to be in them. Not for works of righteousness which they have done, or can do; but according to his mercy he saveth them. He does all to the magnifying of the honours of his own mercy. His covenant was so contrived, carried into execution by the life and death of Jesus, applied by the Holy Spirit, that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord. No flesh shall glory in his presence. Boasting is for ever excluded; because all is of grace. Wisdom to teach the sinner saving knowledge, righteousness to justify him, strength to keep him, comforts to bless him, heaven to receive him, these are the free gifts of covenant love; for by grace is he saved through faith, and that not of himself, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast. Thus would the Lord hide pride from man, and would teach him practically such scriptures as this—"Not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord, be it known unto you; but for mine holy name's sake," Ezek. xxxvi. 32.

Closely connected with this divine lesson is the FULNESS of covenant mercies. Every thing needful for the salvation of the sinner is fully, as well as freely, provided by the exceeding riches of grace, and is treasured up by the Father's love in the fulness of the Son. To this the Spirit bears witness in the word of truth, and seals his witness upon the believer's heart. It pleased the Father that in the Word made flesh should ALL fulness dwell, and that out of his fulness his people should receive grace for grace. This is the infinite ocean. There is not a stream, not a drop of grace, to be had, but from hence. Jesus Christ, as God-man, has it all in himself, and for the same end, as the head has the senses in itself. He has it to communicate to his members, a fulness of light and life, of sense and understanding, of love and joy, yea of every spiritual blessing. On him, as the head of the body, the church, every believing member is directed to live. On him must he depend at all times; and to him must he go for all things. If he seek pardon and peace, righteousness and holiness, a supply of his wants, strength for his warfare, comforts under his miseries; if he expect life in death, and life eternal; he must make continual use of the fulness of Jesus, for in him dwelleth ALL the fulness of the Godhead bodily. It dwelleth in him, as in an overflowing fountain. The Father's love to his adopted children, the experience of it by the grace of the Spirit, are entirely in and from the salvation of Jesus Christ. Out of his fulness comes every covenant mercy of the Godhead, and in a rich abundant stream, always flowing with some blessing or other into the believer's soul. The enjoyment of it on his part may not be always alike comfortable; but it is always alike sure on God's part. Nothing can stop it. Nothing can turn its course. Unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again. The river of the water of life proceeds out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, and it will be running on till it come back into its own ocean. The water that I will give him, says Jesus, speaking of the believer, shall be in him a fountain of water springing up into everlasting life, and bringing with it the fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore.

No man will see any reason to set out in the way to heaven until he be made acquainted with those truths. His judgment must be enlightened with the knowledge of them. He will never think of changing his course until he be made sensible of his own sinful and helpless state; and when this is brought home to his conscience, and he has nothing in himself left to trust in, then he will be led to look abroad for help. The Spirit of God will teach him the doctrines of grace, the nature of the Godhead, the persons in the Godhead, the covenant of the divine persons, by which every grace and blessing was freely and fully provided, given by the Father to the Son, in whose fulness they were all laid up for the use of his body the church, and communicated to every member of it through the influence of the Holy Spirit. Thus he is taught that all is of grace, from first to last. Whatever good a sinner receives on earth, or enjoys in heaven, is so given as to exclude all boasting, and to lay every proud and self-righteous principle in the dust, that grace alone may wear the crown and have all the glory.

Here, then, O my soul, is matter of close examination. Dost thou know thyself, thy state and condition? and hast thou fled from the wrath to come? Has the light of God's word shone into thine understanding, and made thee to see that thou art indeed set out in the way to heaven? How was this discovered to thee? Did the Holy Spirit ever convince thee of sin, and that thou hast lost the image and forfeited the favour of God? Didst thou ever see thyself fallen in Adam, in him a child of wrath, a ruined miserable sinner? Hast thou felt how utterly unable thou art to atone for thy sins, or to make thyself holy? And wast thou brought to this after many legal trials and self-righteous efforts? At last forced to give up all hope in thyself, and to look to the Lord who made heaven and earth, from whom alone thy help could come?

And hast thou been taught the true knowledge of the unity of the Godhead, and of the persons in it, Father, Son, and Spirit; the covenant of the ever-blessed Three, and the absolute security of all covenant mercies, promised by the Father, and engaged to be given to the Son as the head of his body, the church, who is now actually as God-man in possession of them, and by his Spirit he freely and fully bestows them upon his members? for they will never cease to be receiving out of his fulness grace for grace, until they receive out of the same fulness glory for glory.

O my soul! examine closely and prove thyself, by the standard of the divine word. Search and try what the conviction of thy lost estate has been. Was it deep and practical? Is it an abiding truth with thee, that there is no help or hope in thyself? And hast thou fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before thee in the Lord Jesus? Is thy knowledge of the Godhead mere theory, or is it brought into practice? Dost thou enjoy the Father's love, through faith in the finished salvation of the Son, by the influence of the Holy Spirit? This is the saving knowledge of the Godhead. And is this thine? Dost thou honour the Divine Persons by acknowledging their immutable counsel, and immutable oath, entered into for the security of the heirs of promise, that they might trust, and not be afraid? Dost thou see with any clearness the absolute safety of relying upon the promises of God? and dost thou expect to draw from hence comfort to thy conscience, and joy to thy heart?

If thou art indeed set out in the way to heaven, art thou settled in the knowledge of thy fallen state? Hast thou found thyself unable to do anything, but to hasten on thy ruin? And, from the sight and sense of this, hast thou been led to see all undertaken for thee, and secured to thee for time and eternity, in the covenant of the ever-blessed Trinity. These truths lie at the very foundation of all comfortable walking with God. See that thou be well grounded in them. The knowledge of thyself is to bring thee to God: the knowledge of God is to lead thee to walk with him. The one is to teach thee to renounce all trust in thyself; the other is to show thee that thou mayst safely place the confidence of thy heart on thy reconciled Father, thy Saviour, and thy guide. Look up to him, then! O my soul, and be often praying to him, and saying,

O Lord God! that which I see not, teach thou me. Keep me an humble disciple in the school of Christ. Let me be daily learning there what I am in myself, a fallen, sinful creature, justly deserving everlasting destruction from thy presence. Oh, let me never lose sight of my want of a Saviour, nor ever be without the sense of what is said—"Without me ye can do nothing." Teach me this, thou eternal Spirit. Open thou mine understanding to understand the Scriptures. What thou hast revealed in them concerning the Godhead, and concerning the counsels and works of the ever-blessed Trinity, that reveal to my soul. Thou hast declared that no man can say Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost; Oh shine, then, into my dark mind, and lead me into the saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus. Make me acquainted with his covenants undertaken, and his perfect fulfilling of them, that, by resting on his finished salvation, I may find the Father's love in the Son, his Father, my Father, and may be brought, through thy blessed influence, to have fellowship with the Father and the Son. Oh, lead me into all truth, thou Spirit of wisdom and revelation! that I may know the things which belong to my peace, and may through thee be made wise unto salvation. Amen.

CHAPTER II.

The believer is reconciled to God, and has the peace of God ruling in his conscience; and they two walk together, because they are now agreed.

It is written in the prophets—"They shall be all taught of God." Every one of his children shall be brought to the knowledge of the truth, and what they have been taught in the understanding shall be made practical, that it may have its proper effect upon the conscience. And this is answered, when it comes under the authority and power of the word of God, and faithfully accuses or condemns according to that unerring rule.

Conscience supposes the knowledge of some rule, and it consists in comparing a man's state or actions with that rule, in order to discover whether they agree with it, or not.

The rule is the scripture, the whole revealed will of God, which is the unerring, and the only standard of right and wrong; for all scripture is given by the inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, to teach the man of God what is truth, and to make him wise in it unto salvation. Fallen man has no means of discovering the will of God, but as it is revealed to him. He has no innate knowledge. He has no implanted principles. He is born as ignorant of God, and of the things of God, as a wild ass's colt. His understanding is darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in him, because of the blindness of his heart. And he has no means in his own power of attaining any divine knowledge; for he cannot by searching find out God. The world, by its wisdom, never did find him out. The Hottentots know as much of him as the Greeks and Romans did: indeed, the natural man, let him be ever so wise, knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God; neither can he know them; because they are spiritually discerned.

The scripture, then, is the only rule of right and wrong. Conscience has no direction but this rule. Neither ethics nor metaphysics, no fancied light of dark nature, no lawless law of rebel nature, no human science, whether pretended to be implanted, or by the use of reason to be acquired, have any right to guide the conscience. These are blind leaders of the blind. They undertake that for which they are not only unfit, but that which they have no warrant for. A parcel of felons in jail may think what they will of their state. They may take it upon them to form a mock court, to try one another. They may acquit or condemn, as they please; but the judge and the jury will pay no regard to their foolish proceedings. There is a word which is to try us at the last day, and by that we should try ourselves at present. It was revealed for this purpose. And when the revealed truth is clearly understood, then conscience is acting aright if it finds a true verdict for God, either accusing, or else excusing, according to the direction of his unerring word.

And this is the work of the Holy Spirit. He enlightened the judgment with the knowledge of the truth, in order to make it practical; which he effects by bringing the conscience to submit to the sovereignty of God in the law, and to submit to the righteousness of God in the gospel. Herein he displays the omnipotent power of his grace, according to the promise, John xvi. 8. He carries with demonstration the conviction of guilt, and the conviction of righteousness, to the conscience. By the former he gives the sinner a real heartfelt sense of his sin and misery, and he acknowledges himself a convict of the law, justly deserving all its penalties in time and in eternity. By the latter he sets open a door of hope, showing him the perfect righteousness of the God-man wrought out for such guilty creatures as he is: he enables him to plead it before the throne, and to trust in it for his acceptance: by which means he finds relief in his conscience, and comfort in his heart. Being justified by faith, he has peace with God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

What the Holy Spirit teaches has life, as well as light, in it. He accompanies his doctrine with the power of God. What he has revealed concerning the state of mankind under the fall, he applies with divine evidence to the conscience. Under his influence the sinner reads those scriptures, and feels the truth of them. "As by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin, so that death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: through the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; for it is written, there is none righteous, no not one; there is none that understandeth; there is none that seeketh after God: they are all gone out of the way; they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no not one. Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it commands them who are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped; and all the world may become guilty before God." His mouth is stopped. He has no plea to make; no excuse left. What the law saith he subscribes to. The law brings him in guilty before God, and in his conscience he bears his testimony to the law. He acknowledges it to be holy, just and good, even in its penalties, which he deserves to suffer. Formerly he tried, in his own strength, and took great pains to escape them, but now he gives over all those self-righteous attempts. He found that he laboured in vain to atone for his sins, or to make himself holy. He groans, being burdened under the ruins of the fall. His ignorance, rebellion, apostasy, his corruption in every faculty of soul and body, render him unable to take one step in his return to God. He owns it, and confesses that without Christ he can do nothing.

Oh, my soul! consider whether God has taught thee this knowledge of thyself. It is absolutely necessary to reconcile thee to him and to his ways. Thou wilt never heartily agree to walk with him by faith, so long as thou hast any thing of thine own to trust in, or to draw comfort from. Examine, then; art thou sensible of thy fall, and dost thou feel the sad effects of it? Dost thou know what it is to be alienated from the life of God? What! dost thou find to this day the opposition of thy sinful nature to the holy law, the flesh lusting in thee against the spirit? Has God thus convinced thee of sin? If he has, then in thy conscience thou submittest to what the law says of thy state. Thy mouth is stopped, and thou art guilty before God. Thou hast nothing of thine own to urge in arrest of judgment. This is an enlightened conscience; so far it speaks for God, and is guided by his unerring word. Oh, pray to the Lord the Spirit, and beg of him to guide thee into all truth, that he may bring thy conscience to submit to the righteousness of Jesus, and to be a faithful witness for him.

This is his proper work in the soul, and what he undertook in the everlasting covenant. When he is come, says Christ, he shall convince the world of righteousness: he shall testify of me, that I am made of God righteousness to believers; and he shall glorify me as Jehovah their righteousness: thus he shall teach them my righteousness, with which the Father is satisfied; and he shall through faith apply it effectually to their consciences, and they shall also be satisfied with it. Being justified by faith, they shall have peace with God through their Lord Jesus Christ.

Righteousness is a perfect conformity to the law: if it be tried by the balance of the sanctuary, it is full weight; if by the standard, it is full measure; if judgment be laid to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, it is quite upright. There is no defect in it of any kind. This is the righteousness of the law—it must be perfect and continual, failing in no one point: for the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. And it is an adjudged case that there is none righteous, no not one. It is left upon record that ALL have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; therefore, by the deeds of the law, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.

When the Holy Spirit has convinced a sinner of his being in this unrighteous state, then it becomes an important inquiry—how can the Judge of all the earth ever look upon and treat a sinner, as if he were a righteous person? To which the gospel answers directly—"God hath made Christ to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God IN him." This was agreed upon in the covenant of the eternal Three. The Father undertook to maintain the honour and dignity of his law and justice. His coequal Son undertook for his people to come in their nature, and to stand in their place and stead; to act for them, and to suffer for them. As their surety, he made himself answerable for their debt of obedience, and for their debt of suffering. Accordingly, when the great law-fulfiller cometh into the world he saith, Lo, I COME TO DO THY WILL, O GOD. He did it in his infinitely holy life, in which he magnified the precepts of the law, and made them everlastingly honourable. He suffered it in his infinitely holy passion, bearing the sins and sorrows of his people, their curse and wrath in his body and soul, upon the tree, until the immense debt being paid, he cried out in the triumph of a conquering, though a dying Jesus, IT IS FINISHED: for through death he conquered death, and him that had the power of death, that is, the devil: he finished the transgression, and made an end of sins, and made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness.

This is the great leading truth of the gospel in which the peace of conscience is principally concerned. The justly offended God is here revealed under the character of a reconciled Father. He gave his Son to be a covenant of the people, who was to fulfil all covenant engagements for them; and he has fulfilled them all. The end of his living and dying for them is answered. He has finished the transgression, and has made peace by the blood of his cross. He has brought in everlasting righteousness by his divine obedience, and the Lord is well pleased with him for his righteousness' sake, yea he is well pleased also with his body, the church. He looks upon all the members, as he looks upon the head. He accepts them in the beloved. He beholds them in him with perfect delight, and rests in his love. He is his Father, and their Father. He is related to his whole family in heaven and earth in the closest bonds of fatherly affection, and he makes his love known to them, and sheds it abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost. He would have all his children to address him under his dear name, "OUR FATHER which art in heaven," and to expect from his fatherly love all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus.

When this comfortable doctrine is received into the conscience, it silences guilt, and produces peace with God. The gospel comes with full authority to establish it in the conscience; for it is therein revealed and proposed to our belief under the character of a divine RECORD, made authentic and properly enrolled in the court of heaven. The witnesses are the eternal Three. Their record is in the nature of a covenant, confirmed by their joint counsel, and ratified by their joint oath—the two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie. He graciously vouchsafed to give the heirs of promise this perfect security for their salvation, that after they had fled to Jesus for refuge, there might be an end of all strife in their consciences, and they might have strong consolation. Accordingly we read, "There are Three that bear record in heaven —the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost—and these Three are ONE." A record among men is an authentic testimony in writing, entered by authority in one of the king's courts, in order to preserve the proceedings had upon any suit. This record contains the final determination of the judges in that cause, and in their memorial of it, and therefore imports in itself such uncontrollable evidence, as to admit of no proof to the contrary. The matter of the record is never allowed to be tried by a jury, but is of such credit as not to be questioned in any instance. This is the nature of a record in law. And, if we receive the witness of men, certainly the witness of God is greater; for this is the witness of God, which he hath witnessed of his Son; namely, "He hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." To which the Spirit beareth witness; because the Spirit is truth. He has revealed the covenant of life and peace, which was between the Father and the Son; he has entered it upon record, and every word of the record may be pleaded, for it is allowed to be good and valid in the court of heaven. As a powerful advocate, he pleads the perfect fulfilling of all righteousness in the life and death of the God-man, and the Father's perfect acceptance of what he did and suffered, as the full redemption-price for all his people, and he carries his cause in the court of conscience. The awakened sinner is convinced that the work of Jesus is a finished salvation, and that the divine record is a sufficient warrant for him to believe in it. Accordingly, he gives it credit, and is enabled to plead it against guilt and fear; upon which he finds peace with God.

Trusting to the blood of sprinkling for pardon, and to the righteousness of Jesus for acceptance, he then sees God reconciled to him, and that reconciles him to God, and by the spirit of adoption he cries Abba, Father.

But perhaps it may be said, I believe this, but I do not find peace in my conscience. Nay, but you do not believe it; if you did, it would certainly bring present relief: for guilt comes from the broken law, and from the apprehension of punishment deserved; but the law has been restored to its dignity, and made infinitely honourable by the righteousness of Jesus: how can you believe this, and yet be under guilt? The punishment was laid upon Jesus, and he suffered all that was due to his people, as their atoning sacrifice: how can you believe this, and yet fear that justice will punish you? A debtor would not fear to be arrested, if his surety had paid the sum, and got him a full discharge. A felon with the king's pardon in his pocket would dishonour it greatly, if he were to live in continual dread and terror of suffering for his crime. Examine carefully, and pray for the right understanding of your case, and, depend upon it, you will find that either you do not believe the matter of fact, or the record concerning it.

The matter of fact is the method provided for quieting the guilty conscience—a provision of exceeding rich grace and of everlasting efficacy. The Father gave the Son to be the surety for his people, and to live and to die for them, and in their stead. The Son has finished the work which the Father gave him to do, and is become the author of their eternal salvation.

The record of this fact is in the scripture. Father, Son, and Spirit, the three witnesses in heaven, have by covenant and oath attested that there is life for every one who believeth in Jesus. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that, whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Now consider; of what do you doubt? Has Jesus made full atonement for sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness? Has the Father demonstrated again and again his perfect delight in his person, and his infinite satisfaction in his work. Certainly you cannot question this doctrine, if you believe the scripture to be a divine revelation. Do you doubt, then, of God's free promise, or of his faithfulness to fulfil it? What! Can his word be broken? Can his promise fail? His word and promise, ratified in the immutable covenant, and sealed with the immutable oath of the eternal Three? This is your warrant to believe. And do you question the veracity of it? "He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar." Oh, what a dreadful sin to give the lie to the Holy Trinity! The Father says, whosoever cometh, the Son says all that come unto me, shall be saved; the Spirit says, come whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely, and be saved. Are not these faithful sayings worthy of all credit, especially as they are delivered with divine authority under the great seal of heaven? If doubts still remain, pray against them, and meditate upon the unreasonableness as well as the wickedness of them, and continue to hear and to read the word (for faith cometh, and groweth too, by hearing) that you may be enabled to put honour upon it by venturing your soul upon the divine faithfulness to make it good to you.

Perhaps you may believe the record which God hath given of his Son, but you cannot do it with steadfastness. You can at times stay your mind upon God with sweet peace, but you are not able to maintain it; yea, you lose it when you want it most. How in this case shall the believer keep the peace of God ruling always in his conscience?

It is to be maintained in the same way by which it was first received. It came by believing, and is thereby strengthened. By the shedding of the blood of Jesus Christ, peace was made between God and man; by the sprinkling of his blood, peace is made between man and God. When this is applied to the conscience by the Holy Spirit, and received by faith, there is a continual preservative against guilt: "For the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." Here is the witness of God; and it is always the same. This believed, will always bring the same cleansing virtue, and keep the conscience purged from dead works. If at any time guilt defile it, then unbelief has entered, and has been denying, either that the blood of Christ does cleanse from all sin, or that the divine testimony concerning it does deserve credit. Guilt cannot easily enter into the conscience but by one of these two ways. Examine, and see which it is. Do you doubt of the virtue of Christ's blood, or of the truth of God's record concerning it?

You reply, I dare not question either of them, yet nevertheless I cannot with any settled comfort maintain peace with God. But it is your privilege to maintain it, confirmed to you by the royal charter of grace, and ratified in it by many express promises. Jesus has made peace by the blood of his cross; and if you believe what the God of truth says of it, peace should rule in your heart always: for all things are well ordered for you and sure, in the everlasting covenant. On the part of God, all is unalterably fixed and settled. What is it, then, which unsettles you? Is it something you find in yourself? Is it from indwelling sin, remaining corruption, a body of sin and death, or from the weakness of your faith and of your other graces? What! have you forgotten that from all these the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth? Is it from a suspicion that your peace is not right, because it ebbs and flows? This should humble, but not discourage you; because there is a gracious provision made to remove your suspicion. God has taken the charge both of you and of your peace: he keeps both by his mighty power; as it is written, The peace of God which surpasses all understanding shall keep with a safeguard your hearts and minds in Christ Jesus. You are as safe in the hand of God, at the lowest ebb, as at the highest spring-tide of sensible comfort; because your safeguard is almighty, and he is equally concerned about your peace, whether you feel it or not. Your sense of it may vary, but he varies not. There is in him no variableness, nor shadow of turning. How should the belief of this stay your mind upon your God, and keep guilt out of the conscience, even when you are walking in darkness, and have no light!

O my soul! meditate upon those precious truths. Give thyself wholly to them. Consider how deeply they enter into the very being of thy peace. Unless they be understood, thou canst not know the way of peace; and unless they be received by faith, thy conscience will not be purged from guilt and unbelief. And while these defile it, thou canst not look upon God as reconciled, or delight thyself in him or in his ways. Can two walk together, except they be agreed? But when they are agreed, and of one mind, then walking with God becomes pleasant, and all his paths are peace.

Search, then, and examine thyself, O my soul! and that not lightly, and after the manner of dissemblers with God, but closely and thoroughly by the light of the divine word, and under the teaching of the divine Spirit. Dost thou understand what is revealed concerning the way of peace—what was covenanted in the counsel of the eternal Three—and what has been done in consequence of it? Jesus Christ is the great peacemaker. He has made peace through the blood of his cross. The Father sent him, gave him to be a covenant of the people, to fulfil for them all righteousness, and to be their atoning sacrifice. The Father has seen the work which he gave him to do, and has accepted it; is perfectly satisfied with it, and therefore is infinitely delighted with him and with all his. He would now be known by the high style and title of the God of Peace. Fury is not in him to those whom he sees in the beloved. He is a Father, fully, for ever reconciled to all his children in Christ Jesus. He loves them, as he loves him, with every kind feeling of the most tender parent. And he will bring every one of them to partake with their glorified head of the blessings of his everlasting love.

If thine understanding be enlightened with this knowledge of God, is it effectual in thy conscience? Canst thou plead it there? This is the principal thing. Hast thou a good conscience, freed from guilt and condemnation, by believing the record which God hath given of his Son? He is well pleased with him for his righteousness' sake. His soul delighted in the sweet-smelling savour of his Son's sacrifice. Because he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, therefore the Father hath highly exalted him. This is the witness of God. Dost thou yield to it, and give it full credit? What canst thou set to thy seal that God is true, and that what satisfied him has perfectly satisfied thee, and therefore the peace of God rules in thy conscience always and by all means?

Remember, this is thy privilege. Thou art called to the enjoyment of it. The evidence is as full as could be desired, for the ending of all strife in thy conscience. The greatest honour thou canst put upon the divine witnesses, is so to end it as to suffer no appeal to be made from their decree. Thy conscience should join issue. It should say the same that God does. It should plead thy discharge from guilt under the broad seal of heaven; and should stop the mouth of unbelief with those words written in golden letters in the royal charter of grace—"There is NO condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus—they are freely forgiven ALL trespasses"——"They are justified from ALL things."—"Thy sins and iniquities," says God himself, "will I remember NO MORE." These are the immutable words of truth. They cannot be broken. O my soul! put honour upon them. Believe them without doubt or wavering. Why dost thou draw back thy confidence? Trust, and be not afraid. Thou mayst safely venture to believe all that the Lord hath spoken. He will make it good; and the more thou believest, the more will be made good. More faith will bring thee in a richer revenue of peace. The Lord increase thy faith. May it entirely influence thy conscience, that it may agree with God, neither questioning the infinite value of the righteousness and atonement of Immanuel, nor yet the faithfulness of his promise, under which thou claimest them—"WHOSOEVER WILL, may take them freely."

Let thy faith be ever so well established, yet thou wilt meet with something every day, to try it; but remember, the foundation on which thou standest cannot fail, and none, nothing, shall remove thee from it. The Lord brought thee to build upon this foundation. He hath begun the good work, and he will not leave his work unfinished. The top-stone shall certainly be brought forth with shouting GRACE—GRACE: for his love is like himself. His purposes, his word, his works change not. What if thou feel many things wrong in thyself; thou art sometimes low in spirits; thou canst not be pleased with thy corruption, and thou art not pleased with thy duties; thy graces are weak; thy love not as it should be; thy best services unprofitable; yet those very things, rightly understood and improved by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, will be the means of establishing thy conscience in the peace of God: they will lead thee every day to a greater dependence upon sovereign grace: for they will leave thee nothing to trust in but the righteousness and the atonement of Immanuel; nothing to keep thee, but his faithfulness to his word and work; and nothing to bless thee but his free covenant mercy. Thus they will work together for thy good: trials will settle thee: enemies will confirm thee in peace: troubles will bring thee nearer to God. Amidst all discouragements thou wilt have this promise to stay thy soul upon: "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." His friendship is fixed: it springs from the purpose and love of his own breast, and therefore was and is always unchangeably the same in him. Whom he loveth, he loveth unto the end.

Well then, O my soul! thou hast examined thyself. How is it with thee? Dost thou know the way of peace? Art thou at peace with God, being justified by faith? Canst thou plead this peace, and maintain it in thy conscience? Is it a good conscience? does it witness for God? Is it a pure conscience, cleansed from guilt and condemnation? Is it satisfied that the Father is perfectly reconciled through the life and death of his Son? and is it satisfied with the divine record giving thee a free grant of the benefits of his life and death, and putting thee into possession by believing? Art thou of one heart and of one mind in this matter with the Father, and now, being at peace with him, agreed to walk in his way? If indeed he has been thus gracious unto thee, bless the Lord, O my soul! and all that is within me praise him for the exceeding riches of his love! What a mercy is it that he hath brought thee into the way of peace! Oh, go on; fear not. Set out daily with a holy, humble boldness to walk with thy God. And for the guiding of thy feet in his way, and that thy steps may not decline from it, be diligent in hearing and reading the word of God. Study it. Pray over it. Mind what encouragement it gives thee: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by that new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the vail, that is to say, his flesh, and having an high priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water." Heb. x. 19, 20, &c. What perfect peace is here proclaimed to the children of God! Sin had separated them from him; but there is access through Jesus. He is the way to the Father. He is a new way, in opposition to the old way of works, which upon the fall was shut for ever. He is a living way: all that are alive to God live by the faith of the Son of God. He is a consecrated way; every thing needful for their holy walk being provided in him. And they are required to walk in this way with boldness: trusting to the blood of Jesus, and depending on the intercession of the high priest over the house of God, they have access with confidence into the holiest. It is their undoubted privilege to draw near with a true heart, not like a double-minded man, wavering and unstable, but with full assurance of faith, entirely satisfied that God in Christ has nothing in his breast but love towards them; therefore they should believe in him, and serve him without fear, having their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, maintaining peace with God through the continual application of the blood of Jesus, and having their bodies washed with pure water; body and soul being cleansed from the guilt and filth of sin by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost.

Oh, may this be my happy experience! May I ever have grace to draw near to my reconciled Father with a good conscience! Yea, Lord, this is my heart's desire. I would walk with thee day by day in perfect peace. Oh, deny me not the request of my lips. Glory be to thy free love, that through Jesus I am suffered to have access into thy presence, and am commanded to come with boldness into the holiest of all. Lo, I come before thee, holy Father! to plead the blood-shedding and the righteousness of thy dear Son; and I hope my plea will be admitted, through the intercession of the high priest of the house of God. Oh, look, thou God of peace, upon the face of thy Beloved! See me in him. I desire to be found in him. And for his sake let the faithful witness for thy love in Jesus abide with me, that, in hearing and reading thy word, in prayer and meditation, he may increase my faith in thee and love to thee.

O God the Holy Ghost! I beseech thee to make practical upon my heart what thou hast revealed in scripture of the Father's love. Deliver me from guilt and condemnation by the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. Apply it effectually. Apply it continually. Help me to believe with more comfort in my conscience, and with more steadfastness in my walk, that his blood cleanseth from all sin. O blessed Spirit! carry on thy work in my soul. Lead me from faith to faith, that I may at all times have freedom to enter within the vail to a reconciled God and Father, and may be able to maintain peace with him against doubts and fears, against corruptions and enemies. Oh, teach me to draw near to him with a true heart, steadfastly persuaded of his love, and in full assurance of faith. This is thy gracious office: Oh, fulfil it in me, that my heart may be sprinkled from an evil conscience, and my body washed with pure water. Let me find grace sufficient for me, for Jesus' sake; to whom, with thee, O Father, and the eternal Spirit, three Persons in one Jehovah, be equal honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen

CHAPTER III.

The believer in his heart cleaves to God, and walks with him in love.

This depends entirely upon a good conscience. There can be no love of God unless there be first peace with God. No convinced sinner can love him until he believes him to be reconciled. While guilt remains in the conscience, enmity will keep its place in the heart: for so long as he looks upon his sins unpardoned, and God the just avenger of them, he must consider him as a jealous God, and a consuming fire. In this view there is every thing that can increase his guilty fears; and while these defile the conscience, instead of walking with God, he would run away from him, and, like the first offenders, he would foolishly try to hide himself from the presence of God.

But when the Holy Spirit has discovered the way of peace, and has enabled the sinner to find peace, being pardoned and justified through faith in Christ Jesus, then he looks upon God in another light. He can view him, according as he has proclaimed himself—the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin. Under this endearing character, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is revealed in scripture. Thus would he be considered in the covenant of grace—related in the nearest bond of affection to all his children. He is their father, the father of mercies, freely loving, freely forgiving, freely accepting them in the beloved. The Holy Spirit convinces them of it, and sheds the Father's love to them abroad in their hearts; the sense of which sweetly inclines them to love him again. Love begets love. God has put on the tender bowels of an ever-loving parent, and he gives them the affection of dutiful children. They love him because he first loved them. Then it is the delight of their souls to cultivate and improve this love on their part, and it becomes their heaven upon earth to walk with their God in the ways wherein he has appointed to meet them, to love them, and to bless them.

The main point, then, in the Christian walk is to know how to maintain peace in the conscience: because this is the powerful motive upon which the believer first sets out, and it is the great spring which keeps them going on. While his conscience continues pure and undefiled, and the peace of God rules in it, all is well. He does not stop, he does not halt, in the way. But when guilt enters, unbelief certainly follows close after it, and then there is a fresh controversy in the court of conscience. Many doubts arise, and afford matter for strife and debate. The sense of peace is not only disturbed, but is also, for a time, destroyed by such suspicions as these—"Am I freely pardoned?—Is God fully reconciled to me?—Is he still my loving Father? I fear not. I have done so and so—He is certainly displeased with me, and therefore I dare not approach him, as I used to do, with love and confidence." This is an evil conscience. It is not purged from dead works; because guilt is still in it; and this keeps the soul at a distance from God. It begets a coldness and a shyness to him, and, by shutting out the comfortable sense of his love, makes way for fear of wrath. Then the motives to walk with God lose their influence, and an evil heart of unbelief tempts the man to depart from the living God.

Look well then, O my soul! to this leading truth, which has such universal influence over the Christian walk. Attend to the peace of thy conscience. See it be true peace; and mind it be well settled. Learn to maintain it upon gospel motives. The heart follows the determination of conscience; and cleaves to the Lord, or departs from him, according as the conscience excuses or accuses. It is therefore absolutely necessary for our peace that we should know how God has shown himself reconciled in Christ Jesus. The character of him in the scriptures should be studied. Whoever has been enabled to call him, Abba, Father, should implore the assistance of the Holy Spirit for an increase of faith, and should make use of all appointed means for his growth in the knowledge of the love of his heavenly Father. The apostle is upon this subject in Romans v.—a chapter abounding with powerful arguments to establish the peace of God in thy conscience: in order that the love of God may rule in the heart. He gives us this account of the privileges of a justified man. He has peace with God through Jesus Christ—by whom he has a free access to God—is in a state of grace—stands in it by the power of God—has reason to rejoice (come what will) in hope of the glory to be revealed—and whatever he meets with in the way to glory should increase the rejoicing of his hope, and confirm his heart in the love of God to him. Observe how divinely the apostle speaks: "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God; and not only so, but we rejoice in tribulations also, knowing well that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given unto us."

What privileges! how many, how free, how blessed are here declared to be the portions of the justified man, which he is to enjoy in his reconciled God! each of them tending to establish peace in his conscience, and love in his heart, that he may delight himself in God and in his ways. The first and chief blessing in experience, which draws after it all the rest, is the Spirit.—

The Holy Ghost is given unto him to be a witness for Jesus, and to shed abroad the Father's love through him. He comes as the Spirit of life to quicken the soul, which had been dead in trespasses and sins, and to bring it to the knowledge of salvation, which he does, secondly, by the gift of faith.

Being justified by faith. He enables the sinner to believe in the finished work of the God-man, and to trust to the free grant of it in the word of God: whereby he sees himself fully justified; through the atonement of Jesus freed from sin and guilt; through the righteousness of Jesus entitled to life and glory: and therefore, thirdly, he has

Peace with God through Jesus Christ his Lord. He sees God is at peace with him—perfectly and continually reconciled. The peace is everlasting which was made through the blood of the everlasting covenant. The belief of this quiets and satisfies the sinner's conscience; which being purged by the blood, and justified by the righteousness of Jesus Christ his Lord, is at peace, is freed from guilty fears, and is reconciled to God, yea to the justice of God, who can now be just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly. To what high honour is he then called! He is admitted into friendship with God, and has,

Fourthly, Access by faith into this grace, wherein he stands—access to a mercy-seat, to which he is invited to come freely, as a beloved child to an affectionate parent. Boldness and access with confidence are required and commanded. "Let us come boldly to the throne of grace: having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus," let us by faith make use of that new and living way, which he hath opened for us. Oh, what a mercy is it thus to have access to a gracious Father! how much is the mercy increased by his settling his children in it! We STAND in it, says the apostle, denoting the being fixed in a state of perfect acceptance, conferred by sovereign grace, brought into it by unchangeable love, and kept in it by the power of a faithful God. How strengthening to faith! how encouraging to hope! for,

Fifthly, We rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Faith relies upon the truth of what God hath promised, and hope waits for the enjoyment of the good in the promise, but more especially for the glory which is to be revealed. This hope of glory is full of rejoicing; because every thing which hope looks at, and draws its joy from, depends on the truth and faithfulness of a covenant God. There can be no failing on his part; and therefore, on the believer's, there can be no disappointment. On this ground hope casts its anchor, both sure and steadfast, and finds all safe during the storms of life, yea, has many a sweet foretaste of the promised glory, brought into the soul by these very storms: for,

Sixthly, We rejoice in tribulations also. These are so far from taking away the joy of the justified man, that they tend greatly to increase it, and to make it more holy, as well as more happy. Tribulations produce a plentiful harvest of blessings, they bring forth

Patience, giving occasion to exercise the graces of the Spirit, to find the truth and the power of them, and thereby working submission under the cross to the will of God. "It is good for me," says David, "that I have been afflicted;" his troubles brought him to God—"Before I was afflicted, I went astray." His troubles kept him near to God, dependent on the divine strength to bear them with patience, and for a happy issue out of them. Whereby he learned Experience; which follows suffering and patience. Tribulations teach us what we are as sinners, and what God is to his reconciled children. They make us sensible of our weakness, and of our being strong only in the Lord—of our misery, and of his comforts—of what we deserve, and of what he saves us from: they bring us to live out of ourselves, upon the sure mercies of a covenant God; whereby our hope in him being tried, and by trials confirmed, we discover his love to us in suffering, and by daily experience become quite satisfied, that our

Hope is the grace of the Holy Spirit: for it answers the scripture character: it rejoices in tribulation. It has good reason so to do: it experiences God's faithfulness. Every thing promised being made good to us in time, we thereby grow up into the full assurance of hope, that we shall not fail of receiving the promised glory. And this

Hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given unto us. He is given to satisfy our hearts of the love of God to us, and to lead us to study the nature and the perfections of his love. Behold! what manner of love, what a free, full, sovereign, and everlasting love, the Father hath bestowed upon us. It is actually bestowed and enjoyed by the power of the Holy Ghost. He shows us how the Father loved us, even when we were without strength; yea, herein God commendeth his love towards us, in that, while we were sinners and enemies, he gave his Son to live and die for us; much more then, being now justified, we shall be saved from wrath, and brought to glory, through him. How does this commend and set off the love of God! It is the first cause of all the graces here mentioned, and it bestows them upon the most unworthy. Faith, justification by faith, access to God, standing in a justified state, rejoicing in hope of glory, and rejoicing in the way to it even in tribulations, because they exercise and improve patience, and put our graces to such trials, as convince us, that they are the true graces of the Holy Spirit, and that we shall never be ashamed of our hope in God. In this golden chain of experience love is the uppermost link. It was the first, and draws after it all the rest. The free love of the Father gave his Son for us, and with him gave us all things. The same love has now given his Spirit to us, and he has enabled us to know and to believe that we are justified, have access to a reconciled God, stand accepted before him, &c. and that he is our loving God and Father in Jesus. The sense of this warms the heart, and sweetly and powerfully influences the affections to delight in and to walk in love with such an exceedingly gracious and merciful God.

In this delightful portion of scripture the Holy Spirit teaches us how he brings sinners to know that God loves them. It is by believing in the righteousness and atonement of the Son of God. Hence spring peace and love—peace with God in the conscience, and love to God in the heart. There is an inseparable connexion between those two graces: the one cannot exist without the other. Whoever knows the God of peace, will find that God is love; for, being justified by faith, he will thereby see that God is at peace with him, and himself in a state of free acceptance before him, in which he shall stand and be kept safe, until he receive the promised glory; the hope of which will be confirmed by his daily experience of God's faithfulness, making all things, even tribulations, work together for his good in the way to glory: thus will the Holy Spirit satisfy him of the love of God to his soul. And the persuasion of his love begets love; it softens the hard heart; it warms the cold heart; it works kindly upon all the affections, and, by setting before them every possible good to be enjoyed in their reconciled God, it mightily disposes them to seek their supreme happiness in walking humbly and closely with him.

Attend then, O my soul! to this scripture. Meditate upon the experience of which it treats. Pray for it. Pray for more of it. And above all, observe the great truth here taught thee by the Holy Ghost, namely, that thou canst not have any true love of God, but what arises from the sense of his being at peace with thee in Jesus. Oh, beware of false teachers! for there is great reason. Many talk big of their loving God for his own inherent loveliness—a fundamental mistake. Mystics, quakers, natural-religion-men, dreaming metaphysicians, and the motley tribe of moralists and deists, pretend to love an absolute God, without viewing him in the covenant of grace, or as he has revealed himself in the incarnation of his Son. There has been no love of this kind in any heart upon earth for near six thousand years. Adam in paradise might love him thus. But when driven out of paradise for sin, he could love him so no more. The promised seed of the woman, the word made flesh, became then the object of his faith, and the only ground of his love. The scripture has clearly determined this—"We love him, because he first loved us—And in this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him." When the Holy Ghost has taught this love of God to sinners, and by believing has manifested it to their hearts, then they love him upon Christian principles; and sinners cannot love him upon any other. They love him for that infinite mercy which led him to send his only-begotten Son into the world to finish the salvation of his people. They love him for sending the Holy Ghost to enable them to see the everlasting sufficiency of this salvation, and to believe the record of God concerning it; whereby they come to experience how much the Father loved them. This is heaven begun. The Father's love shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost is the foretaste of glory. Whoever enjoys it has found what is more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. Oh, it is indeed heaven upon earth. To preserve it, to improve it, is become the one study of the happy believer. The panting of his soul is after more of this love. The prayer of his faith is, O thou eternal Spirit! help me so to walk with my most loving Father, as that I may maintain peace with him in my conscience, and a growing love to him in my heart, until thou bring me to the enjoyment of everlasting peace and love!

The prayer of a righteous man prevaileth much, being offered with energy. By the love of the Spirit it is answered. He not only preserves, but also increases, his own graces. He leads the believer to fresh discoveries of the Father's love, and puts him into possession of the exceeding rich treasures of it. He helps him to draw very strong arguments for the comfort of his heart from the perfect FREENESS of divine love. Thus he reasons:

Although I am beset with temptations, and assaulted with corruptions, and in a world of troubles, yet I need not fear but God will bring me safe through all; for I know he loves me. It is plain he does: I could never have loved him unless he had first freely loved me. My love is only the reflection of his. I had been convinced of sin, but it was not from myself: the conviction was of God. I have been convinced of righteousness; and I put my whole trust in the righteousness of Jesus. He is the only ground of my hope. I now rest my soul upon the sure foundation which he hath laid. And this faith is not of myself. It is the gift of God. I ascribe it to his sovereign grace, that I have been enabled to look upon the Father, as reconciled to me, pardoning me through the blood-shedding of his Son, accounting me righteous through the obedience of his Son, and in him accepting, loving, and blessing me. How could I experience these things but by the power of the Holy Ghost? And for what did I deserve to experience them? The reason must be found in the riches of his own free grace. Did the Father foresee any thing good in me for which he chose me in his Son? Was it for any worthiness of mine, that the Son vouchsafed to take flesh, and to live and to die for me? Was it for any foreseen works, faithfulness, or diligence in means, that the Holy Ghost called me to know, to believe, and to enjoy the Father's love through the Son's salvation? Oh, no. Away with such thoughts. I dare claim nothing for mine own but sin and shame. Not unto me, Lord! not unto me, but unto thee be all the glory. It was the good pleasure of thine own will which chose me before the foundation of the world, and accepted me in the beloved; and now I know that thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth. I experience the happy fruit and effect of them. I am brought to believe in thee, and to love my God and Father, which I am satisfied I could never have done if thy free love had not first purposed to save me, and now carried thy purposes into execution. To the praise of the glory of thy distinguishing grace, I am in possession of the things which accompany salvation. Oh, give me more grace, that I may daily make a better use of them, and may return thee better praise for thy free gifts of free grace.

It is free, and it is also COVENANT love. This is another of its divine properties: God commendeth his love towards the heirs of promise by giving them full security for its unchangeableness: and this view the Holy Spirit opens to them for the support of their faith in times of trial. When they are walking in darkness, and have no light, troubled on every side, without are fightings, within are fears; when in great heaviness through failings in duty, through risings of corruption, or through manifold temptations, then he discovers to them the treasures of covenant love, and enables them to draw rich consolation from that heavenly store-house. An heir of promise under his teaching is often supported in this way: It is true, I am in trouble, but not forsaken. What if every thing I have and am in myself makes against me, yet God is on my side, a covenant God: for I believe the eternal Three entered into covenant before all worlds, and with manifold wisdom ordered all things relating to the heirs of promise. For their sakes, and to end all strife in their consciences about the certainty of their salvation, it pleased the blessed Trinity to enter into covenant, and to confirm their covenant by oath; thus giving them two immutable things to trust in, in which it is impossible for God to lie. Oh, how strengthening to faith is this view of the unchangeableness of covenant love! If it be but a man's covenant, being properly signed and sealed, no one disannulleth or addeth thereto. And who shall disannul or add to the covenant of the Trinity? The creature cannot. God will not. His purpose of bringing many sons to glory is unalterably fixed in his own mind; and in order to make it a sure ground for their faith, he confirmed his immutable covenant by his immutable oath. On this security I rest my soul. A covenant God has enabled me to trust in his covenant engagements. Hence I see every thing relating to my salvation absolutely certain in the counsel and covenant of God; and I look upon my faith to be one of the effects of my being in the covenant. And faith as a covenant gift is an immutable gift. What a blessing is it that the gifts and calling of God are without repentance! It has been given me on the behalf of Christ to believe. And is not this from covenant love? What else could bring me to trust in covenant faithfulness? Therefore by believing I have immutable things to depend upon for the certainty of my salvation. Upon them would I stay my soul, as well I may, and fix my heart upon them. Oh, that I could bring more glory to my covenant God by trusting him with unshaken confidence! His love to me demands it at my hands. His love contrived the plan of salvation. Love provided every thing needful to carry it into execution. The evidence which he has given of this was from the overflowings of love. His word of promise, ratified by covenant, confirmed by oath, the oath of the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, made to satisfy the heirs of promise of the immutability of the divine will concerning them—Oh, what miracles of love are these! And all to assure them that the heart of Jehovah is invariably towards them for good! Yes, Lord; this is the great love wherewith thou lovest me; and this is the evidence of thy love. Thou hast brought me to believe it, and put some honour upon it. I desire to trust to thy covenant engagements without wavering. Establish, strengthen, settle my faith. Increase it from day to day, that I may grow in the knowledge and experience of that love which passeth knowledge: for

It is a free, a covenant, and also an EVERLASTING love. This is another of its most glorious properties. His love knows neither beginning nor end. It is without variableness or shadow of turning. The heart of God is always one and the same towards his chosen people; for he loveth them freely. The motives to it were all in and from his own breast. The covenant was distinguishing love, secured to the heirs of promise by the most solemn engagements. And this crowns all. His love is of the same date with the covenant—not only before all worlds, but also from eternity. Therefore it is frequently called in scripture an everlasting covenant, and covenant love is said to be according to the eternal purpose, which he had purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord: whereby, before the foundations of the world were laid, he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honour. Here is a never-failing source of comfort to a believing heart. Meditate, O my soul! upon it. Consider what God hath done for thee, and give him the glory of his precious love. Has he not called thee by his Spirit, working in thee in due season? Hast thou not obeyed the call? Dost thou not depend upon the finished work of God thy Saviour? Art thou not justified freely by faith in him? Art thou not seeking daily to mortify the works of the flesh and thy earthly members, and that thy mind may be drawn up to high and heavenly things? Certainly these are good proofs of the purposes of the Father's love towards thee; because these are the happy effects of his purposes now taking place in my soul. Oh! how great should this consideration establish and confirm thy faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed by Christ, and thereby kindle thy love towards God! He has indeed drawn thee by the sweet attraction of his Spirit unto himself, and he has explained to thee the motive for his so doing —"Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." His love, discovered to thee in time, is the fruit of his love before time; for the one is the effect of the other. If love had not been always in his heart towards thee, thy heart could never have been drawn in love to him. But he has drawn it. And thou art seeking to have it drawn more closely to him. Is it not thy daily wish, Oh for more love to my gracious Father! what a love has he shown to me!—what a free, covenant everlasting love! And yet, alas! what poor returns do I make him! Holy Spirit of love, raise and exalt my affections, and let the consideration of the wonderful love of my heavenly Father to me increase mine to him; and let mine abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all sensible experience.

The Holy Spirit, who is the great teacher and manifester of the Father's love, has revealed these properties of it in scripture for the establishment of the faith of the children of God. He would have them to believe, assuredly, that God is their father, not in name only, but in deed and in truth; that he has the bowels of the tenderest parent, and that he freely, fully, everlastingly loves them in his dear Son. As he loves him, so he loves them. He embraces the head and the members with the same affection. And because they can hardly believe this in times of trial and trouble, the Holy Spirit would therefore satisfy their hearts of it by discovering to them the unchangeableness of their Father's love, as it has been manifested in the divine covenant, and confirmed with the divine oath: in both which the witness of the Father to his children is given in this manner:—I have freely loved you; I have engaged to love you, and I will ever be mindful of my covenant engagements:—as I live, saith the Lord, I will love you unto the end; yea, I will bless you with all spiritual and eternal blessings in Christ Jesus; what he, your elder brother, is now in glory, that will my love make you: the mountains shall depart, and the hills shall be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from you, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on you.

These are faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptation. O evil heart of unbelief! what pretence hast thou to reason against the truth of them? O ye of little faith! wherefore do ye doubt of receiving the goodness of them? Your Father is not a man, that he should lie; neither the Son of man, that he should alter his purpose. Hath he said, and shall he not do it? Or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? Yea, the purpose of his heart, spoken with his mouth, shall be made good with his arm: all his perfections stand engaged to establish his faithful word; and therefore it is a safe ground to build and rest upon. Trusting to it, the believer may boldly claim the promised blessings of his Father's love, and, with a hope that will never make him ashamed, he may expect a growing enjoyment of its free, covenant, and eternal blessings.

Well then, O my soul! thou hast considered the subject. What are thy sentiments of the love of the Father? Are they such as the scripture teaches? Take heed of error. A little mistake here will have dreadful effects upon thy walk. Dost thou believe that thou, coming to the Father through faith in the life and death of his coequal Son, art pardoned and justified before him, and that this thy coming to the Father through the Son is from the grace of the Spirit? Therefore, the Three that bear record in heaven do witness to thy being an object of covenant love. Does this witness keep thy conscience quiet, and thy heart happy? Canst thou plead it against guilt and fear, and maintain the influence of it in dark and trying times? The love of thy heavenly Father is immutable: dost thou experience it to be so? It is everlasting. Canst thou depend upon it as such? It has provided all blessings for thee in Jesus. Art thou receiving them out of his fulness, grace for grace? It is proposed to thy faith in John xvii. and in Eph. iii. as a never-failing spring of consolation. Read, and try whether thou art practically acquainted with what is there written. Examine the character of the Father's love; and, be assured, what is not agreeable to it, is not the teaching of the Holy Spirit. His office in thy soul is to witness to what he hath revealed in the scripture; to explain it to thine understanding; to make it the ground of thy faith, and the enjoyment of thy heart. Dost thou then understand, and believe, and enjoy the Father's love according to what the Holy Spirit has testified of it?

Perhaps thou art clear in thine understanding, but, through the weakness of thy faith, hast but little enjoyment of the love of God. Why is thy faith weak? Search into the cause (depend on it, God is not the cause), and having discovered it, inquire into the remedy. There is provision made in the covenant for all the infirmities of thy faith; for it was well ordered in all things and sure, and thy faith was well ordered and sure—infallible securities were provided in the covenant to make it sure. That thou shouldst have it, that thou shouldst keep it, and keep it too unto the end, the blessed Trinity have engaged by their immutable counsel and their immutable oath. Therefore thou art now kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. The power of God, which is thy keeper, has given thee faith, and keeps thy faith, that it fail not. Thou and it are well kept. A covenant God has the charge of both. Almighty love watches over thee; and underneath are the everlasting arms. Till these fail, thy faith cannot fail. Oh what powerful motives are these to induce thee to believe without wavering! Consider them carefully: and may the Lord render them the means of strengthening thy faith, and of thereby enabling thee to cleave more closely in love to thy heavenly Father!

It may be thou art hindered from living by unshaken faith, because thou hast so little love to God. He ought to have all thy heart and soul, and mind and strength; but it grieves thee to observe what a small part he has of them. This view is always humbling. Our love at best is not what it ought to be. It is not constant: it ebbs and flows. It is not perfect: the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit. It is not what God deserves, as payment for love received: who will compute the full value of his love to one redeemed sinner? On earth it surpasseth knowledge: in heaven it surpasseth all returns of praise. The highest love of glorified saints is only acknowledgment, but not payment. They are perfectly humble, and therefore willing that God should have all the glory of their salvation. To him they ascribe it. The same mind in thee would refine thy love, and make it something like theirs. When thou art considering thy love to God, and ashamed at the sight of it, then look at his. Look especially at his when thine is little. Believing views of his will increase thine. Thine has nothing else to excite it, or to nourish it. Thou art not called upon to warm thyself with the sparks of thy love to God, but with the pure constant flame of his love to thee. His is to keep up thine. His is the first cause, and thine is but the effect. The experience of his will heal all the infirmities of thine. When thy love is little, unsettled, cold, and dull, then study the divine properties of his: these rightly understood will increase, settle, warm, and actuate thine affections. By believing meditation thou wilt find a pardon provided for thy little love: the sense of it will comfort thy conscience. Thy heart will grow hot within thee: while thou art musing, the fire will kindle: it will break out. Thou wilt speak with thy tongue praise and thanksgiving to thy loving God and Father.

Thou art willing then, O my soul! and ready to set out to follow thy God. Under the influence of the Holy Spirit thou hast chosen him for thy portion, and in a constant dependence upon his grace thou hast taken his way for thy daily walk. How great is the love, wherewith he loveth thee! Survey it. Measure, if thou canst, the dimensions of it in thine own particular case. The more thou art acquainted with it, the readier wilt thou be to give him all the glory of it, and to make such acknowledgments as these:

I speak the truth in Christ; I lie not; my conscience bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost that, being justified by faith, I have found peace and free access to a reconciled God. We are agreed; and now I desire to walk with him. He is my Father in Jesus; and I know he has bowels of the tenderest affection for me. I ought not, it would be base in me, to question it, since he has shed his love abroad in my heart by the Holy Ghost; who has made me of one mind, of one heart, and of one way with himself. His way is become mine: for he has reconciled me to it by causing me to see that he chose me freely, as an object of his electing love; that he gave his Son to finish salvation work for me; and that he has now given his Spirit to me, who has called me, and given me ears to hear, who has bestowed on me faith and hope, and has enabled me to look upon these as fruits of the Father's covenant grace and everlasting favour. Oh what exceeding riches of love are these! If I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered. What am I, that I should be accepted in the beloved? His Father, mine. He sees me, loves me, yea blesses me in him. My title is clear to all spiritual blessings, because God, being my God in Jesus, all things are mine. He will make them all work together for my good. He that withheld not his own Son, but gave him for me, how shall he not with him freely give me all things? Having his free grant of them in the word of promise, and trusting to his faithfulness, I have set out to walk with my divine Friend and Father, hoping to enjoy his loving presence all the way to heaven. I would not aim at getting any new title to his love, but to have new enjoyment. Every day I am seeking for more knowledge, and for more experience of his abundant love to me in his beloved Son. And for this end I would walk close with him in his way—not to buy his love, it is inestimable—not to merit it, free grace and merit cannot stand together—not that I may deserve it for my walk, but may freely receive it of him in my walk—not that he may give it me for walking with him, but that in walking with him I may enjoy what he has already given me. His love is a free gift. I would by faith enjoy it in time, as I hope by sense to enjoy it in eternity. Whatever blessing, strength, victory, or comfort, I stand in need of, I look to the fulness which he has laid up in Jesus, and from thence I receive it. I read my title to it, and I take possession of it, for nothing done in me or by me, now or at any other time, but only in or for the free grace of his Father and my Father. While I can live thus by simple faith, I find I am enabled to go on well. The sense of his free, covenant, everlasting love, keeps my heart happy, and makes walking with him my delight. Oh that he may enable me to press forward, that I may hold my confidence, and the rejoicing of my hope steadfast unto the end! And why need I doubt of it, since he has me in his keeping? His love has bound itself to me by covenant engagements, which are my full security for what he has declared: "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

These desires, I am persuaded, are from thee, O Father of mercies! I could never have sought my happiness in thy love, unless thou hadst first loved me. Oh grant me then the desire of my heart! What thy good Spirit has put me upon seeking, let me by his grace find continually. He has manifested to me thy perfect reconciliation to thy people through the life and death of Jesus. It has been given me on his behalf to believe this. I have therefore taken thee for my God and my portion, and I would so walk with thee as to obtain a growing knowledge and experience of thy love. For this cause I bow my knees unto thee, holy Father. Oh, hear and answer the prayer of faith. Give me grace to walk with thee in love all the way to glory. I ask it in the name of Jesus; for thou art the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named: one Father, one family, one love. Thou receivest all thy children, whether in heaven or earth, into the same near relation, and embracest them with the same dear affection in thy beloved Son. Oh what a mercy is this! Blessed, for ever blessed be thy fatherly love, which chose me to be of thy family, and which has brought me to know that I am a child of God by faith in Christ Jesus. I thank thee for giving me the desire to live as such, and to walk worthy of my high calling. Oh grant me then, according to the riches of thy glory (out of thine infinite treasury of grace, and to the praise of the glory of thy grace) to be strengthened with might by thy Spirit in the inner man. He is the promise of the Father. All thy children have their new birth and every faculty of the new man from him; and by the working of his mighty power they are kept, as well as renewed, day by day: for without him they can do nothing. Of this he has thoroughly convinced me. I know I cannot call thee Father, nor believe in thee, nor love thee, but by thy Spirit.

O my God! strengthen me effectually by his grace in the inner man, for every purpose of spiritual life. Whatever he has engaged to do in thy children, let him do it in me, that through his presence and power Christ may dwell in my heart by faith. Oh let him continually discover to me mine interest in Christ, and open to me the exceeding riches of thy love in him. Holy Father, let thy good Spirit abide with me, that I may know for certain Christ is one with me, and I am one with him, and may thereby be able to maintain constant fellowship with him—he dwelling in me, and I in him. Oh may I thus live continually by the faith of the Son of God, depending always for acceptance with thee upon his atonement and his righteousness, and so may find the happy fruit of his prayer to thee—"O righteous Father! I have declared to my disciples thy name, and will declare it, that the love, wherewith thou lovest me, may be in them, and I in them." Thou didst hear; thou hast answered, times out of number, the request of thy beloved Son. Lord God, answer it to me. Let me rejoice in thy love, and find it to be the same to me, as to him. Let thy good Spirit root me and ground me in the knowledge of thy love to me in Jesus. Oh, grant me to be deeply rooted in the experience of it, that my faith, working by love, may bring forth much fruit to thy glory, and I may become so grounded in love, as to stand unshaken, like a house built upon a rock, against every attack made upon thy love to me. O my God and Father! my heart is naked and open to thee. Thou knowest the secrets of it. Thou seest how fervently I pray for the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit. My prayer comes from a feeling sense of my want of him, and from a dependence on thy promise to give the Spirit to them that ask him. Lord, I ask. Grant me to be strengthened by him with every needful gift and grace in the inner man. Send him to manifest plainer and plainer my union with Jesus, in order to my keeping up communion with him; that, having him dwelling in my heart by faith, I may be so established in the experience of thy love to me in him, as to be able to comprehend, with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height of thy love. All the saints comprehend it; but the saints below less than they above: and some of them below comprehend more than others. I know but little: O my God! increase my knowledge of thy love in Jesus. Whereunto I have attained, establish me; and keep me pressing forward for clearer discoveries of it. Help me to survey it, so far as faith is able, in its most glorious dimensions, and to praise thee for mine experience of its rich mercies. Holy Father, teach me still more by thy Spirit of the boundless freeness, and of the endless fulness of thy love—let me know thy love in Christ, which passeth knowledge. Although I cannot know it, as it is, my limited understanding being incapable of measuring the infinity of thy love, yet, for this very reason, let me be daily studying to know more of it—growing up into Christ Jesus by faith—abounding in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost—and increasing in the love of God. Holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity! let me thus partake of the fulness of grace below, grace for grace, till I partake of the fulness of glory above—that I may be filled with all the fulness which is of God, with which thou hast promised to fill thy children in earth and heaven. Oh magnify thy love towards me according to its greatness, and not according to my deserts, or to my prayers. I know thou canst do exceeding abundantly above all that I can ask or think, according to the power that worketh effectually in me. Thy power, engaged to act for me, is the support of my faith, and mine encouragement in my prayer. It is an infinite and almighty power, which has graciously begun, and has hitherto prosperously carried on, the good work in my soul. To it all things are possible. Lord forbid I should doubt of thy granting the petitions, which I have been offering up unto thee in thy Son's name. That which thou hast promised, thou art able to perform. O my God and Father! set thy power to work more effectually in me. Let the Spirit of might enlarge my thoughts of, and my faith in, thy precious love. Let me experience daily how much more thou art able to do than I have yet obtained; to give, than I have yet asked; to increase, than I have yet thought. And whatever increase thou givest, may it draw out mine affections in greater love to thee, and to thy ways, and so be the means of bringing more glory to thee. For thy love in Jesus the whole family, in heaven and earth, is ascribing honour and praise. Accept my thanks, holy Father, together with theirs. To thee be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

CHAPTER IV.

The believer goes on successfully while he walks by faith in a constant dependence upon his reconciled God and loving Father.

THE leading principle upon which he sets out is this: God is my God and Father. He is perfectly reconciled unto me; and my conscience is at peace with him through faith in his beloved Son. He loves me in him: he has manifested it plainly to me; and now my heart would cleave to him as my most tender parent. I would rest in my love to him, as he rests in his love to me. It is entirely through the grace of the eternal Spirit that I have been enabled thus to believe in the finished work of Jesus, and to experience the Father's love in him: by which means I have been satisfied of the love of the ever-blessed Trinity to my soul. Father, Son, and Spirit, have covenanted to make me an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ. From my belief and experience of these truths I have been enabled to choose God for my portion. His will is become mine. His appointed way is my course. And now I desire so to walk with him as to maintain in my conscience the peace of God, and in my heart the love of God. I do not expect any new title to those inestimable graces: my claim is good and valid under Christ. I would not disparage it by supposing that my close walk with God was to make any atonement for my sins, or to be the least part of my justifying righteousness: I have these already, and perfectly too in Jesus. The enjoyment of them is the thing I want. I am seeking for more of that peace with, and love to, the Father, to which I am entitled in his Son. His fulness, the fulness of him that filleth all in all, is mine. A free grant of it has passed in the court of heaven, has been revealed in the record of truth, and I, by believing, have accepted the grant. I am in possession of its privileges, and am enjoying its blessings. On the fulness of Jesus I live this day. Out of it I hope to be receiving every grace, which I shall want for my safe and happy walk, with his Father and my Father. Bless the Lord, O my soul! for what thou knowest and hast experienced of his abundant grace; which has enabled thee thus to resolve to walk with thy reconciled God and loving Father. This day thou art called upon to maintain peace with him in thy conscience, and love to him in thy heart; peace like his, flowing from the sense of being perfectly reconciled to thee—love like his, the happy fruit of his unchangeable love to thee. Whatever thou meetest with in thy work or warfare, ought not to lessen, but exercise and improve those graces. Never forget that he is thy God—the God of peace. He stands related to thee in the dearest and most indissoluble bond of love. He is thy Father in Jesus. Keep the sense of this always fresh upon thy mind, and thy steps will be ordered aright. Nothing will be able to stop thee in the way to heaven, or to seduce thee out of it; but every thing will bring thee forward. Whilst thou canst maintain peace and love, thou wilt go on prosperously against guilt and self-righteousness, against the wiles and assaults of thy spiritual foes, against the world which lieth in wickedness, and against every inward and outward trial. The Lord being on thy side, all these shall work together under him for thy good; and they shall be the means of making thee walk safely in the way, and of bringing thee happily to the end of it. The apostle has given us the whole plan in a few words—"WE WALK," says he, "BY FAITH, and not by sight." We direct our christian course by believing, and not by seeing. Faith is to us the evidence of things not seen, and the ground of our hoping to enjoy them We believe, upon the authority of God's word, that they are what he describes them to be; for faith, as a grace of the Spirit, consists in giving credit to what God says. If it be a truth proposed to the understanding, faith relies upon the infallible word: if it be a promise, faith depends upon the arm of God to make it good. And whatever he has promised faith (when it is as it should be) does not stagger at difficulties, but rests fully persuaded that what God hath promised he is able also to perform. Faith looks at the word spoken, and overlooks seeming impossibilities: THUS SAITH THE LORD—that is enough for faith—full of satisfying evidence: for it knows, that to speak and to do are the same thing with an unchangeable God.

How many errors in judgment, and consequent mistakes in practice, prevail at this day, chiefly arising from confounding faith with its fruits; and from our distinguishing between the word of God believed and what will follow upon believing it aright. Thus, some make assurance to be of the essence of faith, others make appropriation, and many make it consist in an impression upon the mind that Christ loved me, and gave himself for me. These are fruits: what faith should produce, but not what it is. These are effects of faith working, and not definitions of the nature of faith. A believer should be exhorted to make his calling and election sure; for it is his privilege. He ought to give all diligence to attain assurance, to appropriate Christ with all his blessings to himself, and to be clearly persuaded that Christ loved him and gave himself for him. These are blessed fruits of believing. May God give his people more of them! But then the tree must be before the fruits, and the fruits grow upon the tree. Faith is first; and faith derives its being from believing the word of God; and all its fruits are continued acts of believing. And when you hear of believing, do you not always think of something spoken? You cannot separate these two in your mind. Something has been said and proposed to you before your belief can be called for. If nothing has been said, belief has no exercise. Faith and the word of God therefore are related, as the effect and the cause; because faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. What God hath spoken in his word demands belief from all that hear it. When faith cometh by hearing it, then we assent to the truth of what God has said, and we rely upon his faithfulness to make good what he has promised. Assurance is this faith grown to its full stature; but we are not born six feet high. Appropriation is a very comfortable acting of faith, when a man is persuaded of his interest in covenant mercies, and, from what he then feels, can say, Christ loved me and gave himself for me; but he has not this comfort in times of heaviness; he may be walking in darkness and having no light, yea in the hidings of the Lord's countenance; and yet, even then, he may trust simply to what God hath spoken; which is true faith, and more exalted faith, than that which draws its evidence from its appropriating acts and its present experience: the more a man trusts to sense, the less he lives by faith; for sensible feelings are not faith. Impressions are not believing. I see the sun; I hear a sound; I feel an object: faith has no place in these instances. Its essence is believing and trusting what God hath spoken. If his word be believed, and by believing the conscience find peace, and the heart joy; these are joy and peace IN believing: they come from believing; are its effects; and no more enter into the essence of faith than comfortable feelings do into the essence of man. He is as truly a man, when miserable, as he is when comfortable.

These mistakes should be carefully guarded against, because they are chiefly pernicious to the children of God; who are kept by them from growing up into assurance, into appropriation, and into the sensible experience of God's love to them in Christ Jesus. They are puzzled—they are misled, by being told they have no faith, if they have no assurance, &c. They examine themselves, but cannot find any such faith. This discourages them. They are tempted to think they have no true faith, because they have not what certain persons talk of. But if they would adhere strictly to the word of God, and would take their ideas from it, they would see how simple and plain a thing believing is, and would soon be satisfied that they were true believers: which conviction would have many blessed effects, especially these—it would put them upon seeking for an increase of faith, and upon expecting the proper fruits of faith. What nourishes faith, ripens them; for they cannot be produced so long as persons are doubting whether they have any faith at all. They would see how desirable it is to believe, without doubt or wavering; what honour it puts upon God's word, what comfort it brings to them: and they would be waiting in the appointed means for grace to maintain, for grace to improve their faith, that they may be going on from faith to faith. While this was their end and aim, faith in act and exercise, maintained and improved, would bring in daily growing evidence of their being indeed partakers of the faith of God's elect. Living by faith, walking by faith, would demonstrate to them their spiritual life and walk, as plainly as natural life and walk can be demonstrated by any outward actions.

Here is great need, O my soul! to read the scripture, and to pray for the Spirit of wisdom. Read; pray much; lest thou shouldst err concerning the faith. Every error will be a stumbling-block in the way of thy holy walk, and make thee tired of it, or seduce thee out of it. Let it be one of thy daily petitions —Lord, save me from all mistakes concerning the faith of the Gospel; and let the word of God, by which faith cometh and groweth, be thy daily study. This is thy present business. Now set out, trusting to what God hath spoken, and relying on what he hath promised. On this principle proceed, as it is laid down by the apostle, Col. ii. 6. "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." He is expressing his joy at his beholding their order, and the steadfastness of their faith in Christ, and he would teach them how to maintain their faith throughout their Christian course. How did you receive Christ at first? Was it not by believing? Receiving Christ and believing in him, are, in John i. 12, supposed to mean the same thing, And in John xvii. 20, 21, our Lord says, that they who believe in him through the word are one with him. Christ, then, is received by faith; and by the same faith, by the belief of the same word of God, we walk in him, so as to be rooted and grounded and established in the faith. Our walk is in him, not any thing distinct from him, but is the effect of union with him. By him we live, in him we walk—rooted in him, we grow as a branch in the vine—built up in him, we are fixed as a building on a sure foundation, and thereby we become established and strengthened in the faith. Every step we take is by faith, by the same faith, wherewith Christ was received.

He must be received always as he was received once. There is no change of object, and there must be no change of faith, but the same continued trust on his word, and the same dependence on his promised strength. We never set out to walk with a reconciled God till we are one with Christ by faith, and know our union with him; and our walk is in consequence of this. If we go on at all, it is by communion with him. We can receive only out of his fulness grace for grace, to make us willing and able to go forward. Our fellowship with him is in every part and in every moment of our walk; and this is as necessary as our fellowship with the air and elements of this world is to every thing that concerns our natural walk. Our wisdom to guide our steps, our progress in the way, our courage and strength, our warfare and victory, every grace and every blessing, is received by faith, and is the effect of our communion with Jehovah Jesus. We trust in his word, we rely on his arm, we wait on his faithfulness, and so go forward: for he makes good what he had promised to give us in our walk, which confirms the peace of God, establishes our heart in the love of God, increases our faith, and thereby makes our daily walk more comfortable to us, and more glorious to him.

But if faith consist in believing and trusting the word of God, it may be required, How shall we know the difference between true and false, between dead and living faith? It may be known from the cause. The fruit of the Spirit is faith. He produces it. It is his gift, bestowed by his operation, continued by his power, increased by his blessing, and carried on to the end, by his never leaving nor forsaking his own work. And he makes it known to be his. He gives eyes to see it, and hearts to acknowledge it. Therefore the apostle says of them who have received the Spirit of God, that they KNOW the things which are freely given to them of God: by faith they both know the reality, and also taste the sweetness of those free gifts of free grace.

It may be known from the effects. Dead faith brings forth nothing. Living faith is fruitful. It produces a hearty trust in the truth of what God hath spoken, and a quiet reliance on the faithfulness of what God hath promised. It gives him credit for the finished salvation of his Son, and puts honour upon his record concerning it; whereby peace is received into the conscience, and love into the heart. Upon which there follows a settled dependence upon this reconciled God and loving Father, for the fulfilling of every promise; and this is improved by daily experience. He that trusteth in the Lord is never confounded. God is faithful His promises cannot fail. Blessed is the man that trusteth in him. The Lord God will be a sun and shield unto him; the Lord will give him grace and glory.

As for the hypocrites, it is not so with them. The Holy Spirit was not the author of their faith. It was a fancy of their own, formed in their heads without any warrant from God. There was no life in it, and no living effects from it. There was the form, and nothing more. They made a profession, but never came to any enjoyment. They had no vital union, and therefore they could not have any real communion with Christ. They could not, as the apostle expresses it, walk IN him, and therefore in the hour of temptation they fell away, and came to nothing. Take heed then, O my soul, of mistakes. Examine carefully of what sort thy faith is. Bring it to the standard of scripture; and see what went before believing; see whether thou dost now from thy heart believe what God hath spoken: wait for the effects. Dost thou so trust his word as to take him for thy God and thy portion? Art thou walking with him? and art thou depending on him to bestow the promised graces and blessings on thee in thy walk? If this be thine experience, thou art set out well: go on. Remember where every thing relating to thy walk is to be had. The Father's love has laid it all up in the Son's fulness; and it is the office of the Holy Spirit to teach thee how to receive out of it grace for grace. He teaches by his word. With this in thy hand, and his light in thine understanding, read and study what he has promised thee for thy safe, happy, and holy walk. Take no step without the direction of his word, and expect at every step that he will make good to thee what he has promised. Thou wilt very soon find the necessity of this dependence upon him; for, ere thou hast well begun thy walk, thou wilt be called upon to exercise thy faith and put it to trial. Thou wilt meet with many things in thee averse to this holy walk, and many more to distress thee in it. The body of sin, the old man, the flesh, with its affections and lusts, are still in thee. It is of their nature to be lusting, and to be always putting forth some of their filthy motions, in order to draw thee to walk after the flesh, and not after the Spirit. The tempter helps them all he can. He knows how to improve them to his own interest; and, from what is passing within thee, there be a sight and sense of sin that, if he can get thee to look at it in his view, he will act upon thy legal and self-righteous tempers, and will inject such vile insinuations as these against the Lord and against his Christ:

How is it I am yet the subject of sin? It is still in me. It cleaves to me, as the flesh to my bones; and it mixes so with my duties, that I cannot perform them without it. I sometimes fear I am nothing but sin. When I attempt to walk with God, ere I set out something evil arises within me, and stops me. Some proud unbelieving thought, some sensual affection, some worldly disposition, some corruption or other, is ever at hand to hinder my course. What, then, must I think of myself? I scarce know what. Things, I see, do not grow better. I have been long hoping for it; but I find there still dwelleth no good thing in me: so that I am almost ready to question the truth of my grace, and it is with great difficulty I can keep up any peace in my conscience.

When the believer is attacked in this manner (and who is not at some time or other), how is he to defend himself? Will his skilfulness in the word of righteousness and his faith in the word of reconciliation keep him safe in the hour of temptation? Yea. By the grace of the Holy Spirit the lessons before learnt will be enforced, and brought into use. This is the time to maintain faith in the atonement, and in the righteousness of the God-man. Now it is to be tried in the fire; and it is put to the trial, that it may come out of it, like gold, proved to be sterling metal, and refined from its dross—better in every respect for having gone through the fire. The trial of faith is far more precious than that of gold which perisheth. It is therefore put into the furnace, that the believer may know the truth of it, and may experience the blessings of it. Faith conflicting with unbelief is a good fight—sometimes sharp, but always profitable. The flesh may be weak and ready to yield; faith may be hard put to it; but victory is certain. During the battle, the warrior is invincible in the whole armour of God. He takes to him the shield of faith, and holds it up against the fiery darts of Satan. He draws out the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and with it he defeats Satan. He consults or remembers a scripture suitable to his present case, and this, being set home by the Holy Spirit, puts an end to the engagement, and restores and settles sweet peace in the conscience. How often has he applied the following passage, which the Lord speaks concerning his true Israelites, Jer. xxxii. 38, 39, 40, 41? "They SHALL be my people, and I WILL be their God; and I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear me FOR EVER, for the good of them, and of their children after them; and I will make an everlasting covenant for them, that I will not turn away from them to do them good; but I will put my fear into their hearts, that they shall not depart from me; yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good."

What strong consolation is there in this scripture! Every sentence has an argument in it, tending to establish peace with God, and to maintain it in the midst of war. How quieting and satisfying to the troubled conscience in his covenant purpose! "They SHALL be my people, and I WILL be their God." They shall, because I will. My will shall make them willing. And in the day of my power, when my purpose takes place, I will give them one heart, turned to myself, and one way, to walk with me by faith, as obedient children with their loving Father. This I will do for them that they may fear me FOR EVER, that the fear of offending me may rule always and by all means in their hearts.

Oh, what promises are these! What can weak faith require farther to silence its doubts? How great is the goodness of God to his children, who, knowing their frame, and whereof they are made, for the good of them and of their children after them, has laid such a foundation for their faith, that they may build on it, and not be afraid! yea, standing on it they may fight the good fight of faith, assured of victory.

I will make, says their God, an everlasting covenant for them; a covenant ordered in all things and sure, by the counsel and oath of the blessed Trinity, the two immutable things, in which it is impossible God should lie: The mountains shall depart and the hills shall be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from them; neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on them. My covenant was made for them, and shall be made good to them. As I live, saith the Lord, I will not turn away from them to do them good. I will never change my purpose, nor alter the word that is gone out of my mouth. I mean nothing but good to them. My heart is fixed upon it. And I will not leave the event to them. They shall not have the management of my purposes, nor have any power to defeat them. My will to do them good shall not depend on their will, or on their faithfulness, or on any thing in themselves. I have taken all their concerns into mine own hands, and I will conduct them all to the praise of the glory of mine own grace. I will put my fear into their hearts, that they shall not depart from me—they SHALL not depart from me. They are not the cause of their not departing, but I am. I have taken it upon myself. I will give them grace to walk close with me, and to fear me always. I have covenanted for all, the means as well as the end, and I will keep them by my almighty power till they receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls. "Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good." This confirms all the rest. His purpose of doing them good, his executing it, his continuing it, his increasing it through time and through eternity, is a matter of rejoicing to the Lord God. He delights in it. It always was and always will be the joy of his heart, his crown and glory. He will not, he cannot be deprived of his joy. Consider this, thou poor distressed soul, who art in heaviness through manifold temptations, and ready to faint through the weakness of thy faith. Take courage. Thy salvation is safe. Thy Father, who is in heaven, rejoices in it; he will save; he will rejoice over thee with joy; he will rest in his love; he will joy over thee with singing. And his joy, too, shall be thine. As sure as God is in Zion, thou shalt return and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon thy head; thou shalt obtain joy and gladness; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away for ever.

Oh what a discovery is here of the ever-loving heart of our heavenly Father! What more could he promise in order to put an end to all strife in the consciences of his afflicted children! He has engaged in a covenant of peace to do good, nothing but good, to them. He has undertaken the whole of the covenant—what was to be done in them, as well as for them—to work out, to apply, and to secure their salvation. It is his unchangeable purpose, not to depart from them, and not to suffer them to depart from him, but he will rejoice in doing them good, and that for ever. This scripture, when understood and applied by the Holy Spirit, is received as full evidence of the unchangeable love of God to his children, and then it quiets their troubled minds. They can believe God to be their God still in an unchangeable covenant, and they become satisfied that he has made them, and will keep them his people for ever. When they can thus mix faith with the promise, it then becomes the means of their resting on the faithful arm of God in the hour of temptation, and of their finding him still a God of peace: whereby peace is established in their consciences, and multiplied in their hearts. They learn to put more trust in him, as their perfectly reconciled Father, and to approach him with more holy filial confidence. The trial of their faith, sharp as it was, yet has done them great good. It has proved their peace, and has confirmed it. They know now well that it is the peace of God; and they have been taught how to maintain it. War makes good soldiers. The trials of their grace are for the improvement of grace. Their peace has been therefore shaken, like a new planted tree, that it may take deeper and faster root. Being thus strengthened in the faith, and having the peace of God ruling in their hearts, they can meditate upon this scripture, and turn it into a subject of prayer and praise.

O gracious God and Father! pardon my thoughts of thy love to me in Jesus. I was tempted, and ready to give way to unbelief; but the gracious provision made in thy word was the means of keeping me in the hour of temptation. O my God! make the word, in which thou hast caused me to put my trust, more precious to my soul. Open still more to me the fulness of it, and put me into happier possession of its promised blessings. I praise thee, I worship thee, for revealing this promise by thy Spirit, and for applying it by his grace with comfort to my heart. I now set to my seal, that it is true. It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. Glory be to thee that I accept it, and enjoy the good promised in it! O Father of mercies, what am I that I should be made one of thy people, and should have thee for my God? This love passeth knowledge. Oh help me to understand more, give me to find more, of thy covenant love. Make my heart one with thee. Lead me in thy one way, that I may fear thee for ever. And when temptations come, such as I have been in, grant they may bring me nearer to thee, and may be the means of my making use of what thou hast provided for me in thy Son's fulness. Oh let thy good Spirit abide with me to establish my faith in thine everlasting covenant, that I may believe thou wilt never turn from me to do me good. Merciful God grant me this grace in every hour of need. Thou hast given me thy word for it; and therein thou hast enabled me to put my trust. On thy faithful promise I would depend, and on nothing in myself. Thou hast shown me something of my heart, and I feel it is revolting and ready always to rebel against God; but thou hast undertaken to put thy fear into it, that it shall not depart from thee: therefore into thy faithful hands I commit it. Keep me, my God, by thy mighty power through faith unto salvation. Amen, Amen.

Happy trials! which have so good an issue, and bring forth such peaceable fruits. My brethren, account it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations, if they lead to the exercise of grace, and occasion fervent, effectual prayer. The believer, thus tried, learns by practice the necessity of being at peace with God, and of maintaining it, in order to walk with God. He is put upon studying the nature of this peace. He reads and meditates upon the revealed account of it. He sees it is a perfect, unchangeable peace, secured to him by the everlasting covenant of the blessed Trinity, who have engaged to save him from all his sins and miseries, and never to turn away from doing him good. To this he trusts. He commits himself to the care of this covenant God; and he finds the promise true. In temptation he believes, and is delivered. In his warfare, out of weakness he is made strong. He fights the good fight of faith, and he conquers all his enemies. He learns from trials to trust with more confidence. He not only maintains, but improves, peace with God. He depends on what God has promised to them who walk with him, and the promise is made good, and he learns to go on more comfortably, and daily walks closer with his heavenly Father.

The enemy looks on him with malice. He envies his state. He once knew the heaven of communion with God; but he was lifted up with pride, and fell. It stirs up every infernal temper within him to see the happy believer who had fallen, like him, restored to what he can never expect. Hence, either as a sly serpent, or as a roaring lion, he never ceases to tempt. As soon as one wile fails, he has another ready. He is, night and day, plotting and scheming, waiting for an opportunity to make a seasonable attack. While conscience is at peace with God, and lives under the protection of the blood of sprinkling, he tempts in vain: but he does not despair of success. He knows he has an ally within us in fast league with sin, and therefore he still hopes to draw him into sin by surprise or assault; in which he is indefatigable. He is never tired. He is always tempting the believer, not so much to gross offences, as to spiritual wickedness. Sly injections, legal insinuations, and self-righteous thoughts, are his most common temptations. With these he tries to shake the peace of conscience; and he forms his attack generally in this manner:

How can you be a child of God, and yet be as you are? There is nothing in you for which God should look upon you and love you. What have you? What ceasing from evil, what learning to do well, to recommend you to him? How can God love any thing, unless it be agreeable to his will? and what can he delight in, unless it be conformable to his image? But do you live up to his will? and is his image perfectly renewed in you? Have you grace, and do you live up to it? Are you a Christian, and are you like Christ? How are your duties? Just as they should be? You know they are not; and how can God be pleased with them, when you are not pleased with them yourself? How is your walk? Is it such as becometh your high calling—close with God, and at a vast distance from sin, and the world? How is your warfare? Is the whole armour of God kept buckled on? And are you always, in the strength of the Lord, a conqueror? Examine, and try yourself. Bring forth that one good thing for which God should love you and bestow his blessing upon you. You have no such thing. You have nothing to merit, yea, nothing to recommend you to the divine favour: and therefore, is it not great presumption to fancy that God will love such a one as you, whose just desert is wrath and everlasting destruction?

These are some of the depths of Satan. He knows how strongly we are by nature attached to the covenant of works, and that, if he can get the believer to look off from Jesus, expecting to see something in himself, for which God should love him, he shall then weaken his faith and shake his peace. In this snare he has caught many a child of God. The temptation is suitable to the workings of our legal minds: it flatters our self-righteous hopes: and is vastly pleasing to the pride of our carnal hearts. No wonder, then, so long as there is flesh in us as well as spirit, this artful suggestion should be sometimes received in this manner:—Have I any thing for which God should esteem me and bless me? I wish I could discover some amiable temper, or some praiseworthy deed, which might recommend me to the particular regard of God. Indeed, at present I have not any such; but I hope to attain it some time or other. If I do but use more diligence and watchfulness, and wait more constantly in the means of grace, perhaps I may attain it soon. However, there can be no harm in trying. I will exert myself: and I hope the day will come, when I shall be some way deserving of the divine favour.

his subtilty, so is this man's mind corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. The subtile serpent has attacked the liberty of the child of God and has darkened his understanding, and obscured his view of gospel grace. His eye is not now single: his heart is not now simple, in the finished salvation. He has been deceived into a legal dependence, and is giving way to a spirit of bondage. If he were left to himself, the enemy would lead him captive at his will. Satan desires to have him, that he may sift him as wheat; but he is not suffered to blow any thing away, except a little chaff: for the Holy Spirit, in whose keeping he is, discovers and defeats the attempts of Satan. He brings to his mind, and enables him to make use of, what he before knew of the doctrine of grace. The present trial requires the practice, and affords occasion for the improvement of, his former lessons. He had learnt from scripture truths very different from the suggestions to which he was ready to yield. He was therein taught that the Father's love to his children does not suppose merit in them. Grace does not follow works; for then grace would be no more grace. Election is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God, who showeth mercy. For we are saved freely by grace through faith, and that not of ourselves; it is the gift of God. The election of grace is from mere love and sovereign favour, and has no motives to influence it but the good pleasure of the divine will. The objects of it are not the worthy, but the unworthy—not innocent, but fallen man—sinners, as such, no way conditioned or qualified—the lost, the helpless, the ungodly—yea the chief of sinners—open enemies and rebels against God. They are not saved by works of righteousness, which they have done or can do, lest any of them should boast: for boasting is absolutely excluded. Salvation was so contrived, was so wrought out, and is so applied, that he who glorieth shall have nothing left him to glory in but the Lord. No flesh can glory in his presence; for of him, and through him, and to him are all things; to whom be glory for ever. Amen.

So soon as the spirit of God opens this view of the exceeding riches of divine grace, the believer sees his mistake. He finds that he was departing from the simplicity of the gospel by supposing that the love of God followed merit, and that he should be loved more according as his walk recommended him. His eyes are opened. The delusion vanishes. The perfect freeness and the absolute sovereignty of the Father's love, as revealed in scripture, is manifested to him. He reads, and mixes faith with what he reads, and so recovers himself out of the snare of the devil. Some such passage as this is made the means of his deliverance, Psal. ciii. 17: "The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him." Precious words! full of rich consolation to those who have been tempted to seek some qualifications in themselves, on account of which they might be entitled to the love of God, and who have been distressed upon their not finding it. The holy Spirit teaches such persons to look out of themselves to an object exactly suitable to their case. He directs them to the divine mercy—a never failing spring of comfort—to that mercy which reacheth from eternity to eternity; and which confers its richest favours, not for the worthiness of the receiver, but to the praise of the grace of the giver. Here he would have them fix their eyes, and expect relief to their hearts. Out of the fulness of mercy they may always receive grace for grace; for the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him. Every word is weighty. Meditate upon it, O my soul! and may the consideration of each lead thee to exalt that mercy of God which is over all his works.

JEHOVAH is the word here rendered Lord. It is the incommunicable name, expressive of the incommunicable nature of the Godhead. It signifies the peculiar manner of the divine existence, which is in, and of itself, underived, and independent. Oh how happy is it for thee that there is mercy in the self-existent Godhead, and that every perfection in it will be for ever exalted, even justice itself, for the exercise of mercy! May the Holy Spirit teach thee more of its nature, and make thee daily more acquainted in thine experience with its free grace and free gifts!

MERCY is that perfection in Jehovah which disposes him to save miserable sinners; not a blind mercy, such as infidels dream of—but consistent with the honour of his law, and exercised to the glory of his holy precept and of its just sanctions: therefore mercy and truth are so often mentioned together in scripture. God will not show any mercy to sinners but such as tends to establish his truth. Not one of his words can be broken, nor can one tittle of them ever fail. He will be justified in all his sayings, and clear when he is judged. He will be true and just, whenever he is merciful; his mercies being all covenant-mercies, and all given in and through Christ Jesus. All men are by nature children of wrath, and only they who are chosen and called in Christ Jesus are saved from wrath. These are vessels of mercy. His mercy is to them the love of a tender parent to his miserable children. He pities them, and determines to save them from their sins; in due time he quickens them, gives them eyes to see, and hearts to believe his love to them in Jesus, as the apostle witnesses—"God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ."

But for what reason, and upon what account, is he merciful to them? His mercy has no motive but his own will. The objects of his mercy are corrupt, fallen creatures, deserving his wrath, even as others; and therefore he does not deal with them upon the footing of desert. If he showed them mercy for any foreseen works of theirs, because he knew they would repent and believe the gospel, and walk worthy of it, mercy would then be turned into justice, and would lose both its name and its nature: whereas he saith unto Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. It is from mine own freedom and sovereignty that I have mercy on any sinners. The cause is in myself, and not in them. I have compassion on whom I will. It is from mine own mere love that I have determined to be gracious to them; and my love has determined to save them, and the way also in which I will save them. I have appointed the end and the means at the same time. Of mine own motion and good will I have resolved to give my Son for them, and my spirit to them, that they may repent and believe the gospel, and walk worthy of it; and so I may bring them through my tender mercies' to eternal salvation. If this was not the case, how could the description be true, that mercy IS FROM EVERLASTING TO EVERLASTING? The mercy of God knows no variableness nor shadow of turning. It is always the same. His fatherly heart has entertained thoughts of mercy towards them: for when he shows them mercy, it is said to be according to the eternal purpose, which he had purposed in Christ Jesus—not for their merits, but for his mercies' sake—not for what they have any claim to—but for his own name's sake. He gives all for mercy; and he would have all the glory returned to the mercy of the giver. What he gives, that he continues, and according to covenant engagements. Covenant mercies are sure mercies. "I will make an everlasting covenant for you, says he, even the sure mercies of the beloved." They have already been made sure to him. He is now in full possession of every promised mercy. And he has received them, not as a private person, but as the head of the body, the church. He keeps them for the use of his church members: and, as sure as the crown is upon his head, so surely will it be upon every one of their heads; for they are in the same covenant with him whose sure mercies reach from eternity to eternity. Oh what a view is here open to the eye of faith! Mercy always purposing, and in due time bestowing its free blessings upon sinners—mercy, without beginning, and without ending. The Holy Spirit often calls upon us to behold it in this light; for he has not celebrated any of its divine properties so much as this. It is frequently the noble subject of thanksgiving in the Psalmist's hymns. He has dedicated the 136th entirely to the praise of mercy; and, going through the works of nature, providence, and grace, he ascribes them, one by one, to that mercy which endureth for ever. O happy, thrice happy objects of it! What was in the heart of the Father of mercies towards you from everlasting, will be so to everlasting. His sure mercies are yours. His compassions towards you fail not. Whatever you want for your successful walk he has promised to give you. Be not discouraged then. He will supply all your wants, not for your sakes, but for his mercies' sake. Are you sensible of your unworthiness? That's well. Mercy is for such. It can have no glory, but from such as you. Trust it, and be assured you will find that it endureth for ever and ever.

If a doubt should arise in your mind—It is true, mercy in God cannot fail, but the exercise of it towards me may fail: I may so walk as to deprive myself of all claim and title to it. The Psalmist has given a direct answer to this ill-grounded suspicion. He says, The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting

Upon them that fear him. This is their character: they fear their God. Once there was no fear of God before their eyes; but now they know him to be their Father. The Spirit of adoption has given them joy and peace in believing it. Hence a holy filial fear rules in their hearts, and influences their walk. While it operates thus, and, as obedient children, they fear to offend their loving Father, and desire to please him in all things, what ground have they to suspect that his mercy towards them should fail?

But may they not cease to fear him, and then he will cease to be merciful to them? No; blessed be God! He has made ample provision in this case: "I will put my fear," says he, "into their hearts, and they shall not depart from me." This fear is one of the fruits of the Spirit which he produces in all the children of God: and they have it from him as a covenant blessing, which is full security for its continuance. It is one of the graces provided for them in Jesus by the Father's immutable love. "I will give them," says he, "one heart, and one way, that they may fear me for ever." The Holy Spirit is the guardian of this never-failing fear. It is his office to put it, and then to keep it, in their hearts. He has the whole charge of it; and therefore he has promised to abide with them for ever, that they may fear the Lord all the days of their lives.

How exactly suited is this scripture to the case of the tempted Christian! What a full provision is there made in it for his safety and peace! God has mercy for him, and plenteous redemption—mercy reaching from everlasting to everlasting—always kind to the miserable. Mercy and misery are related as sin and salvation. There is not any thing, which a sinner can want, but mercy has a supply for him—a promised, a covenant, a never-failing supply. It is a Father's mercy, which will never leave his children, and the same mercy will not suffer them to leave him. His mind is fixed upon showing them mercy for ever and ever: and therefore he gives them his Spirit to abide with them, and to dwell in them. He abides with them, and they live: he dwells in them, and they walk in the fear of God. And by the supply of the Spirit they go on till they finish their course with joy.

By meditating upon this scripture the believer is set at liberty. Though his faith staggered a little, yet the trial of it has done him good. He has learned a useful lesson, and gained much experience by it. His reflections upon what has passed in his mind are such as these:

Oh how foolish was I to forget the atonement and righteousness of my dearest Immanuel, in whom alone I have pardon and acceptance! How base was I, and ungrateful! I was tempted to expect that in myself which I can have only in him. Vile legal creature that I am! I abhor myself for behaving so ill to my best friend. What good can I have, but what I first receive from him? I agree with the apostle, that in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing. I am a very sink of sin and of all uncleanness. I deserve mercy no more than the devil does: and yet I was looking out for some good quality in myself, on account of which God might be merciful to me: whereas I am now satisfied he has no mercy but in Jesus. All his mercies are covenant mercies; given from mere grace, and given to miserable sinners—not to make them self-admirers, but to humble them—not to lead them to think that they can bring God in debt to them for his own gifts, or for the right use of them, which is a fresh gift—but he gives all to the praise of the glory of his grace. He delighteth in mercy; and my case required mercy. It was such as his mercy could get all the honour of relieving. Therefore I ought in the hour of temptation to have trusted in his mercy, to have hoped in his mercy in time of trouble, and to have loved him for his mercy in time of misery. Here should my faith have directed its eye, and not to any good which I have done, or can do. I should have remembered, how it was with the election of grace, and with the vessels of mercy. God has one way of dealing with them all. Not by works of righteousness which they have done, but according to his mercy he saveth them, freely, fully, eternally. All is from his own good will from first to last. Every motive, which inclines him to do good to any sinner, is not excited by what the sinner does or is, but arises from himself. And when he bestows any good, it never is deserved, but is entirely an act of sovereign grace, flowing from the Father's love, out of the Son's fulness, by the influence of the Holy Spirit; and is given and continued to magnify and exalt the mercy of the eternal Three. Oh, how did I dishonour the divine perfections by giving way to legal hopes, and by supposing that the divine will would be governed by my more or less deservings? Where should I be, if I had my deservings? God forgive me. I see mine error. I am humbled for it, and I repent with shame and sorrow. I hope my past misconduct will prove a blessing to me: for it has certainly taught me to trust less to myself, and more to the word of God; to depend less upon my own doings, and more upon free grace promises. To the word which cannot be broken, I would trust in time of need. Whoever trusts in it shall never be confounded. This I know to be true by happy experience. I will therefore read, and hear, and study it night and day. By means of it the Lord wrought a great deliverance for me. My feet were almost gone, my treadings had well nigh slipped; but he sent out his word and saved me. I read and believed, that the Father was not reconciled to me for the goodness of my walk, but that reconciliation was planned in the great covenant before all worlds, and was carried into execution by the life and death of Immanuel; it was his peculiar, his glorious, his incommunicable work; it was his sole prerogative to make peace by the blood of his cross. Oh that I may be enabled to maintain it, the next time my faith is tried, and to put honour and glory upon the divine record concerning it! I read and believed, that the Father does not love me upon account of my walk, but for his mercy's sake. His mercy was towards me from everlasting. He loved me in his Son—chose me—accepted me in the beloved—and all his dealings with me, since he called me by his grace, have come from the tender mercies of a covenant God and Father. I would not henceforth have one doubt of his being reconciled to me, and of his loving me perfectly in Jesus. My faith herein has been confirmed by my late trials. I have learned by experience to rely upon what God has spoken, for preserving his peace in my conscience, and his love in my heart. Depending on his faithful word, and mighty arm, I would walk with him this day for the strengthening and increasing of those graces. This is the desire and prayer of my soul.

O Father of mercies, hear me for Jesus' sake! I acknowledge my sinfulness and unworthiness, even in my closest walk with thee. I am less than the least of thy mercies; yea, deserving the heaviest of thy vengeance. It is of the Lord's mercy, that it has not fallen upon me long ago; and I trust in his word, that it will never fall upon me. Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of thine heritage? Thou retainest not thine anger against them for ever; because thou delightest in mercy. Glory be to thee for thine unspeakable mercies: for thou hast given me faith in the atonement of Jesus, by whom I have peace with thee, my reconciled God, and by whom I have experienced thy great love to me. On thee, O my God, is still my hope. I look up to thee, the giver of those graces, for strength to maintain them in my daily walk. I do believe in the sacrifice and righteousness of Immanuel; Lord, help mine unbelief! I find it hard to preserve in my practice, what I believe to be true in doctrine; and therefore on thy present help I must continually depend. Lord, strengthen me mightily by thy Spirit in the inner man against temptations. I am daily and hourly called upon to exercise my faith; and when thy grace does not hold me up, I fall. The fiery darts of Satan easily inflame me, when they are thrown at my legal hopes, false dependencies, or self-righteous tempers. My shield, which should quench them, is ready to drop out of mine hand. I should fall a prey to the enemy and the fire would consume me, if thy mercy was not over me for good. O my God and Father, strengthen my faith against the wiles and assaults of Satan, and against the workings of mine own unbelief. When these trials come, keep me sensible of my weakness, and dependent on thy promised strength, that I may meet them strong in the Lord and in the power of thy might. Oh let every trial teach me more of thy peace in my conscience, and more of thy love in my heart, that I may keep on in a steady course, walking humbly with my God. This is the work of thy good Spirit. I cannot preserve, nor improve his graces, unless he be every moment present with me. He is the giver, the continuer, the increaser of them all. O God the Holy Ghost, I therefore beseech thee to water thy graces every moment. Lest any hurt them, keep them, keep them night and day. Never leave me, nor forsake me; but what thou hast graciously begun, that mightily carry on, in my soul. Temptations are strong, and I am weak; stand by me in the hour of need. And if my faith be tried with fiery temptations, let it come out of them like gold out of the fire. O thou almighty Spirit, confirm by trials, improve by experience, my trust in thy promised help. Let me go on from faith to faith. Keep up the confidence of my rejoicing in my reconciled God and loving Father, that I may walk humbly with him in sweet communion and holy fellowship in the way everlasting. Grant me these mercies, gracious Father, for thy dear Son's sake, by the influence of the eternal Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah, to whom be equal praise for ever and ever. Amen.

CHAPTER V.

The believer orders his steps according to the word, walking with a free heart in the king's highway of obedience.

MEDITATE, O my soul, upon the wonders which divine love hath wrought for thee and for thy salvation. Review the many, many mercies of thy past life; and consider, that thou art called upon to walk this day with THY God. What a privilege is this! He is thy God, and thou art his adopted Son. Oh what a high honour has he conferred upon thee! He has taken thee into the most noble family, yea, into the divine household of faith. He has permitted thee to walk with him as thy Father. He has appointed the way, promised to be with thee in it, and every moment and at every step to be doing thee good. There can be no happiness superior to this on earth. Prize it; for it is inestimable. Enjoy it; for it is heaven begun. Walking with God by faith is present enjoyment of him, and will infallibly bring thee to the end of thy journey, to full and everlasting enjoyment.

Hold fast, then, the confidence of thy rejoicing. What thou hast been taught by the Holy Spirit, depend upon him for confirming and establishing. He has enabled thee to see the glory of the finished salvation of Jesus, and to believe the divine record concerning it. Thou hast renounced every thing for the pardon of thy sins, but the blood-shedding of the Lamb, and every thing for acceptance, but the Lord our righteousness. Thy faith herein has been tried, and the trial ended well. Thy temptations were manifold and violent, but they have done thee good. They have showed thee the necessity of depending upon the perfect work of the God-man—of rejoicing wholly in Christ Jesus, and of having no confidence in the flesh. They have also been the means of convincing thee that thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded then, but fear. And let thy fear of thyself lead thee to trust more in God. Rely on his faithful arm to maintain and to carry on his own work in thy soul. Remember he has promised it. Thy sufficiency is of God, and he has engaged to give thee grace sufficient for thee. He has undertaken, as a Father, to supply all thy wants, to deliver thee from all miseries, and to withhold from thee no manner of thing that is good. Thy salvation is safe. It rests upon a sure foundation, as sure as the covenant of the day and the covenant of the night. They succeed each other by the will of their Creator, and have not been out of course, not one single moment. The ordinances of day and night are regular and certain. So certain is thy salvation by the same unerring will. While the belief of this rules in thy conscience and in thy heart, thou wilt be able to resist temptations. None of them will overcome thee, unless they separate between thee and thy God. Nay they will work for thy good, if guilty fears do not wrest the shield of faith out of thine hand. O beg of God to keep thee and thy faith in the hour of trial, that thou mayest experience his faithfulness to his word. If thou put honour upon it, according to thy faith so shall it be done unto thee. Give it credit, and thy steps will be ordered aright. Thou wilt walk in love this day, as God hath loved thee. He will be thy portion, and the way in which he is to be enjoyed will be thy delight.

Set out then in this faith, with peace in thy conscience, and love in thy heart —trusting to thy God and Father. Look up to him, for strength to maintain and to increase these graces, and hope to receive it from his faithfulness. Now he has put a new song in thy mouth, even praise unto thy God, go on thy way believing and rejoicing. Jesus is thine with all his fulness. And he has promised thee a constant supply of the Spirit, that thou mayest have grace for grace to enable thee to walk humbly with thy God.

Mind then, thy walk is to be ordered according to his revealed will, and in his appointed way of obedience to it; for all rational creatures are bound to obey God. As soon as he makes known his will to them, it becomes their indispensable duty. His will is one, like himself, unchangeably the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever: for when revealed by the sovereign Creator, it becomes to mankind a law, which altereth not. It binds angels and men every moment, in every point and circumstance. And its obligation will never cease. For all his commandments are sure; they stand fast for ever and ever. What he has commanded is as fixed as the sun before him. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven.

It pleased the sovereign Creator to enforce this holy, just, and good law by proper sanctions. Out of his mere grace he has promised life to obedience, which man engaged to perform: and he threatened death to disobedience, to which penalty man submitted. Thereby this law became a covenant of works. The promise was to him, who should continue obedient in all things: for Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, that the man who fulfilleth those things shall live by them. But if he does not fulfil them perfectly, without one failing, he then comes under the penalty, which God had threatened to disobedience—"Cursed is he who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them." This curse draws after it all the pains and penalties of the broken law in earth and in hell.

Under this law of works Adam was placed, and under it all his descendants are born. He and they are bound to keep the law in their own persons, if they would receive the promise, or liable to suffer the penalty, if they transgress. Adam broke the law of works, and we all in him: for in him all have sinned. We were all in his loins when he fell, and forfeited in his attainder. By the offence of that one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation. The righteous judge passed the sentence, and decreed, that by the law of works no flesh living should be saved: for he has proved, in his word, both Jews and Gentiles to be under the law, and under sin, which is the transgression of it; whereby every mouth is stopped, and all the world is become guilty before God: therefore by the deeds of the law, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.

In the law of works there was no provision made for a surety; but it did not absolutely exclude one: therefore it left room for the covenant of grace, in which a provision was made in the person of Jesus Christ for securing the divine honour of this holy law. He undertook to stand up in man's place and stead, to magnify the precepts of the law in his life, and to glorify the penalties of the law in his death, that not one jot or tittle of it might fail till all was fulfilled: and as he was God over all, blessed for ever, his life and death put everlasting honour upon the divine law. His obedience was of inestimable value, and his sufferings were infinitely sufficient to take away sin. Christ is now the end of the law for righteousness. He answered the end of the law for his people by obeying and suffering for them: and every one of them can now plead by faith a perfect fulfilling of all the precepts, a perfect suffering of all the penalties in the person of their divine surety. God the Father is faithful and just to his word and engagements with his Son: he has made known his will in the immutable record of grace, "that whosoever believeth in Jesus should not perish, but should have everlasting life." How can he perish? Jesus died for him. He shall live with God in everlasting life: because Jesus lived for him. And this is the declared will of the Father concerning all that believe in his only-begotten Son.

Remember then, O my soul, that thou art not under the law, but under grace. Thou art saved from the law, under the form of a covenant of works. Thou art not bound to keep its precepts, in order to have life for thy obedience, nor yet to suffer its penalties for thy disobedience. Thy surety undertook to act and suffer for thee. He was to answer the law in its commands and demands to every jot and tittle. And he did. Whatever it required, whatever it threatened, was perfectly fulfilled in the person of thy God and Saviour: and he has absolutely discharged thee from it, as a law of works. Thou art to have nothing to do with it in that view; nay, he has forbidden thee to keep it, in hopes that thou mayest live thereby. The irreversible decree entered in the records of heaven has enacted —BY THE WORKS OF THE LAW SHALL NO FLESH BE JUSTIFIED. Thou art now to look upon the law in the matter of justifying and giving life, as a woman looks upon her dead husband. She is freed from the marriage contract with him, and may now give her heart and hand to another: so art thou freed from the bond of the legal covenant. Thou art become dead to the law by the body of Christ, who has espoused and betrothed thee to himself, that, serving him in newness of spirit and not in the oldness of the letter, thou mayest bring forth fruit unto God. This is thy high privilege. Thy first husband is dead: happy for thee, thou art lawfully married to another—thy husband is thy maker; Jehovah of hosts is his name. The word made flesh has paid all thy debts, suffered thy punishment, wrought out a perfect righteousness, and won a crown of perfect glory for thee. Oh what a divine honour has he put upon thee! Thou art now one with Immanuel in a bond of everlasting love. He has given himself to thee, with all he has and all he is; and it is thy happiness now, not to be thine own, but the Lord's—not to follow thine own will, but his. The law of thy Lord is liberty. As taught by his Spirit, and performed by faith, it is perfect freedom. Whilst thou walkest with him with obedience to it, and leanest on thy beloved every step, thou wilt find deliverance from all spiritual tyranny and bondage, and wilt enjoy the light of his countenance, and the love of his heart. When the Son has thus made thee free, thou art free indeed—free now thy heart is set at liberty to run with Jesus in the way of his commandments.

In this view, O my soul, thou canst look with delight at the most holy law. Attend to it closely, and study it carefully. In order to obey, as a Christian, these following considerations should be well understood and digested: because under the influence of them every step of thy walk is to be ordered. Oh pray then for the spirit of wisdom to teach thee practically,

First, that thy walk with God in the way of obedience is not to fulfil the law as a covenant of works. Thou art not required to do this. Thou canst not do it. Immanuel, thy divine surety, took it upon himself. Because it was impossible for thee, a fallen creature, to keep the law, so as to be justified by it, he therefore came in person to fulfil it. He honoured its precepts by his infinite obedience. He magnified its penalties by his inestimable sacrifice. And this is thy justifying righteousness. Through faith in the life and death of the God-man, thou art not only freed from guilt and condemnation, from curse and hell, but art also entitled to life and glory. The law is now on thy side, and is become thy friend. It acquits thee. It justifies thee. It will give thee the reward promised to obedience. The law in the hand of thy Saviour has nothing but blessings to bestow upon thee. Thou art to receive it at his mouth, and to obey him: but not from any legal hopes of heaven, or from any slavish fears of hell; for then thou wouldst come under the covenant of works again. Whereas thou art not under the law, but under grace; mind thy privilege, and pray for grace to live up to it. Thou art not under the law, bound to keep it perfectly in thine own person, or, in case of failing, condemned by it, and under its fearful curse; but thou art under grace, a state of grace, through faith in the obedience and sufferings of thy blessed surety, and under the power of grace, sweetly inclining thee to love, and mightily enabling thee to keep the law of the Lord thy God. Live thus by grace, and sin shall not have dominion over thee. Under the reign of grace, the tyrant sin is always dethroned. Obey under grace, as freely and fully saved by faith in Jesus, and this will make thy walk easy and evangelical: thou wilt go on with a free spirit, and wilt delight thyself in the ways of God, walking with him,

2. By faith, and not by sight. This is the great spring of all gospel obedience. Faith has an universal efficacy: for thus it is written—"Without faith it is impossible to please God." He is not pleased with the thing done, but with the principle on which it is done. He looks at the heart. Hearing the word, or saying prayers, or giving alms, or doing any thing commanded, are not pleasing in themselves; but they must be performed upon a right motive, and to a right end. And both these come from faith. The apostle mentions the motive which had influenced every step of his Christian course: "We walk by faith, and not by sight"—we judge of our state by what God says of it, and we order our walk accordingly. We give credit to his witness of our being pardoned and justified freely by grace through faith; and we depend for the truth of this not on what we see, but on what we believe. We trust not on our good frames, or warm feelings, or sensible comforts, or to any of the genuine fruits and effects of faith, but we trust what God says simply, as his record: and therefore we walk in a constant dependence on the truth of God in his word, and upon the faithfulness of God to his word. Some promised grace we stand in need of at every step; and we rely upon his word, which cannot be broken, and upon his faithfulness, which cannot fail. Thus we go on, and we find the promise made good, according to our faith.

Such was the apostle's walk. And is thine directed by the same motive? Search, O my soul, and examine upon what principle thou goest to duty. Is it in the obedience of faith? Dost thou take no step without the warrant of the word of God? Dost thou give full credit to what God says in it of thy state, as a justified person? And does this appear from thy dependence upon his faithfulness to make good every thing promised to them who are in that state? Blessed art thou of the Lord, if thou art walking by this faith. Oh praise his holy name, who has thus highly favoured thee, and ascribe to him all the glory. So will thy end be right, as well as thy motive. True faith takes no honour to itself. It is an emptying, humbling grace. Its spring-head is in covenant love, and it is given from distinguishing favour and sovereign mercy. It has no foundation, when given, but the word of God: nothing to rest on, but the divine truth: no support, but the divine power: and no growth but from the divine influence. What, then, does it leave a man to glory in? Whoever has it, has it all from God; and while he is in his right mind, living by it, he will be disposed to give God all the glory of it: even for common mercies, as well as spiritual, he will live by the faith of the Son of God. Whether he eats or drinks, or whatever he does, he does all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him. And thus will he go on sweetly and happily, obeying, not from slavish fears or legal hopes, but

3. From holy love, which is the fruit and consequence of walking by faith. Faith worketh love, and then worketh by love. The faith of the gospel, as a grace of the Spirit, worketh chiefly by love to God, and to man for God's sake: for the gospel discovers the way of salvation, contrived by the eternal Three, fulfilled in the life and death of Immanuel, and applied to the sinner's heart by the eternal Spirit. Whoever is enabled to believe the gospel, will see himself an object of the covenant love of the blessed Trinity, and will therefore love Father, Son, and Spirit: for we love him, says the apostle, because he first loved us. And faith in his love to us will make us that we shall neither be barren nor unfruitful. Love is very active. Obeying from love is very sweet. How active, how sweet is obedience, when the love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, who is given unto us! He is an almighty agent. He overcomes the power of legal, unbelieving workings, and puts a new spring to duty into the heart. He manifests the love of God in Christ, his free distinguishing love, the exceeding riches of it, and the numerous blessings flowing from it through time and eternity. In the sense of these mercies he excites gratitude, and puts it upon acting. This grace has a wonderful influence. "What return shall I make unto the Lord?" is the devout breathing of the grateful heart. While the love of Christ constraineth it, all the affections follow him, and the soul delights itself in his ways. Then none of his commandments will be grievous. Nay, his yoke itself becomes easy, and his burden light: O triumphant love! How active, how sweet did he find it, who cried out—"I can do ALL things, I can suffer all things, I am more than conqueror, through him that loveth me."

And is not this, O my soul, thy happy case? Oh prize thy privilege, and adorn it in thy love. Walk in love with thy reconciled God, and out of love to him perform all duties, and bear all crosses. Remember, thou art not required to obey, in order to be saved for thine obedience, but thou art already saved; and therefore, out of gratitude to thy dearest Saviour, thou art bound to love him and to obey him. Thou canst not love his person, and yet hate his will. "If ye love me," says he, "keep my commandments"—give this proof of it, keep in my way, doing my commandments. But whatever ye do, let it come from the heart. Obey me; but see it be with a willing mind, and with a free spirit. When all springs from love, then my service will be perfect freedom. I would have you to do my will, but without fear; not for life, but from life; not that ye may live, but because ye live. Do it as sons, and not as slaves: the slave abideth not in the house for ever, but the son abideth for ever. In this free spirit of adoption serve me, as sons of God, heirs of God, and joint heirs with me. Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith I have made you free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

To obey from life, and salvation received and enjoyed, is sweet liberty. To obey, as the condition of life and salvation, is bitter slavery: it is an intolerable yoke, because it is not possible any fallen man should so keep the law as to live thereby. But the believer, freed from this condition by Christ's keeping the law for him, is in liberty; he is saved from the penalty annexed to the transgression; he is entitled to the life promised to obedience, and thereby he is delivered from legal hopes, and from guilty fears. In this faith he walks on delightfully in the ways of obedience: for he is reconciled to the law through the grace that is in Christ Jesus: he loves it. Oh what love, says he, have I unto thy law! because now I find it, according to promise, written upon my heart. And this is a

4. Motive to gospel obedience. The new covenant runs thus: "I will put," says God, "my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people: and they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me from the least of them to the greatest of them." The heart is by nature as hard as adamant. It is enmity itself against the holy law. But the Lord here engages to take away the stony heart, and to give a heart of flesh, upon which he will write the ten commandments; not in tables of stone, but in the fleshly tables of the heart. The Spirit of the living God will teach all his children to know their Father; he will manifest to them their adoption; he will reveal to them their Father's love in Jesus; and he will make their hearts happy in the enjoyment of it. Then the holy fruits of this love will appear towards man. It will work sweetly in benevolence, and effectually in beneficence. The love of God will open the contracted heart, enlarge the selfish, warm the cold, and bring liberality out of the covetous. When the Holy Spirit teaches brotherly love, he overcomes all opposition to it. He says to his disciples, "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." And he makes them kind to one another: they show it by every good word and work. Thus by manifesting to them the Father reconciled in Jesus, and by enabling them to love man for his sake, he writes upon their hearts the two great commandments, on which hang all the law and the prophets. The love of God, says the apostle to the Romans, is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost; and to the Thessalonians, Ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. Thus he engages the affections of the soul to the holy law, and inclines the inner man to love obedience. It ceaseth to be a yoke and a burden. How easy is it to do what one loves! If you dearly love any person, what a pleasure is it to serve him! What will not love put you upon doing or suffering to oblige him! Let love rule in the heart to God and to man, his law will then become delightful, and obedience to it will be pleasantness. The soul will run, yea, inspired by love, it will mount up with wings as eagles, in the way of God's commandments.

Happy are the people that are in such a case! And is it not, O my soul, in some measure thine? Hast thou not been taught to love God and his ways? Since thou hast been acquainted with him as thy loving Father in Jesus, has not thy faith been working by love to him, and to his will, and to his whole household and family? Remember this is promised. All the children of God are to be taught to know and to love their heavenly Father. This is the very tenor of the covenant of grace, which the almighty Spirit has undertaken to fulfil. And he cannot fail in his office. It is his crown and glory to make good his covenant engagements. Oh trust him then, and put honour upon his faithfulness. He has promised to guide thee with his counsel, and to strengthen thee with his might in the way of obedience to thy reconciled God. What is within thee, or without thee, to oppose thy walking in love with him, he will incline thee to resist, and he will enable thee to overcome. Oh what mayst thou not expect from such a divine friend, who is to abide with thee on purpose to keep thy heart right with God? What can he not do, what will he not do, for thee? Such as is the love of the Father and of the Son, such is the love of the Holy Ghost, the same free, perfect, everlasting love. Read his promises of it. Meditate on them. Pray to him for increasing faith to mix with them; that, he dwelling in the temple of thy heart, thou mayst have fellowship there with the Father and with the Son. Whatever in thee is pardoned through the Son's atonement, pray the Holy Spirit to subdue, that it may not interrupt communion with thy God. And whatever grace is to be received out of the fulness of Jesus in order to keep up and to promote that communion, intreat the Holy Spirit to give it thee with growing strength. But pray in faith, nothing wavering. So shall the love of God rule in thy heart. And then thou shalt be like the sun, when it goeth forth in its might, shining clearer and clearer to the perfect day. Oh may thy course be like his, as free, as regular, as communicative of good, that thy daily petition may be answered, and that the will of thy Father may be done in earth, as it is done in heaven.

When all these things concur, what can be wanting to make the way of obedience easy and pleasant? It is not now a hard burden, impossible to be borne. The Spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus, hath made it easy. He has reconciled the believer to the law; for he shows it to him in his surety, magnified and made honourable—magnified infinitely in his life—made everlastingly honourable in his death: so that the Father can get the fullest glory to every divine perfection, even to his justice, by saving sinners through faith in the righteousness of his Son: he can be just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly. The believer, persuaded of this, is reconciled to God. Being no longer under the law as a covenant of works, but under grace, he loves the law, and walks with God in sweet obedience to it. He sets out, and goes on every step, in faith—trusting to the acceptance of his person, and of his services in the beloved. He does not work now in order to be saved; but he works because he is saved. And he ascribes all he does to the praise of the glory of free grace. He works from gratitude, and the faith of God's elect always does. It never fails to show itself by love. The Holy Spirit wins the heart by revealing to it the love of God, and thereby draws out the affections after him. When the commandment comes, "My son, give me thy heart;" the son is ready, "Lord, take it, and seal it thine for ever." And whatever inbred enmity may remain against giving it to the Lord, the Holy Spirit has undertaken to subdue it. It is his office to take away the stony heart, and to create a heart of flesh, soft and willing to receive the impression of this grace. With the same finger which once wrote the holy law upon tables of stone, it is now written upon the fleshly tables of the heart. And then the love of God and the love of man are clearly taught, and effectually enforced. What a change does this make in obedience! Hard things are now done with ease. Rough ways are made smooth. Painful things become delightful. The labour of love is sweet labour, because the heart is in it. The feet run, the hands work, all the faculties are ready to exert themselves, when love commands.

O my God, let it be thus with me. Thou hast given me an earnest desire to walk with thee in thy ways; guide me in them by thine almighty Spirit. Let him abide with me, Holy Father, as the Spirit of adoption, that I may always serve thee as thy reconciled child, not under the law, but under grace. I would gladly walk with thee every step by faith, and that faith working by love to thee and to my whole will. O God, give me grace sufficient for thy holy walk. Let thy faithful promise be daily fulfilled: write thy law still plainer in mine inward parts, and let it be more fairly copied out in my life. I want to love thee more, as thou knowest. O my God, keep my heart sensible of the exceeding riches of thy love to me, and let the growing sense of this increase mine to thee. In the strength of thy good Spirit enable me to overcome inward and outward opposition to my walking with thee in love. Let him strengthen me mightily in the inner man for every labour of love. From him cometh power to embrace and to cleave with full purpose of heart unto the ways of God—to love what he loves—and to hate what he hates. O thou blessed Spirit of the Father and of the Son, make me willing, keep me able to enjoy the Father's love in his Son; and let it be a growing love, abounding yet more and more in knowledge, and in all sensible feeling, that I may run and not be weary, may be going on to the end, and not be faint. Even so let it be done unto thy servant, according to thy word, wherein thou hast caused me to put my trust. Let me have fellowship with the Father in his love, through the salvation of his Son, by thine influence upon my heart, now, henceforth, and for ever. Amen.

CHAPTER VI.

The walk of the believer in the way of duty.

It is very hard to go on in a straight course, and for any length of time. The hindrances are many. To understand the nature and obligations of duty, to enter upon it with right motives, to perform it in a proper temper, to go through it without backwardness or weariness, not by constraint, but willingly, and to find the true end of doing it answered; these are great difficulties, but they will be removed in some measure out of the believer's walk, if he attend to what was said before of obedience in general, and if he be enabled to bring it into practice.

It cannot be too often repeated, that the true believer is not under the law as a covenant of works—bound to keep the precept for life, or liable to the penalty of death. He is not under the law in this respect, but under grace. He is one with Christ, who kept the precept, and suffered the penalty for him, as his surety, and in his stead. He has put in his plea, and taken the benefit of Christ's suretyship. His plea has been admitted; and therefore he is in a state of perfect acceptance. He stands in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made him free. Grace reigns in him, and over him, and renders his obedience perfect freedom. He obeys; but it is all in faith. He works; but it is from a sense of the Father's love to him in his Son. Gratitude taught by the Holy Spirit influences his heart and life. His heart has the love of God written upon it, and his life manifests it. He serves God with a thankful mind, and without fear, and cheerfully does all the good he can to man for God's sake.

The believer will never get on in the way of duty, unless he learns to obey upon these gospel principles. He will stand in need of their assistance at every step: for he will meet with constant opposition to them. The flesh will not come under grace. The carnal mind is always legal. The old man of sin knows nothing but working for life, and will not submit to any other way. Our sinful nature is altogether for the covenant of works: Jews, Turks, heathens, and nominal Christians, are all upon one plan: they expect God will be merciful to them for their doings. And the children of God are exercised with this self-righteous spirit, more or less, all their days. Is it not, O my soul, thy grief and burthen? Art thou not daily plagued with it in thy duties? And though thy principles be very evangelical, yet they too often fail thee in practice. Oh beg of God then, earnestly and often, that thou mayst be cast into the mould of the gospel, quite evangelized in thy mind, and mayst perform all duties upon such motives as he himself requires and approves.

Duty is a debt owing to God—due from the creature to the Creator. The obligation to it arises from the absolute dependence of the one upon the other: and it consists in acknowledging this in the appointed way by a perfect and continual service of every faculty—the creature being entirely subject to the will of the Creator, and living in a never-failing conformity to it: for the will of God doth bind all men on earth, and angels and glorified spirits in heaven. It is an unchangeable law, obliging for ever all creatures to obedience, not only on account of the matter contained in it, but also with respect to the sovereign authority of the almighty lawgiver. And this obligation Christ in the gospel has not in the least dissolved, but on all occasions has confirmed and strengthened. How decisive are these words! "Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil:" to fulfil the law in mine own person, as the surety for my people, and to put the love of it into their hearts, and to engage them and to enable them to practise it in their lives; though not for the same end for which I fulfilled it.

Duty is always one and the same—a debt always due to God. But the debt of obedience being withheld, and the death of suffering being incurred, the believer is taught to plead his discharge for suffering under Christ, and his fulfilling of obedience in the righteousness of Christ. With this faith he has a delightful prospect of duty. God is now at peace with him. God loves him in his Son. It is his high privilege to enjoy the sense of those distinguishing favours. For this end he is admitted to walk with his God. What an honour is this! Having received the adoption of sons, he is blessed with his Father's love, and is taken into near fellowship with him. What a happiness is this? "Son, all that I have is thine: it is freely given to thee in Jesus, and thou art now called upon to enjoy me and mine in thy holy walk." Here duty becomes his privilege. It is exalted and spiritualized into a gospel grace. He is bound to it, but it is by the cords of love. The pleasing bonds of gratitude tie his heart to obedience, to a free, holy, evangelical obedience. He obeys, not as a slave, but as a son—not for fear, but because Christ has set him at liberty—not that God may accept, pardon, and justify him, but because God has done all for him, and will do all in him—not that he may have heaven for his obedience, but because heaven is reserved for him, and he for it. He therefore looks at duty, as greatly refined by the gospel. Every act of it, done in faith, is an act of fellowship with the Father and with the Son; and by the grace of the Spirit every act brings the Father's love through the Son's salvation into experience. He has communion with his God in all he does. This ennobles duty. It is hereby raised to a divine honour: for it is hereby made, to them who are in Christ, the highest privilege they can have on this side of heaven.

When the Holy Spirit writes the law upon the heart, he then teaches this obedience of faith. He does not abolish duty, but he enforces it upon right motives, and directs it to a right end. The same duties remain in the gospel, but not upon the same obligation. Law duties, as conditions of life, cannot be fulfilled. The judge himself has decreed that by the works of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: therefore the law as a covenant of works does not enter into the believer's obedience. He obeys, because he is freed from this covenant—not freed from doing the same duties which this covenant required, but freed from doing them upon law motives, neither expecting the promised life on account of keeping the precepts, nor fearing the threatened penalty on account of not keeping them. It is his privilege to obey, because he is saved. He works from a free spirit, and with a thankful heart. He does all his duties in faith. He is spiritual in them, acting upon the endearing motive of God's love to him in Christ, as it has been revealed to his heart by the Holy Spirit. He hopes for the acceptance of them only through the intercession of Christ: and, after he has done them ever so well, he desires grace from Christ, to return him all his glory. Thus in every duty he aims at fellowship with God in Christ through the Spirit, and seeks to present an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God.

Whatever thou art required to do, remember, O my soul, that thou art under grace, and it is thy privilege to do it in faith. View the two tables in the hand of thy Saviour, and receive the ten commandments from his mouth. Happy for thee, Jesus is thy lawgiver. His spirit will gospelize thine obedience. He will bring thine heart into it. He will set thee in the chariot of love, and thou shalt ride on prosperously. He will oil the wheels of duty, and they shall run easy and pleasant. Thou shalt be carried sweetly through duty, thy Beloved being present and conversing with thee in it: yea thy faith, working by love to him, will render fellowship with God, in all thou doest, the joy of thy heart and the glory of thy life.

Oh beg of thy divine Teacher thus to spiritualize thine obedience! From him only canst thou learn the two great commandments, which are the sum and substance of the will of thy God. In the first, his nature is revealed, and then his worship. He is the Lord thy God, Jehovah thy Alehim. Jehovah means the self-existent Godhead, and Alehim, the persons in covenant, Father, Son, and Spirit, partakers of the same self-existence, and divine glory, without any difference or inequality. There can be no true religion without the true object of worship; and he cannot be worshipped unless he be known: therefore it is an indispensable duty to know the Lord God. But how shall fallen man attain to this knowledge? He lost it by sin, and he cannot, by any reasoning faculty or power of his own, recover it. It is a matter of fact, that no man did ever by searching find out God; and attested by infallible authority, that the world by its wisdom knew not God. There is no true description of the Godhead but what is revealed in scripture; and it is altogether from the teaching of the Holy Spirit that any one savingly understands what is revealed. He, the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, opens the eyes of the mind, sets the object before them, and gives a clear idea of it. He takes of the things of God, and shows them to his disciples. He does not lead them into abstracted reasonings about the divine nature, or what the absolute Godhead is; but his lessons are useful and practical. He teaches the knowledge of the persons in Jehovah as they are related to sinners in the covenant of grace. Through him the Father is made known: "Ye have received the Spirit of adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father," Rom. viii. 15. Through him the Son is believed in: for no man can say, that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. He discovers the Father's love in the Son with its rich graces and abundant blessings, as it is written: "We have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." He makes known the Giver, and the gifts; and he is received for that very purpose. He shines into the heart to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the person of Jesus Christ. And this is saving acquaintance with the Father and with the Son; for hereby the understanding is restored to the image of God, and the new man is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him.

Oh what a mercy is this! What can call for greater praise? And this mercy, O my soul, is thine. Unspeakably gracious has the Lord been to thee. He has given thee the knowledge of himself. His image is upon thine understanding. His light is shining upon it. Certainly, it is as great an act as when he first commanded the light to shine out of darkness: for hereby I believe in him, I know him to be my FATHER. Oh precious name! The love of his heart, and it is infinite; the blessings of his love, and they are numberless; he has called me to enjoy, freely, of mere grace, of his own sovereign good will—called me to the adoption of sons, to the noblest dignity, yea to everlasting honour, to be a son of the most high God—God is my Father—my new birth is from him—that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, and has fellowship with the Father of spirits. Behold what manner of love this is! No parent ever loved or can love a child as my Father which is in heaven loves me. And I desire in the sense of this to love him, to cleave to him with full purpose of heart, and gratefully to devote all I have and am to his service and to his glory. O thou divine Revealer of this love, enlighten mine understanding and influence my affections, that I may grow in the knowledge of my Father in Jesus! for

In him the Father only is to be known. He is his Father, as our covenant head, and therefore ours in him. God is not a Father to any, but in Christ. The name Father respects Christ, as the first-begotten, and then all his seed. He is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, and depends for its adoption on the Father of their Lord Jesus Christ. He undertook to be made man, to live, and to die for the many sons whom he was to bring to glory: and in consequence of his undertakings it pleased the Father to lay up all fulness of grace for them in the God-man, their covenant head. And it pleases the Spirit to witness of this fulness, and to enable believers to receive out of it grace for grace. Thus he reveals Immanuel to them. They know him, and are one with him. He is their Lord and their God, and by faith they live in him and upon him. Trusting to his atonement and righteousness, they have peace with their reconciled Father, and they enjoy his love shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost. Waiting in the appointed ways, they grow in the knowledge of the wonderful person God-Jesus. They see more of the divine glory of his salvation work, and by depending on it daily they enjoy more of the things which accompany salvation. Thrice happy are they whose acquaintance with Jesus is thus increasing. Their happiness has a boundless subject. They may study on, and they will find in him new worlds of delights to all eternity. O ye highly favoured! read and adore the wonders already wrought for you; among which these are not the least: "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding to know him that is true; and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ, who is the true God and eternal life." Blessed knowledge! they have an understanding given them, and they are savingly acquainted with the Father and with the Son by the teaching of the Holy Ghost. Jehovah is their Alehim. Thus they learn the first part of their duty, which leads them to the Second; namely, to love the persons in the Godhead, because they stand in this most endearing relation to them. They love the Father, who is their Father in Jesus. They have not only heard of and believed in, but have also enjoyed, his precious love. It has been shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, who has overcome all resistance to his love; yea, has made enmity itself yield to it. Having purified the conscience by faith, he then purifies the heart: he pours into it a sense of that love which gave his coequal Son for them, and all the blessings in earth and in heaven with him. Thereby he draws out the affections in holy desires to be more united to the Father of mercies. It is the property of love to desire to be united to the beloved object. The Holy Spirit has discovered the object, and has given the desire; and he fulfils all the desires of his own creating. He teaches all the children of God to know their Father, and to experience his love to them in his Son; and then they cannot but love him. He creates the new heart for this very purpose, and makes it sensible that the Father's love is all received through the Son; and therefore the Father and the Son are beloved with an undivided affection.

The Son is his office-name. It should never be heard without putting us in mind of the wonderful love of our God in his undertakings. He covenanted to be made flesh. What a miracle of love is that! He engaged with his Father to be the surety for his people, to do their work, to suffer their punishment; and then God and man, one Christ for ever, was to have all fulness of covenant blessings to give his people. The Father has no love, the Spirit bestows no grace, but what comes through Christ. A believer is therefore taught in every thing he does to have fellowship with Christ. His safety, his happiness, his hopes of happiness to-day and for ever, are blessings to be received out of Immanuel's fulness: for he is the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all: and while the member is receiving life and sense and happiness from the fulness of the head, he will have fresh motives to love his divine Saviour. What can fix his affections, if gratitude to Jesus cannot? He has every thing in him that can win the heart. He has beauty to engage love, blessings to increase love, glories to increase love to him for evermore. He is beauty without a rival. Whatever is charming in any earthly object is but a ray from him, and should lead to him; it is but a beam to point out the matchless graces of Immanuel. And so is the loveliness of heavenly objects: saints and angels have nothing beautiful but what the love of Jesus has put upon them. He is the Lord and Giver of all their glory. How glorious then must he be! He is mine, says the believer, and my property in him makes him indeed glorious in mine eyes. Once I saw no beauty in him, that I should desire him; but now he is my beloved and my friend. I can see every thing truly lovely in my Lord and my God. Whatever else courts my heart, appears to be but a shadow: the substance is my Jesus. He endears himself daily to me by his numberless favours. I am always receiving out of his fulness some blessing, which makes him the centre of my happiness. Every look of faith discovers in him some new excellency, and brings from him some fresh kindness, and thereby engages my heart still more to its precious Saviour. And when I look forward to the glory to be revealed, when I shall see my dearest Jesus face to face, and shall be like him, and shall enjoy him, and in him all the blessings of the eternal Three for ever, oh! this is too big for present thought; yet it constrains me to give up my whole soul to this heavenly lover. Glorify him daily in me, thou faithful witness for Jesus, and give me continual reason to love thee with the same undivided affection wherewith thou hast enabled me to love the Father and the Son.

The Holy Spirit is Jehovah, a person in the self-existent Godhead, equal with the Father in every attribute. His office-name is Spirit; the idea is taken from air, such as we breathe, to denote his being the breather or inspirer of spiritual life. Every thing done by him in this character tends to holiness, and therefore he is called the Holy Spirit. His office in the covenant, as well as his coequality with the Father and the Son, entitle him to equal worship, and to equal love: for he undertook to carry into execution the purposes of the Father's love in Jesus. Their fulfilment depends entirely upon his grace. The Son has been incarnate: he has brought in everlasting righteousness, and made the atonement of sin: the Father is satisfied with his finished work, and has demonstrated his acceptance of it: the God-man is now upon the throne of glory, with all power in heaven and earth. To this the Holy Spirit bears witness. It is his divine office to apply the salvation of Jesus, and to make it effectual. He does all in the heirs of promise. The Father gave them to the Son; the Son redeemed them; but they are in the common mass of corruption, dead in trespasses and sins, till the Spirit of life enter into them. They feel not their guilt nor their danger till he convince them. They are quite ignorant of God and of the things of God till he make them wise unto salvation. They cannot believe in Jesus till the Spirit of faith enable them. They cannot rejoice in the Father's love till the Comforter makes them sensible of it. They are without strength until they be strengthened with might by the Spirit in the inner man. They cannot go in their Christian course but by a constant supply of the Spirit. They cannot hold out to the end but from his abiding with them for ever. So that he is the Lord and giver of life. He begins the good work, and he confirms it, until the day of Jesus Christ. Every motion of spiritual life is from him; and all those whom he makes alive, he makes sensible of the debt which they owe him. He manifests his love to them, and thereby he engages their love to him. They experience how great the love of the Spirit is. They are sensible of their obligations to him, and desire to be thankful for them. Thus their affections return to the proper object of love and worship. They receive daily the blessings of the Father's love, through faith in the Son's salvation, by the applying power of the Holy Spirit; and hereby they are reconciled to the first and great commandment: it is become the delight of their souls to love the Lord God.

Here consider, O my soul, whether thou art acting upon the principle of gratitude to the good God. If thou art, then his yoke will be easy and his burden light. Thou wilt not go to duty in bondage, hoping to gain his love by the desert of what thou doest, or fearing to be beaten with many stripes for not doing it well. Thy God, whom thou servest, is thy most loving friend and tenderest father. He loved thee in Jesus freely by grace, not by works done by thee, or to be done. Immanuel is thy Saviour: his love to thee is made up of miracles. No understanding of angels or of glorified spirits can conceive how great it is: for it passeth knowledge. Nevertheless, the Holy Spirit has revealed it unto thee. He loves thee, as the Father and the Son do, with the same divine affection. Thy debt is equal; thy gratitude should be the same to the blessed Trinity. In the sense of thine infinite obligations, thou art called upon to walk in the way of duty. Love to the person whom thou art to serve will make service pleasant. And thou dost love thy God. He has given himself with every covenant blessing to be thine; and these blessings are to be enjoyed in thy walk with him. With this faith look at duty. It is the expression of gratitude to thy dearest friend, and it is the way to enjoy his divine friendship. He requires it out of love to thee, and would have thee to do it out of love to him. Oh how exalted his duty, when communion with God is carried on by it! He would have thee keep close to him, in order to maintain a sense of his gracious presence in thy heart, and so to walk with him as to have his love to thee confirmed at every step; and therefore thou shouldst seek to preserve a constant nearness and holy fellowship with him in every thing thou doest. This is the will of thy God. May it be thine, O my soul! Study this glorious way of gospel duty. Pray to be taught it better, and to go on in it more spiritually every day. Bring it into all thy affairs. In thy calling, as well as in the means of grace; in temporal, as well as in heavenly matters; set the Lord always before thee; and so live and act in every thing as to keep up communion with thy God and Father in Jesus, by the grace of the Holy Spirit.

When God is thus become the dear object of thy happy heart, then every way wherein his love is to be enjoyed will become delightful. The time, the place, the means of meeting with him, will be greatly desired and much longed for. Thy heart cannot but be where thy treasure is. Thou wilt want no spur to duty, no whip to drive thee to ordinances. It will be enough that the Lord is there. As when he said to David, Seek ye my face; his heart replied, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. His heart said it. His affections were set upon God, and he was ready to seek wherever God was to be found. No hunted hart ever panted more after the water-brooks than his soul did after God. His hope in doing any thing was to have God's gracious presence with him. And his happiness in it was to have communion with God. This is gospel duty. And what a glorious privilege is it! Oh that it may be my happy experience thus to meet God in all his ways, and to enjoy him in my daily walk. That thou mayst grow in this divine fellowship, consider, O my soul, some of the duties of the first table, and learn to practise them upon gospel principles. The first and chief is PRAYER, which consists in keeping up daily converse with thy God upon all occasions. This is the breathing of the new-born soul. It wants to draw the air of heaven, and to live in its own proper element. There is a way opened for it unto the throne of glory, and the children of God may approach it with boldness; for it is a throne of grace, and he that sitteth upon it loves to hear and to answer their petitions. He is their Father. "I go, says Jesus, to my Father and to your Father; my Father himself loveth you: ask what ye will of him in my name he will do it." This is the beloved object of prayer—a reconciled Father in Jesus—whose heart is full of tenderness to the complaints and miseries of his family—his promises are the declarations of his pure love—a dependence upon his fulfilling them does honour to his truth and faithfulness, and always brings down the blessing. The Holy Spirit abides with the children of God to teach them thus to pray in faith. He helps their infirmities in prayer, strengthens their graces, and bestows on them their comforts. He enables them to come with boldness, and have access with confidence. Whatever their Father has freely promised to give them in Jesus, they can ask in faith, nothing wavering; for they know his promises cannot fail: they find them daily fulfilled, whereby their holy familiarity with their Father increases. He draws nearer to them, and they draw nearer to him. This their mutual intercourse may be interrupted, but it cannot be entirely broken off. God is always disposed to hear, although the believer be not always able to pray rejoicing. It is still his privilege, although he may not find any great delight in it; but if he continue to make constant use of his privilege, his delight will return, and God will fulfil to him the gracious promise—I will make them joyful in my house of prayer.

Thus the child of God learns to love prayer, yea, to pray without ceasing. He lives under his Father's eye, and in a dependence on his Father's care for him night and day. And he has hereby as true and lasting fellowship with the things of God in his soul as he has with the things of this world in his body.

Oh what an exalted privilege is this! How highly is prayer hereby ennobled! It is not a law duty to an absolute God; but a gracious intercourse with a covenant God: not practised that he may love us, but because he loves us; not to make us his children, but because we are his children. It should be performed always in this faith. If there be infirmities in it, such as wandering, coldness, or the like, we are to remember that we are not heard for the goodness of our prayers, nor answered for the fervency of them. That which makes our persons accepted, obtains acceptance for our services also. We, and all we do, are only accepted in the beloved: "For through Jesus Christ we have an access by one Spirit unto the Father," Ephes. ii. 18; our access is through Jesus Christ. Trusting to his finished salvation, we enter into the presence of the Father, and, guided by the Holy Spirit, we pray in faith. Whatever we ask in the Son's name, we know that we have the petitions which we desired of him. This spiritualizes prayer, and puts glory upon it, because there is heavenly fellowship with God in it, with the Father through the Son, by the one Spirit.

These are some of the privileges of Christian prayer. Thou goest, O my soul, to meet thy God in it—to converse with thy Father—to call on him for the fulfilling of his promises made in Jesus—to wait on him for his answers—and to give him his glory. Oh what blessed seasons hast thou enjoyed in this communion with thy God! How has he manifested his nearness to thee, and bounty towards thee! Hast thou not found his heart open, his ears open, and his hands open, to grant thee the request of thy lips? And when thou hast not found such sweet fellowship with thy God in prayer, yet thy dependence on his faithful word has been exercised and improved. Thou hast left thy petitions with thy friend and advocate, trusting to that most glorious description of him in Rev. viii. 3, 4: "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar, which was before the throne. And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand." O thou great Angel of the covenant, thus present my prayers! They are nothing worth, but as perfumed with thy divine odours. Let them ever ascend before God out of thy hand with the smoke of the incense of thy sacrifice and intercession. Blessed Spirit of prayer, increase my faith, that I may trust more to a prayer-hearing God and Father, who is always ready to grant every good thing promised to his children in Christ Jesus. Amen.

Praise and prayer go together. The prayer of faith will afford continual matter for praise. The one is a dependence on God for every promised blessing; the other is the acknowledgement of his having bestowed it. Innocent man had his heart in this sweet work. It was his happiness. Every breath in paradise was praise. The redeemed man has more reason. His obligations are far greater than Adam was under to his God—raised from his fall—saved from the guilt and misery of it—chosen and called to this salvation by mere grace—through faith a partaker of it—an heir of God, and a joint-heir with Christ. Oh what motives are these, to continual thankfulness! And these motives are effectual when the Holy Spirit discovers the things that are freely given to us of God. He makes us sensible of them and thankful for them; for he preserves in the soul a blessed poverty of spirit, an humble, abiding sense of wants and unworthiness; and thus he lays a sure foundation for thankfulness. Every blessing is then received with a—Why me? what am I, and what is my Father's house, that God should deal thus bountifully with me? I must refer it all to the praise of the glory of his own grace. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed me with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ. All these blessings flow from the Father's love in his Son; and the Holy Spirit has discovered to me that boundless ocean of love, and has often refreshed me with its life-giving streams. He has made known to me the good pleasure of the Father's will, which he had purposed in himself, to choose me by his distinguishing grace to be one of his children; and through faith in Jesus Christ I read my adoption, and take possession of the inheritance of children. Mine experience of these blessings cannot be questioned, while I am receiving out of the fulness of Jesus grace for grace. Oh how great is my debt! It is equal to the eternal Three: so should my gratitude be. It is very meet, right, and my bounden duty that I should, at all times and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord, holy Father, almighty, everlasting God; therefore with angels and archangels, and with all the company of heaven, I laud and magnify thy glorious name, evermore praising thee, and saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord, God of hosts: heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Glory be to thee, O Lord most high. Amen.

May such as this, O my soul, be thy daily tribute of thanks! Consider what thou owest to thy God; how great are his favours, how many, how endless; and bestowed on the most unworthy. Review his goodness in giving thee being, and in preserving it. Remember from how many dangers and pains he has delivered thee: what health and creature-comforts he has vouchsafed of his mere bounty; and what a monument of his long suffering thou art. Oh what a miracle that one like thee should be out of hell! Then put to the account spiritual favours, what blessing thou hast received from the Father's love in Jesus; what blessings thou art entitled to in him, not only in time, but also in eternity. Cast up the mighty sum, and say, How much it is. Canst thou tell the numbers thereof? No. It is beyond the power of the greatest arithmetician. If thou couldst write a figure upon every atom in the creation, thou wouldst want a new world whereon to sum up the vast account; for thy mercies reach to the heaven of heavens, and they are also everlasting. Then consider to whom thou art thus indebted. Is it not to a justly offended God, who might have glorified all his perfections in punishing thee for thy sins? Whereas in wonderful grace he has chosen and called thee to the adoption of sons. He is thy Father. This is the spring of all thy mercies. In love he gave his Son to finish thy salvation. And his spirit has brought thee to believe in it, and to enjoy it. This is the source of all thy praise. The object of thanksgiving is thy covenant God, who is related to thee, in such a bond of love as will bring thee under eternal obligations. Thou art therefore in all thy praise to remember thy relation to Father, Son, and Spirit, thy debt to them for that most blessed relation, thy growing, ever-growing debt. Praise will pay none of it. The saints in glory do but acknowledge it. While they are praising more, the sum is increasing. O my soul! beg of thy God to give thee grace, that thine acknowledgments may be in some measure like theirs. They are crying Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God, giving glory for the Father's love in Jesus, and for their experience of it by the eternal Spirit. May this subject be thine, more spiritual, more holy every day, till it be what theirs is, perfect and without intermission.

Since it is thy privilege, O my soul, to pray to thy covenant God, and to praise him for covenant mercies, then thou wilt highly prize the Holy Scriptures, because without them thou canst not know what to pray for, nor what is indeed a mercy. Thy faith has nothing to stand upon but the word of God, and nothing to praise him for but mercies therein promised and by believing received. Oh how dear, then, should his word be to thee! how greatly studied, how diligently heard! that by it thou mayest grow in every grace, which is needful for thy holy walk with God. It is the appointed means by which the Holy Spirit acts. It is his great instrument in beginning and carrying on spiritual life. He opens the understanding to know the scriptures; he inclines the will and the affections to receive them in the love of the truth, and he influences the whole man to submit to live under the obedience of faith. Whatever strength, victory, comfort, or blessing of any kind he bestows, it comes by obeying the truth through the Spirit: so that thou canst not go on in thy walk with God but by constant and believing use of the scriptures. They should be thy study night and day, heard and read carefully, mixed with faith, treasured up in thy memory, received into thy heart, and brought into thy life, and all by the teaching of the Holy Ghost, in order to thine enjoyment of the promised blessings of the Father's love through the Son's salvation. Thus the word will be the means of thy maintaining fellowship with the blessed Trinity. By mixing faith with it thou wilt be constantly receiving from them covenant mercies; and so thou wilt go forward. Thy steps will be ordered aright according to the word, and thy way will be prosperous.

Consider then, O my soul, whether thou art making this use of the scriptures. Dost thou find the means of thy growth in divine knowledge, in faith and love? Do they really promote thy communion with God, and on that account are they daily more thy study and thy delight? Never think of hearing or reading them without praying for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that they may be the means of keeping up fellowship with thy Father in Jesus. For this end they were revealed; and if this end be not answered, they profit thee nothing. Make it then thy constant practice—before hearing, to pray for a spiritual appetite, that, as new born babes desire milk, so thou mayst hunger and thirst for the good word of life—in hearing, beg of God that thou mayst feed upon the word and digest it, and thine inward man may be nourished up in the words of faith, and of good doctrine—after hearing, pray for a sanctified memory to treasure up for use what thou hast learnt, that, as occasion shall serve, it may be realized and brought into practice, thy life and conversation being cast into the mould of the word. With the same dependence on thy divine Teacher, read, as well as hear, the scriptures. Meditate on them. Converse about them, expecting to find them able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus, and, as thy faith in him increases, able to bring in richer experience of thy Father's love in him.

How sweet is prayer, how delightful is praise, how blessed is hearing and reading the word, when these are the means of meeting and conversing with God! His presence puts the highest honour upon them, and exalts duty into a royal privilege: for he is present as a Father with his children. Oh what a dignity is it to have God for our Father! What a happiness to have free fellowship with him in this dearest relation! In thy daily hearing and reading his word, observe, O my soul, what is spoken of this holy fellowship; and seek to maintain it, and to improve it in every appointed way, particularly in keeping the command of thy dying friend—

Do this in remembrance of me. When his disciples meet together for this purpose, then place the whole dependence of thy heart upon thy crucified Saviour. Considering the infinite and everlasting efficacy of the sacrifice of his body and soul to take away sin, draw near in faith to feast upon it, for his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed. Look well to the end of the institution. It was not only to remind thee of, but also to convey to thee, all the blessings of that one offering, which perfects for ever. It was to teach thee that thy spiritual life, and every grace and comfort of it, are as dependent upon Christ crucified as the life of thy body is upon the meat and drink of this world. Thy life comes from his death. Thy life is nourished by feeding upon Christ thy passover, who was sacrificed for thee. He intended by the bread to point out unto thee his body, and by the wine, his blood—by eating and drinking them, thy taking and living upon him—by thy bodily support received from them, the nourishment of thy soul by eating his flesh and drinking his blood. He would have thee to look through the signs to the things sanctified. Thou art not to rest in the outward act, but to rest in the promise in the word of God. Thy faith is not to be exercised about the Lord's Supper as a duty; but it is to be exercised upon his word; and what he has therein promised to make it, that thou art to expect in taking it. He appointed it to be the means of communicating with him, and of thy enjoying fellowship with him in his sufferings. It is a spiritual believing act, in which thou art invited to partake of the paschal lamb. It is the Lord's passover, and will certainly answer every purpose for which he instituted it. He appointed it to be the means of safety from the destroyer, of deliverance from bondage, of free and full forgiveness of all sins, of a happy passage through the Red Sea, and of the everlasting possession of the promised inheritance. For these gracious purposes the Father's love gave his Son to be a lamb slain, and then a lamb feasted on: and the Holy Spirit makes it a feast indeed. It is to the believing receiver, spiritually, whatever the passover was to the Jews on their coming out of Egypt. It is a communion with the blessed Trinity; with the Father for providing such a banquet of love: with the Son for giving himself to be a lamb slain, and to be a spiritual repast to his people in earth and in heaven; with the Holy Spirit for rendering the bread which is broken the communion of the body of Christ, and the cup of blessing the communion of the blood of Christ: communion signifies union with—the believer united to Christ—one with Christ—a member in his body—lives in him, and on him, has communications of life, nourishment, strength, comfort, &c. as the members have from their union with the head. He has a real inward fellowship with Jesus in his cross and passion, in his resurrection and ascension, in his intercession and sitting at the right hand of the Majesty on high. He communicates now with Jesus in all the blessings of his Father's love, and will communicate with him in all his Father's glory. Oh what a privilege is the Lord's Supper when it is thus the means of communion with the Son, and with his Father through the Spirit! What an honour is it to be admitted to a feast instituted by the Lamb of God, and for the enjoyment of the love of God! What a blessing is it to sit down now to the marriage supper of the Lamb, and to partake by faith of its spiritual realities and delights! There is nothing beyond this upon earth; and it has sometimes been to the believing receiver a foretaste of heaven. Yes, blessed be God, it has been, even to thee, O my soul, unworthy as thou art of one crumb from the Master's table, a feast of fat things, of wines kept, even of fat things full of marrow, of wines kept, and well refined. And when thou hast not been so highly feasted, yet thou hast enjoyed solid communion. Partaking of the bread and wine according to the Lord's institution, and depending on the Lord's promise, thou hast been fed and nourished at his table. The virtue of the Spirit has been put forth in thy heart, and thou hast as truly by faith eaten the flesh and drunk the blood of the Son of man, as thou didst eat the bread and drink the wine. It was, strictly speaking, a communion: being united to Christ, thou wast a partaker of Christ, and hadst fellowship with him in his life and death. Oh pray for more of this. Beg of the Holy Spirit to increase thy communion with Jesus, that thou mayst live more in him and on him, and thereby enjoy more of the love of thy heavenly Father. Plead his promise, and expect the fulfilling of it: "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me," John vi. 56, 57.

Viewing the duties of the first table in this light, how exalted are they and spiritual! What a glory does it put upon them that the believer has fellowship with the eternal Three, and in prayer, and praise, in hearing and reading the word; and at the Lord's Supper, he enjoys their covenant mercies, partaking of them now as really by faith, as ever he will by sense in heaven? The law written and engraven in stone was glorious; but the law thus written upon his heart excelleth in glory. The two first tables of stone were broken; the other two are lost; but no time shall deface the writing of the Holy Spirit. The new heart, turned in love to God, shall keep his impression for ever. Faith should rest securely upon this; because he has undertaken to abide for ever with his own people, that the purposes of the Father's love, and the blessings of the Son's salvation, may be always enjoyed by them. In remembrance of this great truth they keep the Lord's-day. They rest on it from labour, declaring thereby their belief of the rest which the eternal Three have provided in Jesus—a rest in their souls—given without their labour and pains—secured to them by covenant—kept for them by almighty power—a sabbath remaining for the people of God, into which they shall as certainly enter, as Jesus, their forerunner, is entered. Sabbath signifies a day of rest. It was set apart in memory of God's finishing the works of the first creation: and is observed now in memory of his finishing the works of the new creation. The end for which the world was made will be answered soon; and then it, and all the works therein, shall be burnt up, and the place of them found no more: but the glorious work of the God-man shall endure for ever. In honour of this greatest work of God, we keep the Lord's-day. It is his Sabbath—a day eternally famous for his finishing the work of salvation, and entering into his rest. "And we who have believed, says the apostle, do enter into rest." We do enter into it now by faith, and we share with him in his Sabbath. The atonement which he made, the righteousness which he wrought out, the victory which he obtained, the works which he perfected for ever, and the glory which he now inherits, we enjoy at present by believing, and enter upon the possession of them. According to our faith, such is our rest. He that believes, without doubt or wavering, in the finished salvation of Jesus, he will have the peace of God ruling in his conscience; he will experience the perfect love of God to him, which will make him rest in his love to God; and then he will delight himself in the ways of God. This is the Christian sabbath. It consists in resting upon Jesus, and in depending upon his having finished the works of redemption, and then in living upon them for our souls as much as we do upon the works of creation for our bodies.

Sweet is the day of rest, spent in this holy employment! Happy time! set apart for spiritual intercourse with God, and consecrated for keeping up fellowship with him in his fatherly love in Jesus, and for receiving from him communications of his graces and blessings. Thrice happy day! in which this fellowship is kept up, and these graces and blessings are enjoyed. By this heavenly converse the inward man is renewed with growing strength: his faculties are enlarged; and their happiness is increased: by which means he comes nearer to the spiritual rest of the heavenly sabbath. He calls it his delight, holy of the Lord, honourable; because the end of its institution is answered to him, and he has on it happy communion with his God. When he draws near to God in his appointed ways, he finds God in them, and experiences his loving kindness, which is better than life itself. Blessed is the man who is thus highly favoured. He enters within the vail into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, and finds a most loving Father upon a throne of grace. In every service on the Lord's day he seeks a more intimate acquaintance and more spiritual fellowship with him. His very heart is engaged in this work. His soul thirsteth, and his very flesh longeth to meet God, as he has met him in the sanctuary. Therein he has found communications of grace, which have rendered the ordinances delightful indeed. He rejoices in hopes of meeting God, and of drawing near to him in prayer; of praising him still more and more for his abundant mercies; of hearing the reviving sound of Gospel grace, and of everlasting love; and of receiving it, not as the word of man, but, as it is in truth, the word of God; and of sitting down to the banquet of heaven in communion with Christ crucified, through him partaking of the Father's love by the Spirit's influence. Blessed is he of the Lord, who is thus spiritual in sabbath duties. By keeping up constant communion with God in them, his blessedness is increasing. He is already in possession of the same things which his elder brethren are enjoying in heaven; and he will become more heavenly-minded while he maintains daily fellowship with the eternal Three in their covenant offices and blessings.

Consider, O my soul, that these privileges are thine. Look well to thine improvement of them. Remember, thou art already, by believing, entered into rest. Thy sabbath is begun—a day whose sun shall never set—whose glory shall shine brighter for evermore. May thine enjoyment of this rest, which is so glorious, be growing, until thou attain to the eternal sabbath. Oh, pray thy Lord to lift up the light of his countenance upon thee, to vouchsafe thee more of the love of his heart and more of the bounty of his hand, more communion with him, and more communications from him, that thou mayst be growing up into Jesus in all things, and be ready, whenever he calls thee, to enter in with him into his perfect rest.

Thus the first table-duties are kept. By the teaching of the Holy Spirit they become Gospel privileges. When he makes us new creatures in Christ Jesus, then we take the Three in Jehovah to be our God. We know our Father in Christ, believe in him, and love him. We will have no other gods but him. We give his honour to none, his name to none, our time and heart-service to none, but him. His love made known to us, engages our affections, and puts us upon seeking fellowship with him in all appointed ways. Yea, the more we know of his perfect love to us, the more we are disposed to love him, and to witness it in every thing we do. It becomes our study to walk before him in all well pleasing; for we find it our happiness. Whether we eat or drink, rise up, or lie down to rest, follow our worldly calling, or have any dealings with men, we endeavour to do all in faith. This makes the common things of life spiritual actions; because in them we maintain intercourse with God. This is indeed the heavenly temper of the children of the Most High. They seek the presence and the blessings of their Father in Jesus in all they do. They are taught to live in a simple dependence upon him. They acknowledge this dependence by looking up to him for every thing needful, and having received it by giving him all his glory, then they are returned in heart and life to that God from whom they had departed by unbelief.

Most blessed return! For now the old sinful nature, with its affections and lusts, is pardoned, and thereby they have lost their dominion. They have no right to exercise their tyranny any longer. The base, selfish tempers which rendered a man a plague to others, and often a burden to himself, are dethroned. The pardoning them is subduing them. These always go together. They kept the understanding in darkness; but now it is light in the Lord. They blinded the conscience, and made it insensible; but now it has seen its guilt, and has found peace with God. The heart was engaged in their service; but now God has set up his throne in it, and sweetly rules over the affections. Thus a free pardon brings a man into liberty. He ceases to be a slave to his selfish tempers. A full pardon brings him full victory over them; for then he has the blood of Jesus to cleanse him from all sin, and the Spirit of Jesus to subdue all sin. He is taken into the protection of Christ, and is his free-man. None shall make him a slave. The Spirit of Christ rules in him, and makes him willing to live under the reign of grace. He dwells and abides with him, to preserve in his heart the love of God, and to produce in it the proper fruits of that love towards men. Thus he brings the sinner to love the Duties of the second table, which our Lord has summed up in one sentence: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." This love was lost at the fall. Nothing is in mankind, by nature, but selfishness. He is a slave to divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another. Every age has felt this malady, and complained of it; but no human means have been able to remedy it. Fine systems of ethics, and beautiful plans of natural religion, have been tried; the aid of strong reasoning, assisted with the force of logic and metaphysics, has been called in, but all in vain. Selfish tempers broke through their cobweb arguments, and sported with their imaginary bonds. Sometimes they polished the outside a little, and made a man a courtier: he looked, and smiled, and seemed to love; but they did not reach his heart. This is the prerogative of the Lord God. He only, who made us creatures, can make us new creatures. And until we are new born of God, we have every thing in us opposite to brotherly love. But when we are born of the Spirit, then we are taught of him to love one another. He teaches it, and he enforces it. His lessons are entirely practical. He not only informs the understanding, but also influences the affections. Having disposed and enabled the heart to love God, he evidences the power of this divine love by its genuine fruits towards men. These are inseparable from their cause. Divine love is never without brotherly love; for, so far as the love of God is felt, it produces loving tempers: it opens and enlarges the heart, as the warm beams of the sun open and expand the flowers. The agency which performs this is almighty. The Holy Spirit, having begotten the new nature, writes upon it the law of love. He keeps it willing to resist, and makes it able to overcome, the selfish tempers of the old man. The apostle Peter has given us a delightful description of the manner of the divine proceeding herein, 1 Pet. i. 21, 22, 23. "Christ was manifest in those last times for you, who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God: seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently; being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever." The Christians, to whom he writes, were partakers of the new birth: they were born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible. The Holy Spirit was the author of their regeneration. The word of truth was the means which he made use of: they obey the truth through the Spirit. By believing it they were begotten again to a lively faith and hope in God. They evidenced their love to him by their unfeigned love of the brethren: they love him that begat, and loved those also that were begotten of him. From whence it appears, that the love of the brethren is not in the heart by nature, but is from the grace of the Holy Spirit. He gives a new heart, and he sheds abroad in it the love of God, which, by his influence, works mightily in opposing and overcoming our selfish tempers, and in establishing the practice of second table-duties. These spring from divine love. The Holy Spirit joins them together, as the cause and the effect. He teaches no man to love God, without teaching him also to love the brethren. He rains and shines upon the tree of love: under his cultivation it thrives. He brings forth the sweet and loving tempers of the new man, and they bear fruit abundantly. And blessed fruit it is; for God has great glory from it, and men much good. Love thinketh, speaketh, and doeth no evil. Yea, it cannot be in the heart, without a desire to do good to all men, especially unto them that are of the household of faith—to do good to their bodies and souls—to give honour to whom honour is due—to preserve their lives—their property—their chastity—their good name—to bear no false witness, but always to speak the truth of them—and to covet none of their blessings, either spiritual or temporal. This is morality—christian morality—for it is learned nowhere but in the school of Christ. What his Spirit teaches, he enables also to perform, which moral persuasion cannot. He gives a will and a power to put off the selfish tempers of the old man, and to put on the loving graces of the new man: these graces he preserves by his almighty agency, and calls them into daily practice, through faith working by love—love to God from a sense of his infinite goodness—and love to man for God's sake. Thus the second table-duties, when done out of gratitude to God for his infinite mercies, help the believer on in his walk heavenwards, and are the means of maintaining constant fellowship with his God.

Is this, O my soul, thy happy experience? Examine carefully. What are thy tempers? What is thy practice, with respect to loving thy neighbour as thyself? There is great complaint in the world of the want of brotherly love. And no wonder. It cannot be in them who are wholly lovers of themselves. But may not the same complaint be taken up of the household and family of faith? Are not the children of the same Father deficient in brotherly love? Yes, they are. Too, too often they live below their privilege, and thereby bring great dishonour upon God, and give great offence to men. Be humbled, O my soul, for thine own failing. Remember, what reason thou hast to mourn for the infirmities of thy love—how barren it is in its proper fruits—how cold when it should be fervent—how polluted when it should be pure—how covetous when it should be liberal. Hast thou duly attended to the cause of this? and does it grieve thee to thy heart? Wouldst thou be saved from self-love, and increase in brotherly love, yet more and more? Since this is thy case, meditate carefully upon what is promised, and pray earnestly for what is provided, for the subduing of those tempers which are enemies to brotherly love, and which, if not subdued, will hinder thee from enjoying the love of God in thy walk with him.

First, Consider thy state. Thou art a pardoned sinner, not under the law, but under grace—freely, fully saved from the guilt of all thy sins. There is none to condemn, God having justified thee. He sees thee in his Son, washed in his blood, clothed in his righteousness; and he embraces him and thee, the head and the members with the same affection.

Secondly, Consider what is promised to them who are in Christ. Sin shall not have dominion over them. Pardoned sin shall not reign. It cannot; for it is dethroned. Thou art therefore free from its bondage. Stand fast in this liberty. Now the condemning power of sin is taken out of thy conscience, make use of the grace provided in Jesus to deliver thine heart from the love of it, and thy conversation from the slavish service of it. And remember, this grace is almighty. Trust in it, and thou shalt be saved from the tyranny of every sin. Therefore,

Thirdly, Read the great charter of grace, and mark to what glorious privileges thou art entitled. Being saved from the guilt of all sin, and having a promise of being saved from the dominion of all sin, as the Lord's freeman, thou art by faith to claim thy birthright and to enjoy it. Since Christ has given thee liberty, to whom shouldst thou be a slave? Put off therefore the old man with his lusts and deeds; serve him no longer: it is a blessed part of redemption to be saved from his service. God be thanked, that he may be put off, as a garment which you have done with, and will be put on no more. Away with it, it is filthy and abominable altogether. Yea, worse still: the plague is in it. Death and hell are in it: for the old man, sinful nature, thus to be put off, is a body of sin; and selfish tempers are his members; such as anger, wrath, malice, lies, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry. These must be put off, or they will be always plotting and acting against brotherly love. Therefore the new man, renewed in the spirit of his mind, opposes them, and is mighty through God to mortify them. By the same power he puts on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long suffering, forgiveness of injuries: even as Christ forgave him, so he forgives: and unto all these graces he puts on love, which is the complete binding of them together. What an amiable character is here of the new man! He is created anew in Christ Jesus, that he may exercise every kind and benevolent temper to the brethren. He is renewed in his heart to the unfeigned love of them; and is enabled to manifest it by every work and labour of love. And lest the vile tempers of the old man, still in being, although dethroned, should get dominion again, he is strengthened mightily by the Spirit in the inner man to crucify them day by day. Since this is hard work, consisting in continual and severe self-denial, no less than in cutting off right hand, and in plucking out right eye lusts, for thine encouragement to persevere, consider,

Fourthly, that thou art in Christ—a member in his body—and in him thou hast perfect and eternal redemption from the old man of sin with his affections and lusts. The more this is believed, the more will the fruits of it appear. Faith in the absolute and everlasting victory of thy glorified head will animate thee as one of his members to resist thy vanquished foes, knowing thou art a partaker of his victory, and in his strength and to his glory thou art fighting against them. In him thou hast already conquered. In him thou shalt be more than a conqueror. Reckon thyself, therefore, to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God in Jesus Christ thy Lord. And depend on him for the power of his death, that he may put it forth in thee, and mortify sin, and for the power of his resurrection to quicken thee to newness of life. Thy communion with him in his death and resurrection will be in proportion to thy faith. If thou believest steadfastly that thou art one with him, thou wilt find the effect of it in steadfast communion. Cleave then to him, as a branch to the vine. Planted together in the likeness of his death, thou wilt find virtue coming from him to crucify thy selfish tempers. Planted together in the likeness of his resurrection, thou wilt find virtue coming from him to keep thee alive to God. To this fellowship with Jesus thou art called. Thou hast a right to communicate with him in his life and death. And whilst thou art enjoying it by the faith of the Son of God, sin shall have no more dominion over thee than it has over him. This being thy glorious birthright, O my soul, put honour upon it. Enjoy it in the peace of thy conscience, and in the love of thy heart. Read thy perfect redemption in Jesus from every thing opposite to brotherly love, and improve this thy experience. As there is sufficient grace promised and provided for thee, see thou make use of it, and manifest it openly in thy tempers and in thy walk; for, consider,

Fifthly, Thy God and Father calls upon thee to give glory to him for his love to thee by exercising love towards the brethren: and thou art bound to this by ten thousand ties. Has he loved thee freely? dost thou know it? and is the grateful sense of it upon thy heart? How then can it be hid? It cannot; it will manifest itself, as light does. The Father has chosen thee in his Son, that he might communicate to thee of his goodness; and he has made thee a child of light, that thou mightst reflect the rays of his goodness upon others. Thou art to show forth the praises of him that hath called thee out of darkness into his marvellous light. He hath called thee out of the deadness and blindness of thy natural state, and hath enlightened thee with the light of life. How marvellous, that it should ever shine upon thee! Marvellous indeed, that thou shouldst shine, as a light in the world! Admire this grace. Let others admire it with thee by seeing the reality, and by feeling the comfort of it. As the sun not only enlightens, but also enlivens with his fruitful rays the face of the earth, and cheers every creature upon it, so let thy light shine before men. Give them clear proof of thy love to God by thy love to them: let them feel the blessed fruits of it, that they may see thy good works, and glorify thy Father who is in heaven. Love in thy heart will show itself: it will communicate its gracious rays, and the Father of lights will have the praise. This should be thine end, as it is his. He aims at his own glory in all his mercies: this aim should be thine also. Thy Father calls upon thee to do good to others, that he may be glorified thereby. Oh what a high calling is thine! What an honour does God put upon thee! Thou art to bring him glory from men—from his own children: for their bowels are to be refreshed by thee—and from others, that, whereas they would speak against thee as an evil doer, they may, by thy good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation. Aim at this. Look at no motive to do good to men below the glory of God: and remember, thy doing it may be the means of his visiting them, as he visited thee, with his great salvation. Oh blessed fruit of brotherly love! May it be the happy effect of thy light shining before men! May God be daily honoured by it, and the comfort, and, if it please him, the salvation, of his people be thereby promoted! Yea, Lord, this is my prayer. My heart says, Amen.

If thou findest it very difficult to live in the constant practice of brotherly love, meditate, O my soul, upon the Gospel motives for an increase of faith, and seek for the promised assistance to enable thee to love others as God hath loved thee. Above all, expect the effectual teaching of the Holy Ghost. He only can write this delightful law upon the heart—the fair impression of it is kept by his power—and the exercise of it in thy tempers and walk is the work of his grace. Oh pray then for a constant supply of the Spirit, that in all thy dealings with mankind it may appear thou hast been with Jesus. Set his most amiable life before their eyes. Give them reason to honour his beneficence, from thy copying it legibly after him. Let his love to thee be glorified from thy labour of love to them. Study to show forth his praises, and go about doing good, as he did. And hereby convince the world that Jesus Christ was the greatest moralist, and that his disciples come the nearest to the perfect pattern of their master: as a poet of our own observes—

> Talk they of morals? O thou bleeding love!
> Thou maker of new morals to mankind!
> The grand morality is love of thee.

The love of Jesus teaches and enforces the love of the brethren. The spirit of Jesus writes it upon the heart, and makes it practical in the life. And thus the two tables are joined together: and love to him that begat, produces love to them that are begotten of him. When the happy believer is walking in this love to his Father and to his family, then he will live in the observance of the duties which relate to himself; for he was taught them when he returned in his heart to God. And every step he walks with God is in the practice of them.

The first temptation was an offer of independence—"Ye shall be as Gods"—man was drawn away by it, and fell from his high estate. Still this mother sin is fruitful in fallen man. In great mercy there is a pardon provided, and in the way of receiving the pardon, there is a remedy for it. The infinite wisdom of God so contrived the way of our recovery, that without Christ we can do nothing. His salvation undertaken and finished for us, his salvation applied to us, the blessings of his salvation enjoyed by us in time and in eternity, are the free gifts of his free grace. He is the author. He is the finisher. He carries it on from first to last. All our sufficiency is of him. We cannot without him so much as think a good thought. Therefore his redeemed people are brought off from all trust in any other object, and are taught to place their whole dependence for salvation, and for every thing that accompanies it, upon the Lord Jesus Christ.

To this end, the Holy Spirit, the great convincer of sin, had made them acquainted with themselves. He had awakened them to a right knowledge of their state, of which they had not been sensible before; and they found that they were fallen and apostate creatures. He showed them sin in its exceeding sinfulness, and they tasted some of the bitter fruits of it: they felt in what a dreadful condition their departure from God had left them—so ignorant that they could not by any human means attain to the least saving knowledge of God—so guilty, that let them do all they could, still the condemning sentence of the law stood out against them—so unholy, that soul and body were sold under sin, and ready to every unholy word and work—so utterly helpless, that it was impossible they should of themselves attain true happiness, or escape deserved misery. The Holy Spirit taught them these lessons practically. His conviction carried demonstration with it. He not only made them feel their guilt and their danger, but he also opened a way for pardon and safety. He led them to Jesus, and in him they found every thing needful for their salvation—treasured up for them by the free covenant love of the Father, secured to them by the fulfilling of all covenant conditions in the life and death of the God-man—and received by the faith of the operation of the Holy Ghost; by whom they were made new creatures in Christ Jesus—members under him their head—united as intimately as the branches are to the vine—and living by, and in, and on him, every moment, and for every thing. Thus the glorifier of Jesus teaches all his members to depend upon the fulness of their head, and he abides with them in order to keep them in this dependence. He testifies to them of Jesus—"He is your whole salvation, your all in all; you have not, you never will have, any thing to glory in, but in the Lord—whatever good you receive comes from his grace—whatever evil you escape, is from his blessing—and if ever you have eternal life, it will be the free gift of God in Christ Jesus. Your bodies also are dependent on him, as well as your souls: personal, family, national mercies, are his royal favours, and bestowed out of his sovereign bounty." Thus he teaches believers. He humbles them, that they may exalt the Saviour. He makes them poor in spirit, that they may live upon his riches. He keeps them sensible of their own emptiness, that they may be making constant use of the Saviour's fulness, and living in an absolute dependence upon him for every thing. While they live thus by the faith of the Son of God, every high thought is brought into subjection to him. Pride is daily mortified. Self-complacency is abhorred. Self-admiration is abominable. Humility is become their clothing, and they cannot put it off; because every moment they are making use of it. Sins, wants, miseries, temptations, &c. are continually reminding them of their vileness, and of God's goodness. And this truth, enforced by the Holy Spirit, makes them willing to learn of Jesus to be meek and lowly. They become teachable scholars, and sit very low at his feet, where they attain to true humility of heart. And this influences their whole behaviour. In a deep and abiding sense of their entire sinfulness and helplessness, they loathe themselves before God, and walk humbly before men. They feel they are of themselves nothing but sin, and if left to themselves, can be nothing but misery: therefore they put their whole trust and confidence in a covenant God, and his free grace has from them all its glory.

What is thy knowledge, O my soul? and what is thine experience of this christian poverty of spirit? Art thou acquainted with it in the ground of thine heart? and is it in thy daily practice? Examine thyself, and with diligence: for it is a most blessed grace, advanced to high honour in the court of Jesus. To it he has made many exceeding great and precious promises. Oh! pray to him for this royal gift. Wait on thy divine Prophet, and hear his lessons. He teaches as man cannot. He recommends, he gives, the grace of humility. He makes his scholars truly humble in heart. Observe his abasing doctrine; and may all within thee bow to the power of it!

Observe how he humbles the sinner. He convinces him of his sinful state, of the corruption of his whole nature, and of the depravity of every faculty of soul and body. The sinner is made to feel it and to live under the sense of it: and in order to fasten the conviction, clearer discoveries are daily made of this corruption: for it is a mystery of iniquity. There is no tracing to the bottom its deep laid devices, and never ceasing workings. The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. Who can know it? There is not a man upon earth who knows all that may be known of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and of his own sinfulness. When the Lord, who searcheth the heart, has laid open some of its infinite evil, he continues to discover more. Every day brings to light strange workings of corruption. The convinced sinner has deeper views of his helplessness and of his unworthiness: and after many vain legal trials, he at last finds it impossible for him to do anything for which God should pardon him and save him. Thus he is laid low, with his mouth in the dust—Behold, I am vile, filthy, and abominable altogether. I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

These are the humbling lessons which the Holy Spirit teaches. He convinces the sinner that there is neither help nor hope in himself, and so leaves him nothing to trust in but the salvation provided in Jesus by covenant love, and given freely by grace. And the manner of receiving this salvation is such as cuts off all occasion of boasting: for faith is the only means appointed of God; and faith is his gift; not bestowed upon the worthy, but upon the ungodly; not for any merit in them, or for any terms or conditions which they have performed or ever will perform; but by an act of absolute sovereignty to the praise of the glory of his own grace. He will have mercy because he will have mercy. Oh humbling consideration! How low does it bring the sinner! How must his proud heart be abased, while he feels himself a debtor for every thing good to the mere will and pleasure of God! And so long as he enjoys those good things, he is kept poor in spirit; because he has none of them in himself. They are laid up in the fulness of Jesus; are to be had from thence only by faith, and are received as the sense of his wants leads the believer to make use of them. Living by faith is the death of self-importance. Then the loftiness of man is bowed down, the haughtiness of man is made low, and the Lord alone is exalted.

Observe, O my soul, what an honour God has put upon this grace: "Before honour is humility." Whom God honours, he humbles first. He giveth grace to the humble: because the humble give him all his glory. The highest throne which he has upon earth is in the humblest heart. To it he vouchsafes his constant presence, and makes the greatest communications of his love: "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." Oh what an honour is here promised to the humble! the greatest they can have on this side of heaven. God will dwell with them; and what a blessing! and his temple shall be in the humble heart. The high and holy One passes by what is in highest esteem among men. He stains the pride of human greatness and goodness. He does not vouchsafe to set up his throne with the princes, nor to give his honour to the learned, of the world: but he puts honour upon the contrite and humble: he condescends to visit them; yea, he delights to dwell with them, and in them—the Highest above all heavens in the lowest hearts. There he communicates his choicest love and richest favours. O my God! bestow upon me this grace which in thy sight is so precious. Humble me, that I may be revived with thy presence, and refreshed daily with thy love. Give me more humility, and fit me for nearer fellowship with thee. Bring down every high thought, and let me find it true that God resisteth the proud, but giveth more grace unto the humble.

Thus the true poverty of spirit is needful, not only to bring the sinner to Christ, but also to preserve the believer in communion with him: for so long as he walks by faith, every thing will tend to promote this communion. In the daily sense of his wants, he will go to his bountiful Saviour for a supply. In the feeling of his misery, he will depend on his loving Saviour for relief; whereby he will be led to more intercourse with him. What he finds wrong in himself will bring him to live more by faith, and as faith increases, so will his delight in God: he will grow more sensible of his weakness; and that will make him stronger in the Lord. He will know more of his own heart, which will humble him, and keep him dependent on the grace of Jesus. He will see reason not to lean to his own understanding, but ever to pray, Lord, guide me by thy good Spirit! Viewing spots and blemishes in his best doings, his triumph will be—"I will make mention of thy righteousness, Lord Jesus, even of thine ONLY." Thus everything will humble him, and lead him to live more by faith; by which means he will get faster hold of Jesus, live in nearer fellowship, and be receiving out of his fulness grace for grace—two graces at once—the blessing needed, and thankfulness for it. Hereby a sweet intercourse will be kept open. To the humble, God delights to give grace; and they delight to return him his glory. The more he gives, the more glory would they gladly return. And he does give more, and he receives it back again in thanks and praise. Blessed grace! by which this holy fellowship is maintained. Happy humility! by which the heart, being emptied of self, is made capable of receiving the fulness which is of God. Then is the promise fulfilled—"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven"—it is theirs now—not only in title, but also in possession: for the kingdom of God is within them. And they are partakers at present of its blessings and glories, as truly, though not so perfectly, as they will be in heaven. Meditate, O my soul, upon this divine grace. Thou seest the necessity of it. Oh pray earnestly for it, and for more of it. The great idol SELF must be dethroned where God reigns. Thou canst not walk with him unless thou art humble in heart. And if thou hast been walking with him, thou wilt be taught to stop whenever thou beginnest to look at thyself with admiration. Oh beg of the Lord, then, to give thee the true gospel poverty of spirit. It is to be in constant practice, and used for every thing: for thou seest how it keeps up fellowship with God, who makes the greatest communications of himself to the humblest. And the reason is plain: because they return him all his glory. If therefore thou wouldst have much grace in exercise, pray for much humility. O my God! whatever thou givest, give humility with it, that I may not seek self in it, but thine honour; nor lay it out upon myself, but to thy glory. Meek and lowly Jesus, make me like thyself: keep me learning of thee till I am perfectly like thee. I would come always poor to thee to receive of thy riches, and to receive with them an humble heart to praise thee for them. Oh let thy glory be mine end and aim. Let me and mine be thine—I humbled—thou exalted. Let thy graces and gifts bring thee in a constant revenue of praise. And may thine increasing goodness be joined with a constant increase of humility, that my heart and all within me may bless and praise thy holy name to-day and for ever, Amen. And,

Let this appear in my whole behaviour to others. This is another blessed fruit of humility. It has an influence over the believer's intercourse with mankind, and renders his tempers and manners loving and amiable. Pride was not made for man; and yet it is in all men, and is the chief parent of human woe. It sets people above their place, and makes them think that they could support the greatest fortunes, and are able to manage the most difficult affairs. Others, as proud as they, deny them their fancied superiority. Hence come wars and fightings, public and private. The sweet grace of humility is sent from heaven to relieve those distresses: for into whatever bosom it enters, it renders men kind to one another, tender-hearted, ready to every good word and work. Thus runs the divine exhortation: "Be ye kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, in honour preferring one another." This is heart-humility, which the Holy Spirit requires, and which he bestows. He brings his disciples into humble subjection to God, and then to one another; which has the most happy effects upon public, social, and private happiness. How would these flourish if all men were of a meek and quiet spirit! But there is none of this among the unconverted, and, alas! how little is there among believers! How often are they found, in the proud spirit of the world, acting contrary to the lowly spirit of Jesus! And yet it is not for want of precept, nor for want of promised help; but it is because they are not walking by faith, as becometh the gospel, nor out of love to God's glory studying to recommend humility by their practice. Observe, O my soul, the remedy provided of God for the subduing of all selfish tempers; and pray that it may be effectual in thy life and conversation. "Do ye think that the scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy? But God giveth more grace; wherefore he saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble." This scripture cannot speak in vain; for fallen man is certainly such as he is here described. The spirit that dwelleth in him, in his own nature, lusted to envy—a passion made up of pride and discontent—offended with God—and displeased with the blessings which he bestows upon men. It is an enemy to the love both of God and man, and transgresses the law of both tables. Pride brought it into heaven, and the fallen angels brought it into this world. Ever since it entered by sin, natural corruption breaks out very much in envy. But God giveth more grace, to conquer this passion, than sinful nature has to put it forth. He not only gives grace to pardon it, but also more grace to subdue it; so that envy loses its dominion in the reign of grace. We cannot subdue, any more than we can pardon, envy, pride, and such passions; but grace is almighty. Want ever so much, use ever so much, God has still more for you. And he gives more when the creature is humbled enough to take it out of the hands of his mercy. Thus he overcomes envy: "for he resisteth the proud;" he is at open war with them, and they with him. Pride lifts up the creature against the Creator, and puts it upon seeking happiness out of God: this is resisting his sovereignty, attacking his providence, and opposing his law. He is concerned to pull such rebels down, and he says their pride goeth before destruction: "But he giveth grace unto the humble," he gives them grace to humble them, and being emptied, he delights to fill them; for then they are disposed to receive his grace, and to value it. Whatever God gives, the humble give it back again to him. They have the blessing; he has the praise: which is the just tribute due to him for his gifts. And he gives more grace where he can get more glory. Thus he subdues self-conceit, with its various proud workings. And as grace reigns over them, humility prevails; which has a friendly aspect towards mankind. It keeps brotherly love in the heart, and tends mightily to the practice of every social virtue. Humility suffereth long, and is kind; humility envieth not; humility vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked; thinketh no evil.

Consider, O my soul, those motives to a holy walk. Put them altogether. Weigh them carefully again and again. Do it faithfully, as in the presence of God. And then try whether thou art walking in the way of duty with a free spirit. Dost thou proceed upon evangelical or upon legal principles? Dost thou serve God for wages, or for love? Examine thy heart. God looks chiefly at it. How is it in duty? Is thine obedience to justify thee in the least? or does it spring from a sense of thy being justified freely and fully? Art thou going about to establish thine own righteousness? Or dost thou submit to the righteousness of God? Art thou working from life or for life? I require thee to examine diligently, by the light of the word and by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, what thy motives are; for there is no acceptable obedience but what is done in faith. Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. If thou art acting aright, the love of Christ is constraining thee to obedience. Thou art living under the influence of free grace. Thy conscience is at peace with God. Thou hast sweet liberty to serve him without fear. Thy heart delights in his service; and love makes his ways the joy of thy soul. Thou knowest what Jacob felt when he served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her.

A Gospel spirit does the same to God—love makes long service short—and hard service easy. Nothing is pain, which love does. And this is gospel obedience. It is faith, working by love, which refines duty into a grace: the commandments are exalted into privileges: the ordinances become happy means of fellowship with God. The believer meets God in them, and by free converse he exercises and improves his love. He draws near to God, and God draws near to him in prayer, in praise, in hearing the word, at the Lord's supper, and in all sabbath duties. In these ways God manifests his gracious presence, and the believer rejoices in it. God communicates his grace, and the believer receives it with thankfulness. O my soul, pray before duty for much of this communion with God in it. Seek it as the one great end of all duty. And if thou findest it, bless and praise the goodness of thy God. But still seek to be more spiritual and evangelical, that the fruits of thy fellowship with God may appear in thy practice of the duties of the second table. Love to God will manifest itself by love to men: for the Holy Spirit teaches all his disciples to love one another; and he teaches effectually. He not only makes them understand what brotherly love is, but he also gives it. They become partakers of the grace, and are enabled to practise it. Thus he recommends and enforces his lessons. He renders his scholars kind to one another, and tender-hearted. He puts forth his mighty power, and subdues the vile, selfish tempers of the old man, and brings into use the benevolent tempers of the new man. While he carries on the gracious work, his disciples grow more acquainted with themselves, and learn heart humility. He makes them feel their fallen state, their sinfulness and their danger: in the sense of their guilt and of their distance from God, they are willing to receive Christ for their whole salvation, and then to enjoy in him all the blessings of the Father's love in earth and heaven.

If thou findest it difficult, O my soul, to walk according to this rule: if to obey from love to God—to love men for God's sake—and in the sense of thine own vileness to be humbled to the dust—if these be hard lessons, consider what makes them so. Where is the difficulty? Is it not in thyself? And is it not chiefly in thy not using and not bringing into practice the principles advanced in the former chapters. Duty must be hard if the spring of obedience be not in motion; but if this act freely, then all will go on well.

Thy whole conduct through life depends upon the nature of the salvation of which thou art a partaker by grace. Consider it attentively. The growing knowledge of it will engage thine affections to a willing obedience. Is it not a complete salvation—an absolutely perfect work—yea, the greatest work of God? Because all the rest come from it, and lead to it. Is it not the infinitely wise contrivance of the eternal Three, for which everlasting glory is to be given to every divine attribute? When every other work of God shall cease, for this all heaven will to eternity be ascribing honour, and blessing, and praise, to Father, Son, and Spirit. Attend, O my soul, to the scripture account of this salvation. Review the glory of it. Read again and again the revealed descriptions of it, till thy heart be satisfied that this salvation is as perfect and complete as the Lord God Almighty could make it. This is its character. Hast thou studied it well? and art thou well grounded and established in the belief of it? Mind! this is the foundation. If this totter, so will all the superstructure. Oh, pray then, and be earnest in prayer, that God would enlarge thy views of the infinitely glorious and everlastingly perfect salvation which is in Christ Jesus.

As thou growest more acquainted with it, thou wilt see less reason to be discouraged at the experience of what thou art in thyself. It is a salvation for sinners—such as thou art—and no way differing from thee. Only when they are called to the knowledge of the truth, they are acquainted with their fallen state, are made sensible of their helplessness and of their misery, but are made willing to cast their souls at God's command upon the Lord Jesus, trusting to the peace which he made by the blood of the cross. And art not thou in the happy number of these redeemed sinners? Dost not thou believe the record which God hath given of his Son, and look upon it as thy lawful warrant—to make use of what is laid up in the fulness of Jesus—thine to take freely—thine to use fully—the more the better—thine for receiving, without any condition or any qualification? He loves to give, and without money or money's worth. He thinks himself honoured by the pensioners of his grace, who bring nothing to recommend themselves but their sins and miseries, and yet trust in his promised relief. Herein he glories. When they come to him believing, he bestows his royal gifts upon every one of them: and so far as they believe, he withholds nothing that is needful for their holy walk in the way of duty.

These are the principles which thou art to bring into practice. Carry them, O my soul, into every act of obedience. Go to prayer and every duty with this faith, that thou art in Christ, and in him a partaker of his finished salvation. Then the Father's love to thee will be manifest, and thou wilt have sweet fellowship with him in all thine approaches to the throne. Whatever thou undertakest, forget not this leading truth. If thou lose sight of it, thou wilt get into darkness: if thou art not influenced by it, thou wilt be brought into bondage. Upon this absolutely perfect salvation thou art to live by faith upon earth, and thou wilt have nothing else to live upon by sense in heaven. Trusting to the complete work of Jesus, thou art to walk with thy God in time, as thou wilt follow the Lamb in eternity, receiving all out of his fulness. Oh view him in this light, and it will have the happiest effects upon thy daily walk. While thou art receiving from him grace for grace, thou wilt live with him in sweet friendship; duty will be the way and means of enjoying the love of thy divine friend; and the more thou art in his company, the more delightful will be the way of his commandments, These are the privileges. Read the promises concerning them. Call to mind what thy Father in Jesus has engaged to give his children. Has he not provided grace sufficient for them? And is it not for his honour, as well as thy profit, that he should give both the will and the power to walk humbly with him? Oh plead his promises. Bind him with his faithfulness. Be importunate with him; and pray without ceasing. Let this be thy daily plea:—

O my God! order my walk according to thy holy word. It is thy mind and will that I should love thee with all my heart, and soul, and mind, and strength, and my neighbour as myself: but I am not sufficient for these things. There is no pure love in my soul by nature. Every affection in me is turned from the Creator to the creature. I am in bondage, a slave to lust, sold under sin. I cannot love thee, infinitely lovely as thou art, until thou break my bonds asunder, and set my soul at liberty. But being now redeemed from guilt and fear, I am become thy freeman; and for the unspeakable redemption that is in Jesus, thou wouldst have me to serve thee. Blessed be thy holy name for requiring mine obedience upon this sweet motive,—"I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage." On this account, obey me; because I am the Lord your God, and I stand related to you, as your Redeemer from slavery. O my gracious God and Father! I desire upon this motive to keep thy commandments. I believe thou art my God in Jesus, and through him I have redemption from bondage to my sins and enemies. With this free spirit would I always go to duty: but I cannot walk in this liberty, any more than I could at first attain it, without thy grace. O my God! let the spirit of adoption abide with me, that he may draw me nearer to thee in thy ways and ordinances, and I may in them enjoy more of thy presence, and of the light of thy countenance. Thee I seek in them. Thou art the end of all ways and means; and if they lead me not to thee, I go empty away. Gracious God, make thy commandments the joy of my heart, and let them be the means of keeping up holy intercourse and happy fellowship with thee. This my heart pants after. Duty without this is nothing worth. I wait in thine appointed ways for the visits of thy grace, hoping to grow in knowledge and faith, in hope and love. The communion which I have enjoyed has increased my longing. My soul is athirst for God, praying to be more with thee, and more like thee. And is not this what thou requirest, and what thou hast promised to do for me? Grant me then, my gracious God, the prayer of my heart. In all my duties let me enjoy thy presence and communications of thy love. Let me do them in faith, and with a single eye to thy glory. Let me be thus spiritual and heavenly-minded in them, that I may grow up into Christ Jesus in all things.

And I desire, Holy Father, to grow in love to thee, that I may manifest the fruits of it by my love to mankind. Pardon every selfish temper, which is opposite to the love of the brethren: and teach me to love them, as thou hast loved me. Whatever thou hast promised, fulfil in me. Make me, O thou Spirit of love, like the loving Jesus. Give me his benevolent tempers, and help me to imitate his beneficent actions. Let his love to me be the pattern of my love to them. Since thou hast in much mercy made me a child of light, Oh let me shine before men, that they may see and feel my good works, and may glorify thee for them. And the more thou doest in me, and by me, humble me still more, O my God. Keep me meek and lowly, always ready to give the glory of all my mercies to the Three in Jehovah, Father, Son, and Spirit, to whom be equal honour and praise for ever and ever. Amen.

CHAPTER VII.

The believer goes on his way rejoicing to God.

HAPPY is the man to whom it is given on the behalf of Christ to believe. He has the blessing of peace. He is reconciled to God through faith in the blood of Jesus: and he is freely justified through faith in the righteousness of Jesus. The Father has accepted him in his beloved Son; and it is the joy of his soul to know it: therefore he loves God, because God first loved him. In the enjoyment of this love he finds his heaven begun. By the same Spirit who manifested it, and shed it abroad in his heart, he is kept seeking for more discoveries of it. In every appointed means he waits. As the hart panted after the water-brooks, so panteth his soul after more of the presence of God, and of the light of his loving countenance. Having a command—seek ye my face—he obeys it from his heart: but his chief view in obedience is to behold the face of the Lord turned to him in love. He wants fellowship with God in duty, which highly ennobles and also endears it to him. He performs it in faith, and in a free spirit. He goes to it as a beloved child to a most loving parent; and his heavenly Father meets him in it, receives him graciously, speaks to his heart, and makes him sensible that he can deny him no manner of thing which is good. Hence the ways of duty become ways of pleasantness. The farther he advances in them, and the more spiritual he grows in the performance of them, he finds clear communications of his Father's grace and love, which still increase his joy, and afford him surer earnests and happier foretastes of joy unspeakable and full of glory.

As for the ungodly, it is not so with them. They are always seeking after joy. They are busy, and weary themselves in the pursuit of it; but they cannot find it. While they are turned in heart from the Lord, they look downwards for it, where it is not. They expect it will spring out of the ground: and if they cannot discover it upon the surface, they will dig into the bowels of the earth for treasures of hidden joy. But they disquiet themselves in vain. It is the sovereign decree of the Almighty that nothing can make a sinner truly happy but God in Christ. This they will not believe; and therefore they go from creature to creature, from object to object, inquiring, Where is the best joy to be found? Each promises them—It is in me. But each disappoints them. And yet they go on, seeking it to-day in that very thing which deluded them yesterday. Yea, their foolish hearts are willingly deluded. They love to be pursuing what it is impossible they should attain. If, after many trials, they find the emptiness of one creature comfort, then they turn to another: and they will try the whole compass of beings and things, and will at last die in the trial, rather than seek for joy where it is holy, perfect, and everlasting.

The believer is saved from this vain pursuit. He has been convinced of the insufficiency of the creature to make him happy. He has seen an end of all perfection in it. He can say with the royal preacher, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity"—all is changeable and imperfect under the sun; for the whole world lieth in wickedness and under the curse. Deeply sensible of his error in having sought for joy in the way of destruction, he now seeks it in the living God. Here he comes to the supreme good, the spring-head of true joy: and the streams which he receives from thence are always in proportion to his faith. If this be strong, there is great joy in the soul. If this be weak, joy is at a low ebb. The effect is according to the cause which produces it. Joy in God is the effect of faith; according to the apostle's prayer, "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy in believing." There is a present fulness of joy, which we have by believing, as there is a future fulness of joy, which we shall have by sense. So that joy rises as believing does—fulness of believing brings in ALL joy—present enjoyment increasing as the title to fulness is clear. The present is the divine pledge of the future, and is therefore given us, that by believing we may now rejoice in the Lord, and be glad in the God of our salvation.

From hence it appears how necessary it is to the believer's walking in joy that his understanding should be clearly enlightened with the knowledge of the doctrines of grace, and that his heart should be established in the belief of them. Thou canst not, O my soul, review them too much, nor meditate upon them too long; for they enter into the very essence of all true joy. Study the Gospel method of making reconciliation for iniquity, which was the work of Immanuel, and of reconciling man to God, which is the work of the Holy Spirit. Has he done this in thee? and art thou reconciled to God? Is thy conscience at peace? Is thine heart happy through faith in the atonement and righteousness of thy Saviour? Art thou satisfied of thy perfect acceptance in the beloved? Dost thou therefore obey thy Father out of gratitude, and go to duty to meet him, and to have fellowship with him in his love, and to glorify him for it? Dost thou find his presence? Is he with thee in all means? and art thou seeking in them for nearer and more intimate communion with him? Since this is thy case, what return wilt thou make for such inestimable favours? Surely thou wilt be glad in the Lord, and wilt rejoice in the God of thy salvation. Being at peace with him, and a partaker of his love—waiting for the establishing of this peace and love in the way of obedience, and expecting more communion with thy God in the way of duty, who can have greater reason to rejoice? A saved sinner, delivered by mere grace from wrath and hell, entitled to all spiritual blessings from Christ Jesus, and already admitted to partake of them, may sing and make melody in his heart all the way to heaven. And yet, alas! how often art thou, O my soul, in heaviness, walking in distress and cast down, as if thy hope of rejoicing was in vain! And this is not thy case alone: it is too common. How many of God's children spend their days in a mournful frame, and seem to forget their high calling and undoubted title to the fulness of joy. Meditate a little upon the ingratitude of this behaviour; and may the Gospel motives to rejoice in the Lord always be the means of saving thee from an unthankful and mournful temper.

First observe, he requires it of thee. The Scripture speaks much of the holy joy of believers, and calls for it. They are in duty bound to be glad in their God, as much as to pray to him: for he is always bestowing mercies upon them, which demand their everlasting tribute of thanks: and they cannot be thankful without being joyful. How closely were these two united in the holy Psalmist! None ever was more famous for praising God, or for rejoicing in God. What he felt himself he often exhorts the redeemed to experience: "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous; for praise is comely for the upright: light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart: rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness." Remember his righteousness and holiness, how great they are, and how great the grace is which has found out a way to make you righteous and holy. Remember those blessings with faith, and your hearts will be glad, and your mouth will praise God with joyful lips. What a sense had the prophet of those blessings, when he broke forth into this acknowledgment! "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord! my soul shall be joyful in my God: for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation; he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels." These are the wedding garments with which the heavenly bridegroom adorns his church, and in which he introduces her to the eternal banquet of love. Blessed are they who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Blessed are they indeed: for they are arrayed in royal robes; their souls are all glorious with the beauties of Immanuel, with his divine righteousness and matchless graces. They have reason now to rejoice greatly: for they shall soon come to Sion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away for ever. These Scriptures prove evidently, that believers are called upon to rejoice. It is their bounden duty to be glad in their God; for they are not living like his children, and making up their happiness in their Father's love, unless they are rejoicing in his rich and everlasting blessings: for

Secondly, Joy arises from the sense of some good. Joy in God arises from the sense of his being our chief good, and of our interest in him. And this is the joy of faith: which is not in the least like the light frothy joy of the sensualist, nor the wanton mirth of the unthinking multitude. It is not drawn, as worldly joy is, from vain perishing things, but from the word of God, which standeth fast for ever. It springs from the revelation of grace and mercy in Jesus, and from giving credit to it. Whoever honours its testimony as the truth of God, will be convinced that he, trusting to the atonement of Jesus, shall never perish, and trusting to the righteousness of Jesus, shall have everlasting life. Hence come joy and peace in believing. The conscience is reconciled to God, and is at peace. The heart is made sensible of the love of God, and rejoices in him. This was the experience of the sweet singer of Israel in the 33rd Psalm: "Our heart shall rejoice in the Lord, BECAUSE we have trusted in his holy name." This is a good reason. Whoever trusts in God will certainly rejoice in God: for by trusting in his word, and by depending upon his faithfulness, he cannot be disappointed of the good things which God has promised. We have an instance of this in a trembling, despairing sinner, who had drawn his dagger, and was plunging it into his heart. In that moment he heard of Jesus. It was given him to feel his want of a Saviour. Sirs, says he to Paul and Silas, what must I do to be saved? And they said, Believe in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house. And they preached unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house. And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes, and was baptized, he and all his straightway. And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and REJOICED, BELIEVING. Oh what a happy change was here, and made by believing! The self-murderer forgets his bloody design, and drops his dagger: hears of a pardon, and believes. His black despair gives way to sweet peace in God. His misery ends in the knowledge of a joyful salvation. How blessed are they that believe! God has pronounced them, and God will make them, blessed. There is no misery deserved, but by faith they are saved from it; and no good promised, but by faith they may now enjoy it. They have therefore all the reason to rejoice that any person can have on this side of heaven: for,

Thirdly, This joy is distinguished from the vain joy of the world by its author. It is the gift of God. It is one of the graces of the Spirit of God. St. Paul says, "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy," &c.—love to God, and then rejoicing in God. When the Spirit of adoption enters into any heart, he manifests by believing the love of the Father, and thereby excites it into holy joy. He comes to make the soul happy in its return to God. It is the very end for which he is sent from the Father and the Son, and therefore it is called the joy of the Holy Ghost. It is his fruit, produced by his influence, and kept by his power. It is like himself, of a spiritual and heavenly nature—a pure affection—in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth. He refines it from creature-delight, and exalts it above sensual pleasure; for it is the result of nearness to God, and the effect of fellowship with him: which is,

Fourthly, another blessed ingredient in the joy of believers. It has God for its object. It is joy in God as their God, their supreme good, known, believed in, and enjoyed. The Holy Spirit has consecrated their hearts for fellowship with him. He has brought a free pardon for past apostacy, and full power to dethrone creature-love. And he abides in their hearts to subdue it. He enlightens their understandings to see the vanity of the creature, and the fulness of God, and he enables them to reject every thing that promises them happiness, if they cannot enjoy God in it. Thus he keeps their hearts chaste, and fixed upon God. Their joy becomes simple, as their faith is: for this looks at the finished salvation, and, resting entirely upon it, sees God perfectly reconciled: thereby it lays a sure foundation for their joy in God; because they now know him by faith to be their God, and can see their interest in all the blessings of his love in Jesus. This is the fountain head of joy, from whence flow rivers of pleasure for evermore. The nearer they live to the fountain head, the more communion they have with God: their hearts become purer and holier, and their joys are more spiritual and heavenly.

This is the only remedy for the miseries with which the world abounds. Men are uneasy, seek for joy, and cannot find it, because they seek where it is not. They go to broken cisterns, which cannot hold it. They are disappointed, and wonder; but still go on, spending their days in this vain pursuit. They do not attain any true joy: it flies from them, and at last they lie down in sorrow. What thanks then, O my soul, art thou bound to return unto thy God who has saved thee from this delusion! What a mercy it is that thou hast been led to the fountain of joy! Oh, live near it; and from it derive all thy streams. Seek them all in God, and seek them in faith, upon the warrant of the divine promise. He has said, "The meek shall increase their joy in the Lord: they shall have it and increase it." The more meek and lowly thou art, the more wilt thou be joyful in God. Pray, then, for growing humility, that thou mayest experience the sweetness of this Scripture—"Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, rejoice"—there is always a matter of joy in the Lord. What a fulness did he find who testifies of it thus—"My joy shall be in the Lord—God is the gladness of my joy—all my springs are in thee—for thou art my exceeding joy." Happy prince! All his springs came from God, and led him to God. He did not draw his happiness from the brooks, but from the fountain. The brooks dry up, but the fountain cannot. He did not rejoice in his crown and dignity, in his victories and treasures, or in any worldly good. He enjoyed God in them, who was the joy of his heart. He only valued the gifts for the sake of the giver: for he made use of them by faith; and then they were the means of bringing him near to God, and of keeping up communion with God. Whatever does this, is a great blessing: and every thing should do this to a believer. While he lives like a child of God, he exercises his faith for spirituals and temporals; and his heavenly Father blesses him according to his word, wherein he hath caused him to put his trust, and gives him continual matter for joy and thankfulness.

This is the portion of the Lord's people. He has entailed it on them. It comes to them by inheritance. And thou art bound, O my soul, to make use of it. Thy duty and interest call upon thee to enjoy much of it. Thy gratitude for the exceeding great mercies of the Father's love cannot be so properly shown as by rejoicing in him; for the thankful heart cannot but be joyful. It feels happy in God. My meditation of him, says a grateful soul, shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord. This is a just tribute, which the Father expects, and which the Holy Spirit enables his children to return him. "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance: IN THY NAME shall they rejoice all the day; and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted." These are great privileges, which God has promised and does bestow upon his people. It is true they do not all alike rejoice with great joy; but they all ought. When their faith is weak, their joy is little. But they have the same right to believe, and to rejoice in believing. There is the same provision made for the whole family and household of faith. They are interested in the same covenant, have the same promises, and the same faithfulness to make them good. They have perfect security given them, that they may trust and not be afraid. The people who know the joyful sound of a free grace salvation have good reason to believe without doubt or wavering. By such a faith they will see God perfectly reconciled to them, and will behold the light of his countenance shining on them in love. A blessed sight! to see it clearly is glory begun; to walk in it is glory increasing. What is it but heaven, to rejoice all the day long! But then it must be IN THY NAME, in the incarnate word, in Jehovah Jesus; by faith in whose righteousness they shall be exalted, as high as a creature can be—being justified freely and fully they have access into this perfect grace wherein they stand, and they rejoice in hope of the glory of God; and not only so, but they rejoice in the way to glory, in tribulations also, knowing that all things are working together for their present and for their eternal enjoyment of God.

For their encouragement thus to rejoice in the Lord, he has promised them that the joy which he gives shall not be taken away, which is

Fifthly, Another great privilege. True joy is the gift of God. Is a grace of the Spirit of God. It has God for its author, and God for its object: and it has this prerogative annexed to it, that no one can destroy this gift of grace. The Lord Christ declares that he will not suffer any creature to take away what he bestows. What a rich cordial was this to his dejected apostles! They were mourning upon account of his leaving them, and were sadly cast down, as men without hope. But he revives their drooping hearts with a promise—"I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no one taketh from you." This is indeed strong consolation: for it is one of the streams which maketh glad the city of God—a stream that never fails. it runs out of the ocean of free grace; and none can stop its running back into it. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you, says Jesus. The world giveth empty joys, continueth them by an uncertain tenure, at last takes away all its gifts, and leaves its deluded votary to suffer the vengeance of eternal fire: whereas Christ gives what is truly good, solid and lasting. His gifts are without repentance. He is of one mind in continuing, as well as in giving; for his motives are in and of himself, and always the same. His own mere love, his free grace, and the good pleasure of his own will, dispose him to give and to continue his favours; and his one end is his own glory. Therefore he will not take away the joy which he has given, and he will suffer no one to take it away. He secures by his power what he gives by his love. Such is the believer's right to rejoice in the Lord always. His title is indefeasible. God has freely given him in Christ all the good that can make him happy: and he enjoys it, and is happy, so far as he lives by faith. While he goes on from faith to faith, his joys increase. Growing faith brings him in a richer harvest of joy: and he is commanded still to proceed, until his joy be full; which is a

Sixth privilege, peculiar to joy in God. Other springs fail: they are often dry: and when they run the fullest, he that drinks of their water thirsts the more. But joy in God has a satisfying fulness. The fountain is always full, yea, is always running over; and all the streams bring happy peace, and holy joy. The more a man drinks thereof, the more sober and spiritual he becomes; for whatever flows out of this fountain is grace, sanctifying grace: the more we partake of it, we grow more like it. There is in it the divine property of conforming and assimilating us to itself; for it weakens the corruption of nature, and strengthens the faculties of the new man; and as these grow stronger, they cleave closer to God, and have more fellowship with him. By which means they partake more of his joy. A happy partaker of it declares—"In thy presence is the fulness of joy." And therefore he prays—"Make me full of joy with thy countenance"—the presence of God with me, and his loving countenance shining upon me, is the fullest joy upon earth. And this comes from the grace of the Holy Spirit, and is received by faith. Our Lord says to his disciples—"These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." His end in speaking was to give them good reason to rejoice, and to continue rejoicing; and if they received what he spake with full assurance, as they ought to do, it would produce in them a fulness of joy. And this would be so much to his honour and to their profit, that he commands them to ask it of the Father in his name—"Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." To the same purpose the apostle John, treating of the person of God incarnate, through whom we have fellowship with the Father, in all the blessings of his love, says, "These things write we unto you, that your joy may be full." His design in writing was to lead them to nearer fellowship with the blessed Trinity, and to stir them up to seek in it their fulness of joy: and they have it full who, satisfied of their title to the Father's blessings, are receiving them freely out of the Son's fulness by the grace of the Spirit. It becometh them well to rejoice; for in the same blessings there is fulness of joy for evermore—joy unspeakable, and full of glory.

Put all these considerations together, and then see, O my soul, what a rich provision thy God has made for the joy of thy heart. Admire and adore him for his great salvation, for delivering thee from sin and sorrow, and for the free gift of righteousness and life eternal. To pardon, to justify, to glorify such a one as thou art, oh, what divine and infinite grace! What wilt thou return him for manifesting his love to thee, and for engaging thy love to him? How great is thy debt for admitting thee to fellowship with him, as thy God and Father, and for the gracious communications of his love to thee in Jesus! What a subject is here before thee for delightful praise! Look at it in any true light; thou hast reason to be glad with exceeding great joy. God, the infinite fountain of good, is thy God. He rejoices in thee; therefore thou shouldest rejoice in him. He has loved thee freely. How canst thou be sensible of this without loving him? His love has blessed thee with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. Whilst thou art receiving them out of his fulness, how canst thou refuse to thank him with joyful lips? He says that he rejoices over thee to do thee good: the belief of this should fill thy heart with joy and gladness. Indeed, there is nothing in God but what should be to thee matter of rejoicing. His faithfulness and justice are on thy side, as well as his never-failing compassions; for he is thy God, thy covenant God; he has given his Son for thee and his Spirit to thee: by his grace thou hast been called to enjoy fellowship with the Father and the Son, and to partake of their covenant blessings. It is thy privilege to be improving this fellowship, and even upon earth to be tasting of the joys of heaven. May thy faith bring thee in a rich feast, yea, a fulness of joy, till thy cup run over with the rivers of pleasure which are at God's right hand for evermore.

Remember, O my soul, it is thy duty and thy privilege thus to rejoice in God. It is thine interest and thy happiness. Thy God requires it of thee as the grateful acknowledgment of his favours: they are all of grace, inestimably rich and everlasting. He would have thee to honour him for the gifts by rejoicing in the giver. Joy is the sense of his goodness to thee. And canst thou receive the present, and live in hopes of the eternal blessings of his goodness, and yet be without a joyful sense of them? Examine well, and try thyself. How is thy heart? Is it happy in God? Is it happy in nothing but God? Whatever a man puts his trust in, from that he expects his happiness. In what then dost thou trust? Certainly thou wilt say, my trust is in the mercy of God for ever and ever. And should not he be the only matter of thy joy, who is the only ground of thy faith? If he be, then why art thou so often cast down, O my soul, and why art thou so disquieted within me? How many dejections, what great sorrows, and what frequent heaviness dost thou experience! From whence come they? Joy is sown for thee. The sower is the Son of man. The Father has promised it, and bestowed it on thee for thy portion: thou hast been called by grace, and the joy in believing is thy birthright. What is the reason thou art not happy in thy God, and rejoicing in him always? Search diligently for the cause. Depend upon it, there is a great mistake somewhere. The Scriptures cannot be broken, which treat of continual joy in God. The promises cannot fail: the promiser is faithful: and yet thou art not always a partaker of the promised grace. How is this? Oh, try to come to the bottom of this error. May the spirit of wisdom lay it open to thee, and may thy sorrow be turned into joy.

Perhaps thou art seeking for some reason to rejoice in thyself. This rejoicing is not good, although it be very common. It has a bad motive: it comes from pride. The end is bad: it is to exalt and aggrandize SELF, which was man's sin and ruin. It is forbidden in Scripture—He that rejoiceth, let him rejoice in the Lord. If thou couldst find something in thyself to be pleased with, thou wouldst then rejoice in thy pride. Sorrow for not finding it may bring thee right; because it may be the means of showing thee that thou hast nothing of thine own to look at with self-complacency. What hast thou, that thou hast not received? And if thou hast received it, why wouldst thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? Hast thou any thing of thine own but sin? Who gave thee grace, and made thee to differ from others? Was it not God? Did not all come from the good pleasure of his own will? He saw nothing good in thee at first to move him to be gracious; and what he continues is to the praise of the glory of his own grace. If thou hast lost the sight of these truths, no wonder thou shouldst go mourning. God will not vouchsafe his joy to them who sacrifice to their own net, and burn incense to their own drag. He humbles and fills the humble with good things, but he sendeth the rich empty away. The rich rob him of his glory, and he refuses them his grace. Watch, therefore, over thy proud legal heart. Be jealous over it with a godly jealousy; and entreat the Holy Spirit to bring down every high thought in it, that thou mayest exalt God, and he may exalt thee. Remember the promise—"The meek shall increase their joy in the Lord:" seek ye the fulfilling of this: for joy in him is the death of self-seeking and self-pleasing. Oh, beg of God then to keep thee meek and lowly, that thou mayest be willing to live upon Jesus by faith, and to receive all the joy of his fulness of joy.

Perhaps thou art mourning under a sense of thy sinful nature, and groaning under the burden of indwelling sin, as holy Paul did, and as all the dear children of God do, when they are in their right mind. This is godly sorrow, which worketh repentance not to be repented of. It is the true poverty of spirit, to which the Lord hath promised his blessing. Indeed, every one that has it, is blessed; because it is not only consistent with the truest joy, but also is the very proper temper of mind, in which it is preserved and increased. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Self-knowledge is the breaking up of the fallow ground, and is the ploughing and harrowing of it; thereby making it fit for the good seed, and to receive the enlivening influence of the heavens. The more any man knows of himself, the greater reason will he have to seek the harvest of his joys in God; and, seeking by faith, he will find them. If he be in the deepest humiliation, he will be then best disposed to rejoice in God. This holy joy generally rises highest when self is lowest; as the highest tide is always after the lowest ebb. Remember this, O my soul, in the most abasing views of thy fallen nature, and it will lead thee to seek, and in believing to find, that in God which thou hast not in thyself. The empty, and none but the empty, may be filled with his joy. Let every discovery of thine emptiness lead thee to trust more in the salvation of God, and to enjoy more of its blessings. And then thou mayest be, with Paul, always sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. Sorrow for self is the greatest friend to joy in God. Self-loathing is accompanied with the sweetest delight in God. May the apostle's experience herein be thine—"We are of the circumcision, who worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." O pray for the same grace, and thou wilt find that the less confidence there is in the flesh, the more rejoicing there will be in Christ Jesus.

Perhaps thou hast been tempted to feel for joy in some creature-comfort, and hast not received it as the gift of God, nor enjoyed it by faith, nor returned him his glory. Thou wast looking below God for happiness, and expecting it from some other object. The world had herein ensnared thy heart. There is not a greater enemy to the children of God; because it has objects suited to their senses, and capable of gratifying them; by which the world is always trying to engage their affections, and always succeeds, when they are not living by the faith of the Son of God; for this is the only victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. See, whether thy sorrow did not spring from some worldly disappointment. Thou hadst dropped thy shield, and wast falling asleep in Delilah's lap; but, awaking, didst find the pleasure turned into pain. This pain may be very profitable. It should convince thee of thy dreadful mistake in leaving God for the world, and should stop up thy way for the future. Now thou seest the need of being cautioned—Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world: for all things, out of Christ, are under the curse: there can be no blessedness in them. The whole world lieth in wickedness; it cannot make thee happy, any more than hell can. But it is thy privilege to be delivered from this present evil world, and to be saved from the love of it. This is a blessed part of thy salvation. Expect it by faith. The victory is obtained; seek thy share in it. "I have overcome the world," says Jesus. Almighty Lord, overcome it in me, as thou hast overcome it for me.

But remember, O my soul, whatever be the real cause of thy sorrowing, there is joy in God, and for thee; because he is thy God; in whom there is nothing to make thee sorrowful, but every thing which can possibly give thee true joy. The blessed Trinity are in covenant for thee and for thy salvation. And it is thy bounden duty, trusting to the finished work of the Son, to rejoice in the love of the Father. In the peace of thy conscience, and in the love of thy heart, thou art required to have fellowship with the Father and the Son, and to be always giving thanks to the Holy Spirit for this fellowship. Every enjoyment of their covenant blessings in earth is a foretaste of heaven, and a pledge of joy unspeakable. What thou hast now by faith, thou shalt certainly have in everlasting possession: for there is a sure foundation laid in the covenant for thee to build thy hopes upon of rejoicing evermore. Thy Father has chosen thee and accepted thee in his Son. He has set his heart upon doing thee good, and he changeth not. His loving kindness is like himself. He has drawn thee by his Spirit to believe in his love, and he has promised to love thee unto the end. He has freely given thee all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus, and he reserves the full enjoyment of them for heaven. Nothing can rob thee of them; because he keeps them by his power for thee, and thee for them. How should this help to fill up the measure of thy joys! The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, is thine, with all that his love can do to make thee happy. What canst thou want, but more faith? The Lord increase it, that thy heart and conversation may be more with him. As thine affections are set more on things above, the temptations to the love of the things below will be weakened. The sweetness of heavenly communion will deaden thee to the charms of the world; yea, the world will be to thee as nothing, while God is ALL. And is he not all in all to thee? Consider his nature, his personality, his covenant, his works, his graces and his blessings—view them in their greatness and goodness—thou hast an interest in them all. His wisdom contrives for thee—his providence watches over thee—his love waits to be gracious to thee—his holiness and justice and truth are thy friends—all his attributes have engaged his power to bring thee to glory. The perfect salvation of Jesus is thine. His Father is thy Father in him, and has nothing in his heart but love to thee. The Holy Spirit has manifested it to thee in believing to be a perfect, unchangeable, and everlasting love. Whatever the Godhead has promised to give of happiness, is promised to thee: and thou dost believe it, although thou art sometimes in heaviness through manifold temptations. But even then there is joy laid up for thee in God: joy enough in the fountain. It is always full: only thy faith draws out of it sparingly. Enough in God to turn thy sorrow into joy, if faith did its perfect work. Oh for more faith, that thou mayst have more joy in believing.

From whatever cause, then, O my soul, thy sorrow arose, it certainly did not spring from any thing which faith discovered to be in God. Be assured of this: and learn to improve thy sorrow about other things, so as to see thy need of trusting more and of rejoicing more in God. If thy sorrow be lawful, coming from a sight and sense of thy sinfulness, there is good reason thou shouldst abhor thyself and repent in dust and ashes: but this is also good reason for joy in thy God; because the Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit. He gives to them the knowledge of salvation, and makes them glad with the joy of his countenance. Thus he delivers them from their sins and sorrows. He continues his loving kindness;

surely his goodness and mercy shall follow them all the days of their lives! When they are under temptations to seek for joy in other things, he hedges up their way, that they cannot attain the expected good; or if they do, he embitters the enjoyment, and will not let them find any thing in the creature, but vanity and vexation: by which means he would teach them to derive all their joys from him, and from nothing but him. Wait, O my soul, and read, and hear, and pray; be diligent in all means for thine improvement in this divine lesson. Seek the presence of God, wherever thou art. Expect his blessing upon all that thou doest. Account his love thy chief happiness; and be sure, nothing can make thee happy in which thou canst not enjoy his love. If riches increase, the world smiles; health be granted thee, relations are kind, and all things go well: set not thy heart upon them. Look at the bountiful hand which gives, and depend on the grace which sanctifies those things. They are not worth having, but as they come from and lead to God, and so may be spiritually improved. If thou canst live by faith, and enjoy God in them, then they are real blessings; for then thou wilt receive them as his gifts, and use them to his praise; thou wilt eye his goodness in them, and admire him for them. And while he continues them, thou wilt be dependent on his grace to keep thy heart from idolatry, that thou mayst love the gifts only for the sake of the giver. Whatever thou art going to do, ask thyself—How can this be the means of my rejoicing in God? If it cannot, avoid it. If it come with all the world's flatteries, and make thee the greatest offers of joy, fly from it. There is deadly poison under its gilded outside. Lay it down as an invariable rule of thy walk, that nothing can do thee good but what thou canst enjoy God in. He is the only source of good: and every thing is to thee what he makes it; not what it is in itself: as such, all is vanity. But it is good when God makes it so. True joy is from him, and in him. It is the gift of his grace, and does not stop at any of the streams, but goes up to the fountain head, from whence they flow, and there finds its comforts. O my God! teach me thus to seek my joys in thee, and to make thee my crown of rejoicing.

For thine encouragement, consider, O my soul, what he did to the travellers gone before thee in the way to Sion; how he comforted them and made them glad with the joy of his countenance. He led them indeed through the valley of Baca, of mourning—the only highway to the kingdom; but they found a well in it—a fountain of living waters: they went on sorrowing for their departure from God, but were made glad at their hearts in being brought back by his grace: therefore they wept, rejoicing. Happy mourners! And hast thou not the same reason as they had to sorrow for thyself, and yet to be exceeding glad in God? Is not this also the case with all thy fellow travellers now upon the road? Their hearts are with God. He is their portion. His heaven is their home. They would not make up their happiness in the accommodations by the way, but in God, their treasure, their supreme good, and their everlasting joy. Neither would they be stopped by the inconveniences which they may meet with: these, improved by faith, will tend to make them long more to be at home for these will lead them to feel more of the true joy there is in God, and will thereby inspire them with higher strains of praise and thankfulness: so that every thing they meet with on the road will be sanctified to them, and will dispose them to make melody in their hearts unto the Lord. Their Father and our Father, out of the riches of his grace, has not only given them matter of thanks, but has also provided the very words to be used by them. Many a weary traveller has found them a rich cordial. His spirits have been raised, his soul and all within made happy, while he was singing the sweet and heavenly hymn. The gospel prophet, who had seen the glory of Immanuel, and who was the honoured penman of this divine poem, has left us a direction, when any one has a right to sing it, and to make it his own, Isaiah xii. 1. And in that day thou shalt say. By looking at the context the time here mentioned appears to be the day of the Lord's power, and when the Spirit of life enters into the sinner, and he is quickened from a death in trespasses and sins. A happy, eternally happy day. The same Spirit will be his comforter, will bring him to the knowledge of his salvation through faith in the gloriously complete work of Immanuel, by which he shall find himself freed from guilt and fear, and in Jesus made a partaker of grace and glory. Then the joy of the Holy Ghost is felt in his soul, and his heart is in tune to bless the Lord his God—O Lord I will praise thee, though thou wast angry with me; thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me. Behold, God is my salvation: I will trust and not be afraid; for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation: therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation. These wells are the fountains of grace, from which the heavenly travellers draw their holy comforts, and with which refreshed they go on from strength to strength, praising Jehovah and ascribing to him all the glory of their salvation. He was angry with them, and justly The fire of his wrath might have burnt to the lowest hell; and his law, his justice, his holiness, and his truth, would have been glorified for ever in their destruction. But, admired be his mercy, adored be his sovereign grace, he himself found out a way to magnify every divine attribute in their salvation. This was the wonderful contrivance of the Three in covenant. The Father accepted his coequal Son in the place of his people, and his obedience unto death in their stead: he is now perfectly reconciled unto them in Jesus: his anger is turned away from them. And when it is given unto them to know it: and they receive the comfort of it, when they have joy and peace in believing, oh what a day of light and glory then breaks in upon their souls!—a day sometimes clouded with the rising mists and vapours of the body of sin, but often so bright and serene, that the warm beams of the sun of righteousness shine directly into their hearts. These are times of great refreshing from the presence of the Lord. The communications of his love are then felt with pure delight: and the soul is made sensible that it is in Jesus a happy partaker of the fulness of joy. The man cannot contain his mighty bliss; but breaks out aloud into thanks, and calls upon the bystanders to admire the marvellous goodness of God. Behold! see here a miracle of grace!—God is my salvation—wonder with me at the exceeding riches of this love—Why me! What am I, that the most high God should be my Saviour? I am sure he never set his love upon one more unworthy, nor plucked any brand out of the burning that was fitter fuel for hell fire. O help me then, angels and men, to praise and adore that infinite mercy, which contrived, wrought out, and has now applied to me this salvation with all its blessings. My debt increases, and I want to praise him more: for in that unspeakable gift of his Son he gave me all things, and he has now given me faith, and has put me into possession. I have his word for it, and I believe it—a word of infallible truth, confirmed by promise, ratified by the covenant oath of the blessed Trinity. These engagements cannot be broken, therefore I will trust and not be afraid. On the part of the divine covenanters all is sure. They have given me the fullest security that can be; and I may take the comfort of it. They will never leave me nor forsake me, and my faith shall not fail. Blessed promise! I shall be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. Glory be to the Lord Jehovah, who is my strength—his almighty arm holds me up, and therefore he is my song—the same arm will carry me safe to the end; therefore my heart rejoiced in him, and with my song will I praise him. I will make my boast of his strength: all the day long will I be telling of his salvation. How can I mention too often these infinite mercies of my God? I love to dwell on the delightful theme. It warms my heart, it enflames mine affections, and raises my soul to heaven. My joys are all in this one—He also is become my salvation. He is my present salvation; for he has opened the fountain, and has opened my heart to receive the life-giving streams. How can I but bless and adore his holy name, while I am with joy drawing water out of the wells of salvation?

O ye blessed of the Lord, who have received the same salvation out of the infinite fountain of divine grace, assist me to praise. Your rejoicing with me will increase my joys, and improve my thankfulness. So it follows in the prophet—In that day shall YE say—YE, not one only as before; but the many partakers of the same mercies will sing in chorus. They will join in social worship, and with one heart unite in the common tribute of praise. Praise ye the Lord; call upon his name; declare his doings among the people; make mention that his name is exalted: sing unto the Lord, for he hath done excellent things; this is known in all the earth. Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Sion; for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee. Great he is indeed, infinitely—everlastingly great in himself—and to be admired for his excellent greatness in saving sinners. This is his greatest work, and it demands of them their highest praise; and they are glad to give it him. Happy are they now, when, humble and poor in spirit, they can exalt their Saviour God: but who can tell how happy they shall be, when he shall exalt them and make them partakers of his own happiness! Eternal salvation will demand the tribute of their eternal praise; and they will be most blessedly employed in paying it when they shall return to Sion with songs, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads. Crowned heads may well sing: for their coronation day will last for ever, and the king of kings will put such honour upon his royal friends, that all heaven will ring with his praises. They will with one heart and one voice adore God the Lamb; whose gracious hand wiped away all tears from their eyes, and made sorrow and sighing flee away for ever; and who gave them his joy and gladness, such as are even in heaven inexpressible, and will be to eternity full of glory!

O my God! accept of my poor mite. I desire to join all the redeemed in earth and heaven in blessing and praising thee at all times. I would give thee praise continually with my heart and with my mouth: I would rejoice in thee, and in nothing but thee; for thou art my God, my supreme good, and mine everlasting portion. Let me then, for thy mercies' sake, glory in praising thee henceforth and for ever. I ascribe it to thee now with a glad heart, rejoicing in hope that my praise will be better ere long, and never ceasing. Thou art worthy of all that angels and men can pay: to thee, holy Father, with the Son and Spirit, the Three in one Jehovah, be equal and endless praise. To this I give my hearty Amen.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Believer walks humbly with God, bearing his cross.

The happy believer is now advanced a great way in his journey. He has been brought to the saving knowledge of God—has received faith in his reconciled God in Jesus—has been taught by the Spirit to love his God—and has found the blessedness of holy communion with him in the way of obedience and duty, which makes him go on rejoicing; then it is become fit and proper that his faith and love should be tried. He must expect it. It is to the honour of God, to the good of others, and to the establishing of those graces, that proof should be made of them, and that they should be put, like gold, into the furnace. This is only a refiner's fire. If the furnace be very hot, one seven times more than it was wont to be heated, the gold will lose nothing. Sterling grace is purer and brighter for every fiery trial. Its enemies, who blow the flame, have no intention to refine it, and sometimes the believer himself cannot see how the means will answer the end: but God overrules every trial for his glory and the believer's good, and makes it more precious than that of gold which perisheth. Troubles, opposition from within and from without, all the difficulties he can meet with, only serve to purge out his dross, and to render him more fit for his heavenly walk. Herein the grace of God is most marvellous. Such a power as brought light out of darkness, is continually directing and sanctifying the crosses of the believer, so that not one of them can stop him; nay, the greatest of them help him forward in his journey, and bring him not only more safely, but also more happily, to the end of it. Adored for ever be the Father's love, which makes all things work together for his children's good.

When man was in paradise, there was nothing in him but what was conformed to the image of God. His will was one with the will of God. In this state there was no cross. Harmony ruled in the innocent breast; and God looked on his favourite man with delight. They were perfectly agreed; and they walked together in holy and happy friendship. But when man fell, then sin brought in sorrow, in the ten thousand miseries which the body suffers, and in the entire corruption of the faculties of the soul, particularly of the will, now at enmity with the will of God. Hence our crosses. Sin is their fruitful parent; and while we are in a body of sin and death, we cannot be exempt from suffering; for man is born to trouble, as naturally as the sparks fly upwards: but the unregenerate man does not feel the cause of this. He has no spiritual senses. He is dead to God. He does not know why he suffers, and he is not sensible of what he deserves to suffer; therefore he goes on merrily, laughing and singing under a load of guilt enough to ruin a thousand worlds. But when the spirit of life enters into him, and he is made to see his state, to feel his guilt, and to fear his danger, then he begins to groan under the cross. Every day he discovers how totally he had fallen, and departed in heart from the living God. He now tastes the bitterness of sin, and finds the deadly fruits of it. Although there be a remedy provided to bring the wanderers home, and he is made acquainted with it, yet he is without strength to apply it. He cannot by believing take the comfort of it. When it is given him to believe, he still has sin and suffering to exercise his faith. Against his corruptions and temptations he must be continually fighting the good fight of faith. From this warfare he can have no discharge but by death. He must take to himself the whole armour of God, and be under arms night and day, or he will never be able to resist the assaults of evil spirits, or to overcome the opposition of evil men. This is the heritage of all the servants of the Lord. All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution. If they be on the Lord's side, all his enemies will certainly be theirs; so that if they enter into his kingdom, it must be through much tribulation. The King himself went this way to the crown, bearing his cross; and he has assured us there is no other way—"Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, CANNOT be my disciple"—he must deny himself what by nature he loves, and must love what by nature he hates: unless he live in this state of self-denial, which is to be his daily cross, he cannot live in communion with me, as one of my disciples. If he be one of the highest of them, yet he must carry his cross; for he has still a fallen nature, and its senses and appetites are always lusting against the will of God; and it is like plucking out a right eye to deny them their gratifications, and to refuse them their much coveted pleasures. He is in a body of sin and death, and must carry his cross to his grave, being liable to all the sufferings which mortality is heir to, and all the way mortified under them, because he cannot bear them without faith, nor hold out without patience; and these graces are not of himself, but are the gift of God. He is also forced to carry another cross all his days, even the corruption of his nature, depraved in every faculty, and always inclined to evil. This is the burden and grief of the children of God, under which they all groan. And a sore and heavy burden it is, heavier for being continual, and for its always working against the grace and glory of the Lord Christ: for this infection of nature doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerated, and appears in nothing more than in their adulterous love to their own righteousness, of which they are so dotingly fond, that, after the Holy Spirit has divorced them from it, and their Maker is become their husband, even the Lord their RIGHTEOUSNESS, yet still an unlawful attachment to their own righteousness remains, and is the cause of the greatest crosses and of the heaviest trials they meet with in their way to heaven.

Hence the cross becomes necessary for the whole nature of fallen man, for body and soul. The sensual appetites are continually seeking their gratification in unlawful things, and the spiritual faculties are full of blind pride, and self-righteousness, and know no way to the divine favour but by their own works and goodness. The cross is indispensably needful to mortify the flesh with its affections and lusts, and to crucify the vanity of the mind, that, when it would glory it would have nothing left to glory in but the Lord. In this light let us consider the infinite love, which appointed the outward cross for the outward man, and the inward cross for the inward man; and let us see, how by each of them communion with God is preserved, and the believer is helped forward in his blessed journey.

CHAPTER IX.

The believer exercised with the outward cross, carries it with patience, and finds it a great help to him in his walk heavenwards.

We call that a cross which opposes our will. This opposition renders it painful and grievous. A very little matter, the least trifle, becomes a great cross when our will is set much against it. How, then, can the believer rejoice with a heavy cross upon his back? or how can he rejoice all his days if he must carry it to his grave? The blessed gospel discovers how this may be, and the blessed Spirit gives the experience of it; for he continues to teach the doctrines of grace, and under the cross he enforces them. What has been treated of in the former chapters, he now applies with life and power. The doctrines are put to the trial, and it appears that they are of God: for none could produce the effects which follow upon believing them, but an almighty arm. Faith is tried in the fire, and the believer is convinced it is in the faith of God's elect: for the promise is made good—"When thou walkest through the very fire thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." His love to his reconciled God is put into the fiery furnace, and it comes out, like the three children, sensible their God had been with them in the furnace, and their God had brought them out; for which marvellous instances of his love to them, their love was increased to him. This is God's way. He gives grace, and then tries it. When he has enabled the sinner by believing to find peace and love, then he would improve those graces by daily exercise; and if the exercise of them be very sharp and afflicting, it is only to establish the trust of his heart, and to confirm the affection of his soul more perfectly in his God. His God. Mind that. His God still. The cross is not sent to weaken that relation. He is the same tender Father to his children, when he puts it upon them, as when he takes it off: and he would have them by faith to experience it. While they depend on his being perfectly reconciled to them through the obedience and sacrifice of Immanuel, they will see the same paternal affection invariably set upon them, and always disposed to do them good. His love changeth not. The happy objects of it have given this glorious testimony, even when under his cross—"We know that all things work together for good"—they found it so. Whatever he sent to them came with a message of his love. "Hear ye the rod, and him that sent it." They hear what he says by it, for it speaks of the Father's love; and the belief of this quiets their minds under the stroke of his rod. Thus it answers his purpose—This cometh not forth of the dust, but is appointed for me: my Father sent it, not in anger for the punishment of my sins, but in the tenderness of his affection.—He is not dealing with me as the supreme disposer of all events, who may afflict, and justly, his rebel creatures according to his sovereign will; but he has sent me this affliction with a message of grace and peace—I know it is well ordered—I kiss the rod, and I bless him that sent it.

The apostle Paul uses this argument to the suffering Hebrews. They had endured a long and great fight of afflictions. They had need of patience: he therefore gives them in the 11th chapter a short history of the Lord's favourites, and shows that they all carried his cross, and that he supported them all under it; yea gave them strength to run their race, till every one of them won the prize: then he requires them to look to Jesus, the greatest sufferer, out of whose fulness they might receive faith to run, and patience happily to finish the same race. And, lest they should be weary through suffering long, or faint in their minds under hard suffering, he reminds them of the character of their heavenly Father, who out of the tenderest love appointed their crosses :—"Have ye forgotten the exhortation," says the apostle, "in which your Father speaketh unto you as unto children? My SON, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him: for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons: for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof ALL are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons." Oh what a blessed exhortation! How full of love—the love of God the Father—love to his child, who wants correction—love that would not touch him with the rod till he had most tenderly informed him of his gracious purpose: My SON, my beloved, this chastening is from thy Father. It was determined for thee by covenant love, and settled upon thee for thy portion in the great charter of heaven. All thy crosses were then mercifully appointed—their weight and measure—how long—how great—how many—what strength was needful to bear them—what comforts under them—and what holy fruits should be produced by them—all was fixed by love, is now given in love, and is to bring thee to greater enjoyment of my love. My dear child, despise not then my chastening, nor faint when I rebuke thee. Be assured it is for thy good. There is a needs must. It is so necessary, that I cannot love thee without chastening thee, nor receive thee among mine adopted without scourging thee. See, then, how thou takest my correction. Look at thy temper and behaviour under it. Examine. Art thou patient? Not suffering merely, but suffering quietly is the proof of thine adoption—If ye ENDURE chastening—If, when I afflict, thou canst possess thy soul in patience under mine afflicting hand, then I deal with thee as with sons—I give thee thy portion of suffering, and I give thee thy portion of grace to bear it. All my children want correcting, and they all have it: for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? They are all sufferers. Mine only-begotten was the greatest. None of you can suffer as he did: but whoever is following him must share with him in his cross, and bear it after him. If any be without my chastisement, whereof all mine are partakers; if they cannot bear it, have not faith to receive my loving correction, and therefore no patience to wait the blessed issue of it, such do not belong to my family; they are none of mine; they are bastards, and not sons.

How should the argument in this scripture reconcile the believer to suffering! How easy, yea, how happy, should it make him under the cross! He suffers, but it is from his Father, who in most perfect love and infinite wisdom appointed the cross, and appointed also the precious fruits, which it should produce. O my soul! keep this in mind. Remember whose cross thou art carrying. Thy Father contrived it. He sent and continues it, that it may work under him for the best. It is the chastening of his richest love. Receive it then patiently, thankfully at his hands, and thou wilt find it full of blessings. But take heed how thou consultest sense or carnal reason. These are always enemies to the cross: for they judge of it only by feeling, and always refuse to believe what God says concerning it. Adhere to the truth; and reject every suggestion, which would insinuate to thee, that there is any thing but love in the chastening of the Lord. He is thy Father. He never loves thee more than when he chastens thee. There is no hatred in his heart—no vengeance in his hand. He assures thee of this, from the infallible word of his mouth. Here may thy faith be settled: believe in him—he is doing thee good—he is promoting thy best interest. Cast not away this confidence, and then the cross will be the means of bringing thee to the nearest and holiest communion which thou canst have with thy Father on this side heaven.

In this amiable light look upon thy Father and thy friend. Never forget it, O my soul! but keep it in the faith of thy heart, especially when he chasteneth thee. Then expect from his love patience under his stroke, and after it the peaceable fruits of righteousness. These will grow abundantly upon the cross. They grow no where else so rich and ripe. Survey the promises, which he has made to his suffering children, and wait in faith for a joyful harvest. In due season thou shalt reap, if thou faint not. And the cross is intended to keep thee from fainting; because thy Father sends it for the increase and for the strengthening of thy faith. Read and study what he says to thee upon this point. Learn and inwardly digest it. In time of trouble thou wilt find great comfort from depending upon the promise of the Father to give thee a happy issue. Meditate, then, upon the scriptures, in which he has declared his gracious purposes in afflicting his children, namely,

First, it is for the trial of faith. God gives it, and then tries it, that it may appear to be his grace, that men may see it, and honour him for it, and that it may grow by use, which is as necessary to spiritual, as exercise is to bodily growth. Trial shows the truth, and brings forth the power of grace, and is thereby a matter of great joy; as the apostle James testifies, writing to the twelve tribes in their dispersion and affliction: "My brethren, count it ALL JOY, when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience: but let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect, and entire, wanting nothing." God be thanked for this word of strong consolation. What a precious scripture is it! How full of encouragement to the believer to look with delight at temptations!—not temptations to sin, but trials, sent from God to keep from sin. When he falls into them by providence, and meets them in the way of duty, then he should judge of them, not from sense, which can feel nothing but sorrow in afflictions, but he should take account of them from the declared purpose of God in sending them, and he should wait in faith for the blessings which they are to produce. God says, that they are matter of joy, of ALL JOY, of all true spiritual joy—they are not only such in his account, but he also makes them such to the believer. Accordingly we read in scripture of many who did rejoice in trials. The Hebrews did: for they took JOYFULLY the spoiling of their goods. Paul did: I am comforted, says he, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulations. Nay, he went farther—We GLORY in tribulations. He leaped with joy with the cross upon his back. He boasted and triumphed under it. What the world accounted his worst, he made his very crown of rejoicing; for he knew and found that the trial of faith worketh patience: faith receives the cross from the Father's love, and learns to bear it after Jesus: by the grace of the Spirit, the bearing of it, as it exercises, so it improves patience. The believer becomes more acquainted with it. Use, we say, makes perfect. He learns where the strength to bear is—from whence his comforts are to flow—and from whose hand the blessed issue is to be received. He waits therefore with sweet submission to his Father's will, that patience may have its perfect work, that by trials it may be exercised, by sharper trials it may be improved, and by daily trials it may appear to be the genuine grace of the Spirit, perfect and entire, lacking nothing. This the believer aims at. He would have every thing that belongs to true patience, and growth in it; he would have it refined by every fiery trial, and made purer and brighter, that it may hold out, till it have done its perfect work. The apostle Peter gives the same encouragement to the same afflicted Hebrews: he exhorts them to faith and patience under their sufferings in these words: "Ye are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time; wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations; that the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ." What treasures of love are laid open in this scripture! Read, O my soul! and adore the exceeding riches of thy Father's grace. He knew how needful afflictions were, both for the flesh and for the spirit, and therefore he appointed thee thy portion, and he has in mercy informed thee of his design in them. He has revealed his will for the ground of thy faith, that what he sends them, thou mightest experience the blessings promised to his suffering children. The belief of his love in contriving and in proportioning them to the ability given thee to bear them would administer matter of joy in sorrow, and by trusting to his faithfulness thou wouldst greatly rejoice; thy joy would so far exceed thy sorrow. The heaviness is but for a season—the joy for ever. The heaviness only during the trial of faith—the joy increased by that very trial. The trial was only to prove the truth of faith, and to evidence the power of it—not to weaken, but to strengthen it—not to destroy, but to refine it. The refiner does not intend to lose one atom of his gold, but puts it into the fire to purge away the dross. So does God. When he hath tried me, says Job, I shall come forth as gold. He was tried in the fire, and his faith was found unto praise and honour and glory. Therefore he is set forth for an example of suffering affliction and of patience. Behold, we account them happy, not who suffer, but who endure suffering. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord abounds in compassion, and is of tender mercy. O my soul! wait upon the same Lord, and he will bring all thy trials to the same blessed end. He has the same pity and mercy to thee as he had to Job. Thou hast the same reason to believe it, as he had. Thy faith is tried in the fire, as he was, that it may come out of it like gold. The trial was appointed in perfect love, and is to produce the greatest blessings of love. Thy God has most gracious designs towards thee in putting thee into the fire. It is to try thy faith; whether thou canst trust him there. It is to improve thy faith by the trial, that thou mayest trust him more. If thou hast trusting faith, it is to teach thee patient faith. It is a hard lesson to learn to trust against sense and carnal reason, and to say, This cross is good for me: I desire to submit, and to take it patiently at the hand of God. O, it is very hard to believe that there is nothing but love in every suffering, and it is harder to find it so, while suffering. And yet the Spirit of God declares there is nothing but love in it, and by believing thou wilt certainly find it. May every trial of thy faith establish it, and thereby bring forth,

Secondly, the blessed fruit of patience. The cross does good to faith; because by it God teaches his children to bear up, and to hold out, trusting to his promises, and waiting in hope for his fulfilling them, and thus it exercises patience. Which is a grace of the Spirit, learned only in the school of Christ, and therefore the giver of it among his other high titles is called the God of patience. He first enables his afflicted children to believe what he has said of his love in afflicting them, and then to wait for the experience of his love under their affliction. Thus waiting quietly, without giving way to sense, or unbelief, is patience. Faith is tried, and stands the trial. Tribulation comes, faith is exercised with it, but holds fast its confidence in the word of God, and thereby has full proof of the faithfulness of God. This worketh patience—a quiet submission to the divine will—and a holy subjection to the divine rod. The flesh murmurs, self-will repines, self-indulgence rebels; but faith looks up for the promised strength, and by it conquers them. It stops their mouths with a Hush—be still and know that he is God—he is my sovereign and my Father—this affliction indeed is not for the present joyous, but rather grievous—nevertheless it comes from his love, love guides his hand, love will bring good out of it—O that all within me may submit to his will, and bless his name!

But the cross is hard and painful: flesh and blood cannot bear it. True; but grace can. To endure is the proper work of patience. It endures by trusting to the word of God, and by receiving from him the promised strength. What cannot such a grace endure? When God says, "Fear not, I will be with thee, when thou goest through the fire;" the believer is hereby forewarned of the fire; and when he is called to go through it, he expects the presence of his God, that if the bush burn, it may not be consumed. How comfortably does the apostle Peter speak of this to the suffering Hebrews! "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial, which is to try you, as though some strange thing had come unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy." He would have them to be accustomed to the cross, it being the only way to the crown. There is nothing new or strange in it. All the crowned heads in heaven carried it, while they were upon earth; yea the king of saints went bearing it before them. There never was sorrow like unto his sorrow: and yet for the joy that was set before him, he endured the cross, and despised the shame. Take up thy cross, O my soul! and follow him. Look unto Jesus. He will give thee strength. He has taken the curse and wrath out of thy suffering. Thou wilt see it the fruit of his love to thee, and it will be the means of engaging thy love to him. What if it be a burning fiery furnace: is it not almighty love which calls thee to go into it? Not to hurt thee, but to try thee, to give thee happy proof of the soundness of thy faith, and of the power of thy patience. He would would have thee to know that thy patience trusting to his tried word is invincible; that no blow can beat it, no fire can burn it: from Christ. He would bring to experience what the prophet did, when he said, "Thy word is tried to the uttermost, and thy servant loveth it." The good word of God was tried, as far as it could be, and the trial proved its truth, and therefore he had fresh reason to love it. The trial increased his confidence in the truth, and his experience in the sweetness of its promises; thereby his patience was confirmed, and he could rejoice, inasmuch as he was a partaker of Christ's sufferings, both of their infinite sufficiency, and also of their mighty efficacy to save. By enjoying these blessings under the cross, his heart was happy in the joy set before him. He had the earnest and the foretaste of heaven: for he knew that, when the glory of Jesus should be revealed, he should be glad with exceeding joy.

But the carnal mind is ready to complain—This would be true, if the suffering was short; but it is long, as well as hard—I have borne up a great while, but now my patience is quite tired out—I am ready to give all up, being weary of my life with the length of my trials. How many have I known in this melancholy case! Fair blossoms in the mild and gentle spring. In fine weather and smiling sunshine they looked beautiful, and gave hopes of their being in the tree of life, and of their growing and ripening upon it. But, alas! a trying time came, a bleak cold north wind, and a very sharp piercing frost—like leaves in autumn, down fell the promising bloom. My heart has mourned again and again at the fall of one and another, and mourns while I am writing this, over several now living, who have forsaken God and his ways for the world and its delights. They met with trouble, and it was too much for them. They were tempted, and they had not strength to resist. The reason is thus assigned: "He that received seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not root in himself, but endureth for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended." He is offended and falls away, because he had no root: and they who have root, are too often tempted to be offended at the cross. They find it very difficult to bear up under it. Natural infirmity, remaining corruption, and strength of temptation make pain and suffering grievous to the flesh: yea, when they are forced to bear the cross long, and it is very heavy, they are apt to murmur and fret, grow discontented, are tempted to unbelief, and, if they give way to it, to despair. How necessary is it, then, that they should be enabled to possess their souls in patience under their great and many trials! To which end nothing can contribute more effectually, than a settled faith in the word and promise of a reconciled God. This will stay and quiet the soul, when trouble comes. It is the chastening of my Lord, says the believer—my loving Father sends it for good. He is only trying my faith and patience, and the trial will end well—it is grievous indeed at present, and I go on my way weeping, but I have my supports now, and I shall soon reap a joyful harvest. I have a faithful promise for it, which is a constant cordial, and keeps up my spirits. My God will be with me as long as the trial lasts—he says he will. I believe him, and therefore expect his promised presence and strength, till faith and patience have their perfect work. Such a cordial the apostle James gives to the Hebrews. They wanted it much. They were greatly oppressed by the rich, and some of them were persecuted even unto death. "Be patient therefore, brethren," says he, "unto the coming of the Lord: behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain: be ye also patient; establish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." He puts great stress upon the Lord's coming: Yet a very little while and your Lord will come to appear for you: it is true you are in a fiery trial, but your God calls you to it; and it may seem to you a long trial, but he has promised you grace sufficient to bear it: trust him, then, and he will keep you patient. He knows your frame and temper, and bids you look about you. See how the husbandman waits, having only a general promise, that seed time and harvest shall not fail; and it is not more reasonable that you should wait with patience the end of the Lord. He sows his seed and leaves it. It endures much hard weather, frost and snow, rough winds, and wintry storms. Summer comes, but he must still wait: his corn is in ear, yet is liable to suffer from long drought and from blights, and to be beat down with heavy thunder-showers; but he has long patience. At last he is not disappointed of his hope. He reaps the precious fruit of the earth, and gathers in his joyful harvest. Behold, O my soul! and imitate. How strong is his faith! Is thine like his? God has only said, that the seasons shall not fail: he has not said, that the harvest in every field and country shall not fail, yet the farmer sows in faith, and waits in patience. But the promise is sure to thee—"He that believeth shall never be confounded," and dost thou believe this with a hope that maketh not ashamed? He has long patience; how is thine? Art thou not weary and faint in thy mind, especially when the course of providence seems to run counter to thy hope? Canst thou hold thee still in the Lord, and abide patiently upon him, when he chastises thee, and seems in anger to cast thee off? He waits long for an harvest of perishing things; and canst not thou wait to have thy fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life? Oh what need hast thou of patience! Seek it, pray for it, beg of thy God to establish thy heart, that thou mayst be rooted and grounded in faith: and if troubles come great and heavy, thou mayst possess thy soul in patience, so long as the Lord shall please to exercise thee with them. And never forget that he will certainly come, and quickly. Let this promise keep thee from fainting. He will come in with his supports; he will administer his comforts under the cross; he will remove it in due season. What can be required for the establishing of thy heart, which is not promised to thee in this scripture? "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward: For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise: for it is but a very little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Wait then on the Lord, O my soul! be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart: Wait, I say, on the Lord."

Perhaps thou art ready to reply—I have waited long, but am still to learn: for my trials are so various, that as soon as I have been well exercised with one sort, presently it is changed, and another comes, to which I was not accustomed —And this continually, like Job's messengers, one after another, and still the last brings a sadder message than the former. Hard and long trials I have endured, but this constant change of them wearies me out; they come so unexpected, they find me so unprepared, they so harass my troubled mind, that I am ready to sink under them—frequently I am tempted to think, that if God loved me, he would not delight in afflicting me in this manner.

Thus the carnal mind is apt to reason against God and his ways: but when the believer goes into the sanctuary and consults the oracle, he receives an answer of grace and peace, and is satisfied that this change of trials is nothing new with God. It is his usual method of training up his children in faith and patience. He appoints troubles for the exercise, and all sorts of troubles for the improvement of their graces. The Captain of their salvation was made perfect through sufferings: So are all the soldiers of Christ Jesus. It was the remark of one of his champions.—MANY are the troubles of the righteous. The apostle James speaking of the persecuted Hebrews, says they had DIVERS temptations, different one from another: and his brother Peter tries to comfort them under their MANIFOLD afflictions, many in number, succeeding as fast as wave follows after wave, and of many kinds; some distressed them in their bodies, others in their minds, in their character, in their substance, in their families, in every way that affliction could be felt. Patience is the grace suited to all these trials; because it bears them in the strength of God: for it consists in trusting to his sure word of promise, and believing it against sense and feeling, Faith says, this present trial comes from the love of my covenant God: Patience says, then I will bear it, till he bring it to a good issue. Whatever the trial be, patience has the same promise, and the same promise-keeping God to trust in. If he send variety of trials, it is only to give a variety of proofs that he is faithful who hath promised. He knows we have divers diseases, which must have divers remedies to heal them. We have manifold evils in us, which require manifold afflictions to subdue them. And our God intends to give us many blessings, and he appoints many troubles to bring us to the enjoyment of them. All these are gracious dispensations, mercifully contrived, and seasonably administered, that patience may learn to bear, and may learn to persevere in bearing. God changes the trial. Patience has a new lesson, and a new opportunity of improvement. A good teacher brings his scholars forward; and when they are gone through one book and are well grounded in it, then he advances them to another: when they have learned Latin, he puts them into Greek; but he does not change their studies out of ill-will or hatred to his scholars. They had rather be at play, than minding their books; and they had rather get but one lesson, and be saying it over from day to day; but the master knows what is best for them, and he keeps them to their work. God trains up his scholars in various exercises, but all for their improvement. He does not consult what would please them, but he changes the lesson, as he sees needful. He knows when their faith wants confirming, when their patience needs establishing, and therefore in much mercy he sends a new trial for the growth of those graces. Lest they should mistake his meaning in varying trials so often, he gives them this general rule—"There hath no temptation taken you, but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." The Father will exercise his children with no trial, but such as is common to man; and he will enable them to bear it; and will make a way for them to escape. How should these considerations silence their murmurings! If the trial be new to them, yet it is common to man. If it be hard to bear, yet grace is almighty to strengthen patience. If it last long, yet it shall end well. How convincing are these reasons! How patiently should believers, influenced by them, submit to the chastening of the Lord! And yet there is still unbelief in them, which will be urging fresh complaints, and stirring up impatience.

The poor sufferer, feeling his smart, is apt to think—Any cross but mine would be tolerable—I should not say one word against God, if he tried me with any other: but this cuts me to the heart—Oh, it is a very agony both to my flesh and spirit—there is nothing like it—it is so exactly calculated to cross my temper, to hurt me in the tenderest part, and to rob me of my most beloved gratification, that it is the very thing in the world, from which I could have wished to be exempted—Any cross, Lord, but this.

Nay but, O man! who art thou that repliest thus against God? Hold thy tongue as it were with a bridle. Let not self-will murmur, and folly speak against the chastening of the Lord. He says that he is dealing with thee as with sons. Where is thy faith then, that sense and feeling should be permitted to plead, and to be heard against the witness of God in his word? Where is thy patience, that thou canst not bear the present cross, but wouldst take up any other? Alas! alas! mistaken man—what canst thou bear in thine own strength? Thou feelest the smart of thy present cross, and it makes thee peevish and fretful: the smart of any other would have the very same effect. A less than this, the least thing in the world, that opposes thy will, would stir up thine impatience. Observe thy temper, how it catches fire at any little opposition from men. The same temper will be inflamed and rage, when God chastises thee, if thou refuse to receive his correction. Thy rebel will is the cause of thy pain, and makes thy cross so bitter: For if God's will and thine were one, there could be no cross; but his will is almighty, and yet thou resistest it. God puts his yoke upon thee, and thou art like a stubborn beast, which only hurts and galls itself by striving and kicking against its work. He tries thee with one cross, and thou art dissatisfied; thou couldst contrive a better for thyself. Thou wouldst be thine own lord and governor. Self-will, they say, is a sure guide to self-destruction. Beware, then, of thine own will. When God calls thee to take up any cross, do not wish for another. He sends this, and to it he requires thy submission. It is thy duty, and thine interest to receive it, for the exercise and for the improvement of thy patience; but instead of taking it up quietly, and waiting for the good fruit of it, thou art quarrelling with it, and opposing the will of God. Oh, take heed of this vain attempt. It is a snare laid for thee; a fatal trap, into which the love of independence, seduced the first man, and which ever since easily ensnares his posterity. When thou art tempted to murmur at thy present cross—consider what it is—meditate a moment upon thy Father's love, who most mercifully appointed, who most seasonably sent it—and if it be nothing strange, but common to man, then do not try to shift it off, but seek the promised grace to bear it. There is not a cross that he will lay upon thee, but he has laid it before upon others, and it will tend greatly to the peace of thy mind, and to the restraining of thine own will, to observe how he dealt with them. Take notice, then, how he in love exercised them with every cross that can be laid upon thee, how he supported them under it, and what blessed fruit they reaped from it.

This is the kingdom of the cross; and it is the Lord's will that every disciple in it should be as his master. He has chosen them to suffer with him, as well as to reign with him. And therefore, intending to call forth his gifts and graces into daily exercise, he has honoured them with the daily cross. He sees it needful often to change it, and he has informed them of his gracious designs herein. There is scarce any kind of suffering, but some or other of his people have been tried with it, and he has left promises in scripture of his support, of his coming in with comfort, and in due time with deliverance. So that, whatever thy cross be, it is not sent, O my soul! to hinder, but to promote communion with thy God, and to help thee forward in the heavenly way.

Art thou pinched with poverty—a believer, but in distressed circumstances? Blessed art thou of the Lord. "Hearken, my beloved brother, hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom, which he hath promised to them that love him?" What a mercy is it to have thine outward estate thus appointed for thee by the choice of thy heavenly Father! And the same estate which he chose for his best beloved. In the exceeding riches of his love he decreed that thou shouldst be poor in this world, as Jesus was.—He knew it was best for thee—and he chose thee rich in faith—outward poverty was to be the means of thine improvement in spiritual riches—thy want of temporals was to bring thee to live more by faith upon eternal things. Oh, how good is thy God! He sent thee poverty to enrich thee. It is to bring thee near to God, to keep thee near to him, and to afford thee daily proof of his precious love. These are some of the blessings of rich faith, and these are worth more than all the treasures of the world. Be content then—thy God will supply all thy need. Be thankful thou art an heir of the kingdom. Bless thy God—no creature out of heaven has more reason to bless him than thou hast—He is thine—All things are thine.

Perhaps thou art tried with bodily pain and sickness: These are hard trials. To endure them is the very crown of patience: but strength to endure them is promised, and in waiting upon the Lord will be received; so that outward pains shall produce inward joy. Thus we read: "The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing, thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness." He is weak; God strengthens him. He is sick; God comforts him. He is in pain; God smooths his bed, and he lies patient. Sickness cannot be pleasant in itself; but is profitable for its fruits. It is the appointment of God, and teaches submission to his sovereign will. It comes to the believer with a message of precious love—This bitter cup is sent from thy heavenly Father, who has many gracious purposes to answer by thy taking it—He would humble thee, and let thee feel what thou art, and what thou deservest—he would mortify the life of sense—He would give occasion to increase faith and to advance patience—Drink it up!—There is a rich cordial at the bottom—The taste of it will draw out thy heart in love to God. Happy sickness! which promotes spiritual health. Blessed pain! which the kind physician often makes the way to pleasure, yea, to the sweetest communications of his love.

Art thou in the fire of persecution? Are thy friends and relations all in arms against thee for leaving them to follow Christ? Is thy dependence upon them, and art thou greatly tempted to make some compliances, lest they should cast thee out, and thou shouldst come to poverty? This may be a fiery trial; but it is a blessed one. He will make it so, who says, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: because great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets who were before you." This persecution will be so far from stopping thee in thy way, that it will both help thee forward, and will also make thy journey pleasant. Thy friends revile thee: look up to him, who when he was reviled, reviled not again: he will turn their reproach into a blessing. They persecute thee: the goodly fellowship of the prophets carried the same cross, and found it no hinderance to their spiritual joy. They say all manner of evil of thee: take heed that they say it falsely, and for Christ's sake; and if thou suffer for him, and art evil spoken of for thine attachment to him, then rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is thy reward in heaven. Thou art a sufferer with him, and thou shalt also reign with him. Look forward to the promised kingdom. Expect it in faith, and the prospect will give thee at every step joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Perhaps this persecution may be carried on to acts of injustice, even to the depriving thee of thy property: thou mayst suffer the loss of all thy worldly goods for Christ's sake. When God calls thee to this trial, he will give thee strength to bear it, and thou shalt be a great gainer by thy loss. So Paul found it—"I have suffered the loss of all things, and I do account them but dung that I may win Christ." So it was with the Hebrews—"They took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, knowing in themselves that they had in heaven a better and an enduring substance." What love was here! God was their portion, and their great reward. He had made them happy in the sense of his love; and to manifest the reality, and to demonstrate the power of it, what great things love can do for his name's sake, he took away all their earthly delights. Let them go, says Paul; I part with them as freely, as I would with so much dung; for I have experienced that the loss of them has brought me to nearer fellowship with my precious, most precious Jesus. Happy parting! say the Hebrews; farewell goods and chattels—we rejoice at the spoiling of our goods; because we have got faster hold of the substance by the loss of the shadow—outward comforts are gone, but inwardly, rich supply their place—we are robbed of our earthly possessions, thank God we cannot be robbed of our better and enduring substance; for it is reserved in heaven for us, where no moth or rust can corrupt, and where no thieves can break through or steal: in this faith we find our hearts free and light and happy in running the race that is set before us.

Thy trial may be something still nearer. It may be the loss of thy dearest relations. The wife of thy bosom is taken from thee. Thy favourite child is dead, perhaps drowned, or burned, or killed at a stroke: the delight of thine eyes is gone, and thine heart is ready to break. All sorrow is not forbidden, but sorrowing even as others who have no hope. Tears may flow; but Christian hope keeps them within their proper bounds: it restrains and sanctifies them. Thy wife is dead: thy child is dead. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. He requires thee to forsake loving wife and children, be they ever so dear, if love of them cannot be enjoyed without forfeiting his love. "And there were great multitudes with Christ, and he turned and said unto them, if any man come unto me, and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, he cannot be my disciple." The disciple gives up himself to the master's disposal, to learn of him, to believe in him and to love him. "My son," says he, "give me thy heart." He has a right to it; and he will admit of no rival. It is his temple and his throne, in which he alone will be worshipped and honoured. He is a jealous God, and if any love hinder love to him, it must be torn from the heart. O disciple! read this scripture; study it carefully; and it may be the means of showing thee the true cause of thy great sorrow about worldly relations: it is because thou hast so little love to thy best relation and friend, Jesus Christ. If thy love to him was what it should be, thy heart would not be so grieved at those losses; but would in patient submission acknowledge—It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good.

Perhaps thou art mourning for the loss of living friends. They have forsaken thee. Old connexions, as dear to thee as thine own soul, are broken. Persons, whom thou hadst known from thy childhood, and with whom thou hadst grown up in strict friendship, are now thine enemies, and become so without any offence or fault of thine. They hate thee because thou art a real Christian, and their hatred is harder to bear because the world joins them in it, and thy name is every where cast out with contempt.

It must be so. The decree cannot be altered—I WILL PUT enmity between the seed of the woman, and the seed of the serpent. God put it, and put it for ever. The enmity broke out as soon as there were two born into the world. Cain hated Abel, and slew him. Ever since, he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit. There has been one, and but one perfect man upon the earth since the fall; and the enmity of the world followed him unto death. Lest we should marvel at its following us, he has forewarned us—"If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you: if ye were of the world, the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." What a strange reason is this! Because I love you, therefore the world hates you. What God chooses, the world rejects. Why then, O my soul, dost thou court its smiles or fear its frowns? The world, which lieth in wickedness, cannot love thee, and its enmity cannot hurt thee. Remember the words of Jesus—"These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace: in the world ye SHALL have tribulation; but be of good courage; I have overcome the world." I have overcome it for you, and I will overcome it in you: tribulation from it shall not hurt your peace in me, but shall increase it: I will make my love the sweeter for its enmity: troubles from it shall be well repaid with my joys: and when it quite casts you out, then will I take you into my bosom, and let you know what the affection of the heavenly bridegroom is.

Why then, O my soul, art thou afraid of such an exchange? Is it not for thy profit to part with the world for Christ, and to give up its joys for his? What greater gain canst thou expect than to win Christ, and by him to be crucified to this present evil world? Dying to it, thou wilt be more alive to him, and therefore happier in him. As other ties are dissolved, thy heart will be knit closer to thy divine lover. Warmed with his precious love, "clothed with the sun, and the moon under thy feet" thou wilt hasten thy steps heavenwards; yea, thou wilt be ready to take wings, and to fly to the embraces of thy dear, ever infinitely dear Jesus. Thou wilt want no comment upon the words of the bride, the Lamb's wife, but will gladly use them after her—"Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices."

In former ages the children of God were often deprived of their liberty, cast into prisons, and bound in chains. This seems to us a heavy cross. To be shut up in a dark dungeon, put into fetters, and deprived of every worldly comfort, requires great patience: but even this did not stop them in their way to heaven, nor in the enjoyment of God by the way. Paul, the prisoner of the Lord, oftens mentions it among his highest honours, that he was accounted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ. He and Silas were cruelly beaten with many stripes at Philippi; were put into the inner prison, and their feet fastened in the stocks; but the Lord was with them, and he turned their prison into a paradise; his joy made them forget their wounds and pains: for at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and SANG PRAISES unto God. This has often been the case since their time: the Lord has often visited his prisoners, and the light of his countenance has made them happy in their bonds. Indeed we are not called to this kind of suffering at present—thanks be to his grace! This is a day of such uncommon mercies, that we have more to fear from our want of thankfulness than from our want of liberty. I pray God we may not grow licentious, and abuse our great privileges, but may he enable us so to value them and live up to them, that he may be honoured for continuing them to us and our posterity.

In former times, also, believers were often forced to seal the testimony of Jesus with their blood. And even this did not stop them in their walk, nor hinder their communion with God. Hear one of his martyrs—"The Holy Ghost witnesseth that bonds and afflictions wait for me in every city: but none of these things move me, neither account I my life dear unto myself, so that I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus." This was not a vain brag. He spake it in humble faith, depending upon his master's promise that he would stand by him when his blood should be shed, and would make him a happy conqueror in the hour of death. And he was more than conqueror; but the grace which made him so was not peculiar to, or the privilege of, an apostle: the same was given to a noble army of martyrs, who overcame Satan by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death. What a triumph of patience was this! They were enabled to bear any thing, even the loss of life, rather than suffer the loss of their Lord's favour. Examine, O my soul, whether thy faith be like theirs. Canst thou endure as they did? How is thy patience under the cross? Read what they went through, who are well reported of by the Holy Ghost for their faith, and remember the same grace is promised to thee to carry thee patiently through all thy sufferings.—"They had trials of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonments: they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented; of whom the world was not worthy; they wandered in deserts and in mountains, and in dens and in caves of the earth, and these all obtained a good report through faith." They are celebrated by the Holy Spirit for having patiently endured till they had run their race, and finished their course with joy. He sets their example before thee, that thou shouldst not be slothful in running the same race, but a follower of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

Meditate seriously, O my soul, and reflect again and again upon the great need thou hast of patience. Remember, the cross lies in thy way to the crown, and thou canst not avoid it. The Lord has appointed it to be thy portion, and it is entailed upon thee as much as the kingdom is. When he exercises and tries thee with it, he does not act merely as a sovereign, but as a Father. He deals with thee as with sons. His children want, and his children have correction. None are without it. But they find it hard to bear. The will of the flesh is impatient under the cross. Self-love hates it. Carnal reason cannot be reconciled to it If it be thus with sons, what must it be with bastards? The natural man, when he is brought into great trouble, is like a mad beast. If his pains be sharp and acute, he rages, storms, and blasphemes: if they be also lasting, having no God to go to, he often gives way to despair, and despatches himself with a pistol, running to hell for relief. O my soul, marvel not at this. If God had left thee to thyself, the same trials might have brought thee to the same unhappy end. How necessary then is patience! Without it thou canst not bear the cross, nor hold on thy way under it, nor profit from it. And how necessary are the doctrines before insisted on for the practice of patience! No one can submit to bear the cross unless he be first persuaded that God is reconciled to him and loves him in his Son. When he is satisfied of this, he will see all things (the cross among the rest) well ordered for him in the covenant, and all working together for the best. The cross is mercifully sent to make a trial of these doctrines: by it God would manifest the truth and bring forth the power of them, that it may appear they were not learned, as notions, but experienced by his almighty grace. His end is answered. The trial of faith establishes the peace of God in the conscience, and confirms the love of God in the heart, and thereby keeps patience waiting for strength to hold out, and for a blessed issue. The believer, made strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, endures patiently. He knows from whom his cross comes. It is the appointment of his Father, who does not send it in hatred. He never afflicts his children but in perfect love. He never puts a heavy cross upon them to break the back of their patience, but to strengthen it, and to train them up to bear greater burdens. He would teach them their weakness and his strength, their wants and their supplies: he would call forth their faith for the honour of his word, and their patience for the glory of his faithfulness. Lord, teach me these lessons! I want the experience of them every day. O my God, make me an humble disciple in the school of Christ. There only can I learn to suffer thy will: to thee I come for this grace. Assist me, O thou Spirit of wisdom and revelation, in reading thy word, that, through patience and comfort of the scriptures, I may have hope. Enable me to meditate night and day on the doctrines of grace revealed in them, and to mix faith with them, that I may be strong in the patience of hope. O merciful God and Father! I desire to be strengthened mightily by thy Spirit in the inner man to bear thy cross. I would live in a continual dependence upon thine arm to carry me through every trial. O thou God of patience and consolation, enable me to bear thy cross daily to the praise of the glory of thy grace, and to bear it patiently to the end, that I may finish my course with joy. Be it unto thy servant according to thy word, wherein thou hast caused me to put my trust. Amen, so be it Lord, Amen.

To receive benefit from afflictions is a great blessing. To suffer them with a resigned will, yea, to rejoice in them, as if all the joy in the world was to come to us, is contrary to sense and feeling; to carnal reason and to human philosophy; therefore our heavenly Father has graciously informed his children of his love in afflicting them. These informations are the ground of their faith, and were given to silence murmuring in their hearts, and to keep them waiting patiently for the promised fruits of suffering. Among which this is a

Third, and not the least; namely, the crucifying of the flesh, and the deadening of it in those affections and lusts which, if not daily mortified, would stop the believer in his walk, and would hinder his holy communion with God. When faith has been tried, and is come out of the fire, proved to be the faith of God's elect; and when patience has gone through the fiery furnace and has found no harm; then it is the Father's will to advance and to improve his children in the doctrine of the cross. They have a carnal mind still, which is enmity against God—a body of sin—an old man of sin—the flesh in them lusting against the spirit. This their fleshly nature, which doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerated, is the greatest enemy to their holy walk with God in constant peace and growing love; because it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The life of sense in them is always opposing the life of God. Hence the continual war between nature and grace, which if a man does not find in himself, he may depend on it he either never was alive to God, or else at that time he is dead to God. If he be living by the faith of the Son of God, he will also be fighting the good fight of faith against all the enemies of his salvation. He will never think of putting off the whole armour of God until he put off the body of sin and of death: and until that day come, he will be striving for the mastery over his body, that he may keep it under, and bring it into subjection. How absolutely necessary this striving is, appears from the tender compassion of our God and Father, who has appointed and decreed in covenant love all the crosses which were to be laid upon our rebel nature, and which were to be kept upon it, till death. It is his holy will hereby to restrain its affections, to mortify its lust, to hedge up its way by thorns and afflictions; and by these means he would weaken its power. Is not this mercy unspeakable? And what more likely method could he contrive, thus to crucify the flesh, than to put it and to keep it upon the cross? For as the sinful nature is deadened, the new man is renewed day by day. The one grows more alive by the mortification of the other. The subduing of unbelief, pride, and self-seeking, is the strengthening of faith, humility, and glorifying God. This command therefore is frequently given to believers—Put off the old man—put on the new—mortify your members which are upon the earth—crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts. And this is spoken to believers high in grace, as high as ever any went, or can go. The Spirit of God says to the SAINTS at Rome—"Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof; neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin." The infallible Spirit speaks to the SAINTS at Ephesus—"Put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and put on the new man." The same precept is given by the same Spirit to the SAINTS at Colosse—"Mortify your members which are upon the earth." This is a holy war; and all the saints of God are engaged in it. They are fighting against every thing sinful, but more particularly watching under arms against their own corrupt nature, which is their hardest warfare, because there is no release from it, and it is carried on by continual self-denial, by resisting the affections and lusts of the old man, and by opposing his giving up the members of his body as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin. But as good soldiers of Christ Jesus they resist unto blood, striving against sin. The Captain of their salvation is always on their side to encourage them with his promises, and to help them with his strength. He intends to lead them on conquering and to conquer, therefore he lays the cross upon their corruptions, as the most effectual means of subduing them; and to reconcile them to it, he speaks unto them, as unto children—

My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord. I do not afflict thee in hatred, but in covenant love. My design is to mortify the body of sin, and therefore I give thee this wholesome physic. Thou hast many bad humours and corruptions, for which I have appointed this sovereign medicine. Trust my skill—believe my love—depend upon mine arm—and thou wilt infallibly find it profitable to the spirit, however painful to the flesh. Wait; and the end shall be blessed.

To this truth the prophet Isaiah bears a clear testimony. He explains the Lord's design in afflicting his people, and tells them, it was to purge them from their iniquity, to keep them from the love of sin, and to restrain the practice of it. He afflicted them in mercy: but he afflicted their enemies in justice. Hath he smitten Israel as he smote those that smote him? No, he has not. Or is he slain according to the slaughter of them that are slain by him? No: he chastises his in love; he has appointed the measure, the time, the degree of their correction. "In measure, when it shooteth forth, thou wilt debate with it; he stayeth his rough wind in the day of his east wind: by this (moderate affliction) therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit to take away his sin"—to keep him back from sin in general, and from the sin of idolatry in particular, as it follows in the prophet—"When he maketh all the stones of the altar like chalk-stones that are beaten in sunder, then the groves and images shall not stand up." The altar, at which they offered their idol-worship, shall be broken down, like stones burnt in pieces for lime, and the groves and images shall not stand up, but shall be broken down also. These happy effects shall be brought about by sanctified affliction—iniquity shall be purged—sin shall be restrained—idolatry shall be thrown down. And God says, this shall be ALL the fruit and end of his chastening. He tells his people of his design, that they might know their affliction would bring forth good fruit, and that they might wait patiently for the fulfilling of his promise. Blessed are all they that wait for him; they shall never be disappointed of their hope.

How gracious is God in his dealings with his children! He provides the best for them, informs them of it, and because they have a fallen nature opposite to his holy mind and will, an enemy to his glory and to their own peace, he acquaints them with his design in subduing it. He appoints affliction for this end. It is the chastening of the Lord. He promises them strength to bear it, and comfort under it. Nothing but good shall flow from it. Iniquity, their worst enemy, shall be crucified; actual sin, springing from the iniquity of their nature, shall be mortified: the heart shall be deadened to its old idols, and as it dies to them it shall be happier in the love of God. O blessed cross! what mercies dost thou bring with thee! Is not that blessed indeed, which under God produces such unspeakable mercies? Take it up, then, O my soul, bear it patiently, and expect the choicest blessings of the Father's love from it. Why dost thou refuse? It is heavy. It is painful. True: but what makes it so? The burden is from thy rebel will. The pain comes from thy corruption, unwilling to be mortified. Take it up in faith, and thou wilt find strength enough to bear it, and blessings enough to make it a matter of all joy. Lord God, reconcile me to my daily cross. May thy will in it be done. Mortify sin, weaken its power, deaden its affections and lusts. Only Lord, whatever cross thou sendest, give grace with it, that I may bear it patiently, and may wait for its promised fruit. Thou knowest what would stop me in my heavenly journey: if it be my bosom favourite, the dearest object of my love, O tear it from my heart! Thou hast given me a desire to have every rival dethroned. O come, and reign alone in me, almighty Jesus! and subdue whatever opposes thy lawful government. My Saviour and my God, make all within me feel the power of thy cross. Crucify the body of sin. Spare nothing that would hinder my walking with thee, or would deprive me of thy friendship and favours. I bless thee, I worship thee, I glorify thee for this infinite grace, that thou hast made me willing to have all mine idols pulled down. On thee I depend every moment for keeping them down. O my loving Jesus! carry on thy work, and in thine own way subdue sin in me: let me be planted together in the likeness of thy death, that I may be also in the likeness of thy resurrection—dead to sin, but alive to God. I ask this for thy great name's sake. Let it be thy good pleasure to hear and answer. I believe thou wilt. I have thy word for it. There I rest. Amen and Amen.

With this faith review thy mercies. Consider, O my soul, what a good God has done for thee, and what greater things he has still in store. He has in some measure reconciled thee to his cross. Thou art convinced it is thy Father's appointment, contrived for the best by his infinite love, and settled on thee for thy richest portion in time. He sends it for the trial of thy faith, that it may be found unto praise and honour and glory for the exercise and for the improvement of thy patience—for the mortifying of the body of sin, and for the deadening of the life of sense. This is the will of thy most loving and tender Father. He sends the cross to be the means of these blessings. Certainly, then, it cannot hinder thy walk with him, but in all these respects will tend to keep thee in the way, and to help thee forward in it, and thus Fourthly, It will assist and promote thy holy fellowship and communion with God. This is the principal thing in religion. We fell from God by sin; and it is the greatest mercy to be brought back to him again. In this point all religions fail but the Christian. Christ is the way. No one cometh to the Father but by him; for there is salvation in no other. He only can forgive sin: he only can justify sinners. And this way was contrived in the covenant of the Trinity for the highest display of their divine perfections, which begin to be manifested when the Spirit of life enters into the sinner, and quickens him; when the Spirit of adoption enables him to trust in the atonement and obedience of Immanuel, and thereby to see God reconciled, and to call him, Abba, Father. With this faith in Jesus he expects from the Father's love all his promised mercies. Thus he has fellowship with the Father and the Son by the Holy Spirit. He stands related to the eternal Three in their covenant offices, and he receives freely in believing the covenant blessings of each.

Among these blessings the cross is not the least: for it is mercifully appointed to be the means of bringing sinners to this divine fellowship. They go on stubbornly after their own hearts, and in the error of their own ways until the Lord send some trouble to stop them. They look wishfully at the gilded cup of pleasure, and drink greedily of its sweets, without any fear of the deadly poison mixed up with it. But when God convinces of sin, then comes sorrow: they feel the poison working in a sense of guilt, and dread of punishment, which teach the want of a Saviour, and are a good schoolmaster, to bring them unto Christ. So God dealt with the chief of the Old Testament sinners—a giant in iniquity, who surpassed all that were before him in Jerusalem for idolatry and bloodshedding. The Lord sent his prophets to warn him of his guilt, but he would not hearken. He hardened his heart till the Lord brought upon him the captains of the host of the king of Assyria, who took Manasseh among the thorns, and bound him with fetters, and carried him to Babylon: and when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers, and prayed unto him, and he was intreated of him, and heard his supplication, and brought him again to Jerusalem into his kingdom: then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God. His case was not singular. It is a common thing with the Lord to send affliction to make sin bitter, that he may lead his people to true sorrow for it, and that they may seek until they find salvation.

And when they have found it, he still uses the cross to keep them near unto himself. Indeed, the cross alone has not this effect, but rather the contrary. The natural man has his fretfulness stirred up by suffering, and cannot help murmuring at the will of God. But grace sanctifies suffering. God makes it a blessing to his children, as by it he exercises their faith in such general promises as these.

If God sent great and many troubles, they shall not separate believers from him; because he will then be with them; as he spake unto Israel—"Fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation: I will go down with thee into Egypt." It was the house of bondage, in which the taskmasters heavily afflicted his descendants with their burdens; but the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew. So it was with the Israel of God. They need not fear any affliction; for their God has promised to be them in it, and by it to make them great Christians: the more they are afflicted, the more shall their graces multiply and grow—"I will be with thee in trouble, says God—I will redeem, I will save thee from all thy troubles—many are the troubles of the righteous; but I will deliver thee out of them all—yea, when thou passest through the water, and through the fire, I will be with thee, and will preserve thee from all evil—I will make all these things work together for thy good." These promises are a great support to faith: for God engages to be with his children in every affliction. He does not intend that any should separate them from him, but that all should keep them near to himself. He says he will be with them: they therefore expect his presence; and if their afflictions be very great, they may, on good grounds, wait for his time of deliverance. And as his word cannot be broken, their trust in it will be confirmed, and their hearts will be established in waiting upon the Lord. If their afflictions continue long, he is with them all the time, making them sensible of their own weakness, and putting forth his promised strength, both that they may endure, and may also persevere in enduring: thus he improves their patience. And because they have still a carnal nature, which cannot bear the cross, God therefore keeps it upon them, in order to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, that as they die unto sin they may live unto righteousness. Such is the declared purpose of God in afflicting his children: he would hereby cherish these graces in them, by which communion with him is kept up; and as these grow, communion with him will grow in proportion. Faith will look more at the truth, and live more upon the faithfulness of God. Patience will depend more on his arm, and the less happiness the believer can find in the creature, he will seek and will find the more in his God. The mortifying of the old man will of course make the new man more alive: for as the power of the cross of Christ is laid upon the former, the power of the life of Christ will be experienced in the latter.

But such is the goodness of God to his children under the cross, that he has given them several very particular and express promises, in order to strengthen their faith and patience. He has shown them what fellowship they are to expect with the eternal Three in their covenant offices; for promoting which he most mercifully provided the cross. O my soul! attend to this: carefully survey this rich contrivance of divine love, and when the cross is sent, take it up in faith, and expect to be a partaker of its covenant blessings.

Remember, it is laid upon thee to promote communion with thy God and Saviour. The appointed trial comes. It is to give thee proof of the soundness of thy faith in Jesus, and to let thee see by experience that thou hast not believed in vain. Thou hast fled to him for refuge, from sin and guilt, from wrath and hell: He took thee into his protection; and now thy safety in him is to be attacked. It will be seen that the foundation upon which thou standest will bear thee up in an hour of temptation. If thou hast indeed fellowship with him in his glorious salvation, it will now be made manifest to thy great profit. The cross is laid upon thee—a heavy, a bitter cross: it deprives thee of all sensible comfort, and is kept upon thee till thou hast no prospect of any. Hope in creature-comfort has failed. This is a sweet season for spiritual communion with thy Jesus. He has deadened the enjoyment of other things, that thy heart might be happier in him; therefore, now thou art to bring the principles laid down in the former chapters into practice. Here is a fair opportunity to make use of them; for without them a man must sink under such a cross; but through faith in the righteousness of thy God and Saviour thou wilt not only have powerful arguments, but wilt also have powerful grace to bear thy sufferings, patient under them, and thankful for them:

Under them thou wilt be tried—Is it good ground, upon which I have built my hope of salvation? Is it the rock of ages? Does it bear me up safe, and keep me unshaken in this time of trouble? Yes; blessings, eternal blessings on my precious Jesus! I have fled to him for refuge, and he has set my feet upon a rock, that can never be moved: Christ, my passover, is sacrificed for me: in the blood of sprinkling I have put my trust, and I am safe from the destroyer: he is my propitiation, in whom I have redemption through faith in his blood: he is mine advocate also with the Father, standing in his presence as my surety: while the Father sees him and loves him, he will see me in him and love me with the same love: Jesus is mine atonement with him, my righteousness, and my sanctification, and my full redemption. O thou most lovely loving Jesus! I have often been happy in the sense of mine interest in thee, but never so happy as now. This cross is sanctified indeed; for it has removed what hindered my communion with thee, and has brought me to seek thy presence, and to enjoy thy supports, and thy comforts. I was foolish enough to wish it might pass from me; but this was mine infirmity. Pardon it, my sweet Jesus, and accept mine unfeigned thanks for thy late mercies. Never in my life did I find the virtue of thy sacrifice in the peace of my conscience, nor had I such intimate communion with thee in thy finished salvation as I have had under this cross. It tried me indeed; but the trial was to thy glory, and to my profit. I am now more satisfied than ever that thy salvation is infinitely perfect, and that I have my share in it: I have it indeed now; for I am a partaker of the things which accompany salvation. I am making use of them—I find their reality—I enjoy their sweetness—blessing and thanks and praise without ceasing be unto thee, my adorable God and Saviour.

Is it not, O my soul, thy fervent prayer that thou mayst live in holy friendship with Jesus? Why, then, dost thou fear his cross, which is his appointed way and means of improving thine intimacy with him, and likeness to him? Oh study the discovery of his love in the scriptures; and take particular notice of the promises which he has made to his suffering brethren. Read, mark them, mix faith with them, that they may be fulfilled in thine experience. Remember, thou canst not suffer but by his will, to which he expects submission: he sends the cross to teach thee this lesson. It cannot hurt thee if thou dost not quarrel with it; but if thy will be resigned to his, herein thou wilt have fellowship with him; and thou wilt have reason constantly to be praying to him—Not my will, Lord, but thine be done!

Consider, for the improvement of this fellowship, that thy Lord himself was exercised with the cross. He has gone before thee, bearing it. He has taken the curse and wrath out of it, and has sanctified it to all his followers. In faith they must take it up, and in patience carry it, or they will not come to the kingdom. Certainly, then, their crucified Lord will be with them; yea, he has promised—"I will be with thee in trouble"—seek his presence, O my soul, under the cross—wait for communion with him—he has said he will be with thee: expect therefore the light of his countenance, which is better than life. Do not fear the cross, since it is to bring thee such a blessing: it is to be the means of thy fellowship with Jesus in his sensible support, and heavenly comfort; take it up then. Suppose it removes all thine earthly joy; let it go: the pain of its loss is not to be compared with the joy of thy spirit. Jesus will give thee pure holy joy, and by his divine art will extract it out of pain. He afflicts, that he may comfort. He takes away sensual, that he may give spiritual pleasure. He removes creature-love, that he may communicate more of this happy love. In mercy he chastises. He sees there is need to mortify sin. He sends the cross for this purpose, and blesses what he sends. It works like wholesome physic. But, oh; it is bitter; it is nauseous to the taste. Why do you chew it then? Swallow the pill. The benefit is not to be found in the mouth, but in the stomach. There it will purge bad humours. The sovereign physician intends it should operate upon every evil temper, which would hinder your blessed communion with him, and should be the means of exercising those graces by which that communion is maintained, and may be improved.

Such is the cross of Christ: taken up in faith, and carried in patience, it promotes daily fellowship with him; which is the greatest blessing upon earth: there is no greater in heaven; only, they enjoy it by sense, and we by faith: but we have the same fellowship with them in Jesus, and the same communion with them in the graces of his salvation. And for these he makes way by his cross. He deadens the soul to the life of sense, that it may feel more of happiness in him. When he has withdrawn other joys, he often shines into the heart with joy unspeakable. He generally vouchsafes these his love tokens to his suffering brethren, and gives his richest cordials in their deepest distress. Each of such happy souls can say—It is good for me to suffer with Jesus. Yes, Lord; I am thy witness: thy cross is good: it has been the means of my greatest good; for thou hast brought me by it forsake communion with other objects, and to enjoy communion with thee in thy precious love. If thou hast been pleased to take away any of my beloved objects, thou hast in much mercy supplied their place with thy presence. I have found my losses my chief gain. O my Jesus! Lord God almighty! I bless thee and adore thee for the distinguishing grace vouchsafed to me under the cross. It was entirely from thee, and the effect of thy love, that I had any patience or any fellowship with thee in the way of suffering. It was thy doing; and I glorify thee for enabling me to maintain peace with the Father through faith in thine obedience unto death, and for satisfying me that my crosses were appointed and sent by covenant love. Thou art the giver of these blessings; and on thee I wait for the continuance of them. Whatever thou callest upon me to suffer, order it and me as seemeth best to thy godly wisdom; but leave me not to myself. Be always with me, my good Lord! that I may bear thy cross, and carry it patiently and profitably; thou sustaining both me and it every step of my way to heaven. Hear me, my Jesus, and answer; for without thee I can do nothing; but strengthened by thee I shall be able to bear all things, and my daily cross will keep me in daily communion with thee to my profit and to thine eternal praise. Amen.

Thus the cross of Christ is sanctified, and keeps up communion with him in the blessings of his salvation: so it does with the Father in his love. In the covenant, his name is expressive of his office. He is a Father, who has every holy affection and feeling of love. He embraces in the bowels of the tenderest parent all his family—Christ the head, and all the members of his body, the church. With one undivided love his heart is set upon Christ and them. And with the same bountiful hand he blesses him and them. What Christ is, they shall be. In this most gracious relation he stands to the whole household of faith. He is their Father who loves and accepts them, pardons, justifies, sanctifies, and blesses them with all spiritual and eternal blessings in Christ Jesus.

It is hard to believe this under the cross. To cleave to him in love, as our Father, when his hand is lifted up to smite, yea, when we smart under his rod, then to see love in his heart and love guiding his hand, is faith very triumphant. We are apt to look upon our sufferings as coming from the wrath of God. We think he must be displeased, or else he would not delight to put us to pain: upon this account we are not reconciled to the cross, but would shake it off, if we could. The scripture give us a different view of this matter, and represents God in a more amiable light, even in the severest chastisement of his children. He is their Father, and they are his sons. This relation cannot subsist without his chastening them. He informs them of the necessity of it; he declares to them his purpose and grace before the chastening, and he assigns the motives and ends of his proceeding. He has always the same Father's love, and is always dealing with them as with sons. His cross is one of the chief marks of it. He sends it with a message of love, and it comes to them big with mercies. When the Father intends an abundant communication of his love, he generally makes way for it by some heavy cross; and when he would continue, or increase his favours, he keeps the cross upon them. It is his appointed means of promoting fellowship with him in the graces and blessings of his fatherly love; and it answers his end, when it is received by faith, and carried by patience; for then the believer, resting on the sure foundation laid for him in the holy life and death of Immanuel, sees the Father reconciled, and expects every promised blessing from his love. Whatever cross comes, he receives it from his Father in Jesus. He holds fast this truth—God is my God—he loves me perfectly in his Son, and therefore I shall find some proof of his fatherly love in this affliction. But if his faith be weak, if he forget or forsake for a time his foundation, then the cross will become intolerable. Murmuring will arise. The flesh will hearken to unbelief. Fretfulness will take place, and thus God will be robbed of his glory, and the believer of his comfort. It has pleased God therefore, in order to strengthen his children's faith against these attacks, to give them many plain declarations of his invariable intention to do them good in all their afflictions. The Son is a witness for him: he was in the bosom of the Father, and knew all the purposes of his heart. He has given us a most delightful account of the Father's design in afflicting his children—"I am," says he to his disciples, "the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman: every branch that beareth not fruit in me, he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, HE PURGETH IT, THAT IT MAY BRING FORTH MORE FRUIT." The Father looks upon all his children as one with Christ; as much united to him, and in him, as the branches are in the vine; therefore, as a wise husbandman, he takes the special charge and care of them. Every branch that does not bear fruit in Christ—it is not as we read it, every branch in me, but every branch that does not bear fruit in me—whatever it may seem to be—in profession a branch—in show a fruitful branch; yet it has no life: it was never cut off from the old dead stock, nor grafted into me, the life-giving vine. The husbandman knows this well. Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up. He does this in an hour of trial. Then it appears that such branches were only in appearance united to the vine; for if he had made them part of it, he would no doubt have continued them in it; but he took them away, that they might be manifest that they were not one with the vine. This is a great part of the vine-dresser's business—he suffers no rotten branches upon his vine. He goes over his charge, and attends to every branch. If any seem to men or to themselves to be in the vine (for hypocrites are great self-deceivers, and the self-righteous love to be deceived, and proud nature is fond of growing into Christ by something of its own) the vine-dresser in due time discovers their mistake, and manifests to the world that they were not branches of his grafting; for he taketh them away; but every branch, says Christ, that beareth fruit by its communion with me he purgeth: by his divine husbandry, he removes every thing, which would stop its growth and hinder its fruitfulness. The branches of the vine are so weak, that they always want a prop—he supports them They often run very luxuriant—he cuts them with his pruning knife. They have many bad humours and juices in them—those he corrects. He purges every noxious quality, and whatever is contrary to the holy nature of the heavenly vine, he subdues. Most merciful is his purpose herein. He would have the branches of his own grafting to be lively and flourishing, like the stock upon which they grow. "I am the vine," says Christ; "ye are the branches." God's husbandry is to make the branches like the vine; therefore he purgeth them, in order that they may bring forth much fruit. And is this his design? Does he afflict them entirely for their good? Does he send every trial and trouble to purge their corruptions and to quicken their graces? Has the Lord Jesus given us such a pleasing view of his Father's love, assuring us that all crosses are sent by him to make us more lively and more fruitful? Since this is the case, what great reason hast thou, O my soul, to expect these blessings from the cross? Here is a promise for thy faith to rest on: a promise which discovers the heart of thy Father and his abundant love in afflicting thee. He would have thee not only to believe in his love, but also to enjoy it. He afflicts thee; but it is in order to thy keeping up communion with him under the cross; and he knows it is the best means of keeping it up and of promoting it. O seek then by faith for the promised fruit. Expect in patience the rich harvest. And that thou mayest quietly submit to the Father's will in purging them, as a branch, observe how exactly the apostle Paul agrees with his blessed Master—"Furthermore we have had fathers of our flesh, who corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? For they verily for a few days corrected us, after their own pleasure: but he for our profit, that we might be PARTAKERS OF HIS HOLINESS." There is a reverence due to earthly parents; and children are required to submit to their correction; although herein they often consult their own will and pleasure more than their children's profit. And is not greater reverence due to the Father of our spirits? and shall not we submit to his corrections, especially since his design in them is to promote the greatest dignity and highest happiness of his children, even to make them partakers of his holiness? for to partake is not only to give them a title to, but also to give them possession of, to communicate, to have fellowship with him, to share with him, in his holiness. Holiness is the Father's image in his children, by which he makes them like him, and capable of enjoying him. He chose them in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy. He chose them in Christ, and made Christ their sanctification. In him they partake, as branches in the vine, of his holy nature. They are one with him in righteousness and true holiness. He is the divine root, from which all the branches, by the influence of the holy Spirit, derive their nourishment and growth. From him is their fruit found. And the heavenly husbandman, purposing to make the branches very fruitful, has provided effectual means: among which the chief is, his fatherly correction. This he sends to all his children, and in the tenderest love. He would have them to bring forth much fruit, that herein he may be glorified—holy fruit, produced by his care and culture, and ripened by daily communications of his grace. Therefore he appoints many heavy trials and crosses, by which he designs to bring them not only to believe in his love, but also to a growing enjoyment of it. He would communicate to them an increase of its blessings. He would have them nearer to himself and more like to himself—holy as he is holy—not in degree, but in likeness. He would teach them more submission to his will, for which he wisely and mercifully suits the cross. He would improve their love to him, which he does by manifesting his to them: therefore he sends his cross to deaden their hearts to other love, that he may give them a happier sense of his. And his children have found suffering times blessed times. They never had such nearness to their Father, such holy freedom with him, and such heavenly refreshments from him, as under the cross. It only took away what stopped the increase of this happiness, which thereby was made more spiritual and exalted. The cross, thus sanctified, is the greatest blessing on this side of heaven: because by it the Father keeps his children in the closest communion, that they have with him upon earth; by it he purges them, makes them fruitful, and partakers of his holiness; by it he crucifies the life of sense, deadens them to the world, mortifies their lusts and passions; and by it, as the outward man perisheth, the inward man is renewed day by day. Most blessed renewal! Daily the Father communicates, and by means of the cross, new life, new strength, and new comfort to the inward man. By the right spirit renewed within him he learns the necessity of the daily cross—he sees the merciful appointment of it to teach resignation to the Father's holy will, to work a conformity to the first-born among many brethren, both in suffering and by suffering, to bring in sensible experience of the Father's support and comfort. What blessings are these! how great! how precious! to be branches in the vine, and to have the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ the husbandman, who grafts them into him—Oh what an infinite mercy is this! and to be under his special care, faithfully watched over, in order to remove every thing hurtful, and to bestow every thing useful, this love passeth understanding: and to have this love to feast upon in the absence of other comforts, to have them taken away only to make room for this, to enjoy this most plentifully, even under troubles and afflictions, and to be only purged by them in order to bring forth much fruit; these are triumphs of divine love. O my God and Father! I confess and deplore my frequent mistaking thy dealings with me. I did not see they were all in love. Through mine ignorance and self-will I thought thy cross was a punishment, and I used wickedly to despise the chastening of the Lord. Pardon thy servant concerning this thing. Forgive mine opposition to thy cross, and subdue mine impatient desire to shake it off. Holy Father, mortify my will, and make it bow to thine. Thy will be done in me, and by me.

Purge me, and make me fruitful under the cross. Chasten me, that I may be a partaker of thy holiness. I bless thee, O my God, for the desire which I have to keep up communion with thee in my sufferings: I believe thou art my perfectly reconciled Father in Jesus, and therefore, trusting to thy love in him, I would take up thy cross and expect under it thy covenant blessings. Yes, Lord. This is of grace. Thine be the praise for showing me the need of suffering, and of renewing me by it in the inward man to a conformity to thy holy will. I now see thy love herein. It is as much love to crucify the outward man as to renew the inward man. I believe it in my judgment: O blessed God, let me experience it in my heart and walk. Order all my crosses, that they may work together under thee for thy glory and for my good: and if afflictions abound, let consolations abound also. I have thy promise, and I rely upon it. Let it be fulfilled unto thy servant for thy dear Son's sake. Amen, and Amen.

This blessed communion with the Father and the Son, which the sanctified use of the cross is made the means of promoting, is maintained by the Holy Spirit. He is a person in the Godhead coequal and coeternal with the Father and with the Son. It is his office to apply and to make effectual all covenant blessings. Faith in the Son; and through him love to the Father, are from his influence. He is the Lord and giver of all spiritual life, and of every spiritual enjoyment: for so the apostle teaches in his prayer for the Corinthians—The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all. This communion of the Holy Ghost consisted in partaking by his means with the Lord Jesus Christ in his grace, and with the Father in his love. The Holy Ghost made the application: he quickened the soul, and inspired the breath of life into it, and on him it depends for every spiritual act, as much as the life of the body does on its breathing. Whoever steadfastly believes in Jesus under the cross, and experiences under it the Father's love has this fellowship with the Father and the Son by the operation of the Holy Spirit: therefore that sweet grace, which bears up with faith in Jesus, and with patience under the Father's rod, is said to be from him—"The fruit of the Spirit is long-suffering"—He enables the soul to wait quietly. And if the time be long, and the suffering hard, he gives long patience. He does not take away the sense of pain, but he bestows strength to bear it; and by it he produces a plentiful harvest of graces and blessings. Thus he teaches us himself—"Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward, it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby." These are the fruits of the Spirit: they are all of his producing. And they are fruits of righteousness, which none can produce but those who are one with Christ; and in him righteous before God. Although sense cannot perceive how they should grow or ripen upon the cross of Christ, yet faith can. The promise is sure. And waiting faith, exercised with suffering, finds many promised fruits. O my soul, consider this precious scripture, and with close attention. Study it. Treasure it up in thy heart. It contains a rich cordial for the afflicted. Observe, there is love in sending the cross; love to be manifested by it, and heavenly fruits of love to grow upon it. Why, then, is suffering so hard? Why art thou so little profited by it. Is it not generally barren, because thou art not looking to the word of promise, and depending upon the Holy Spirit to give thee the promised fruit? Ask thyself therefore, especially in the hour of suffering, Am I now expecting the communion of the Holy Ghost, that by his grace I may partake with the Son in his salvation, and with the Father in his love? Is this my present experience? There is no bearing the cross without it. Art thou then, O my soul, trusting to him for this happy fellowship, and hoping, that, as thou art a branch in the vine, and the husbandman is now purging thee, thou mayest bring forth much fruit? And observe, what kind of fruit it is. All the effects of being in union with Christ, and of having communion with him, are called fruits of righteousness. Christ is the vine. The branch must be one with him before it can live and grow—one with him in his life and death—a partaker of his divine righteousness—and then the branch abiding in him by the influence of the Holy Spirit will be made fruitful in love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: for the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth. He brings forth all the fruit that is to the glory of God—and it is all peaceable fruit; for it is produced by him in consequence of covenant-love, by which the Father is revealed as the God of peace, and the Son as the great peace-maker; and when the Holy Spirit enables the poor sinner to believe this, then he gives him joy and peace in believing: being justified by faith, he has peace with God through Jesus Christ. The cross soon comes after this—not to destroy, but to try this faith—not to take away, but to confirm this peace: it is sent to give proof of the soundness of faith, and to manifest the sweetness of divine love; for it comes from the God of peace, and all the fruits which he intends to produce by it are peaceable, such as should increase the happy sense of peace in the minds of his children. And for this purpose the Holy Spirit abides with them. He has revealed the Father's love in scripture, and he is a faithful witness of it to their hearts. He sheds it abroad, and satisfies them of it: yea, he gives them sensible experience and enjoyment of it under the cross. This produces a quiet submission to his will, and an humble dependence upon his power: which are manifested by waiting upon God in all ways and means for the grace promised to his afflicted children. The cross requires great grace, and therefore calls forth much prayer. Suffering times are praying times. The cross brings sinners upon their knees: Manasseh in affliction entreated the Lord: so did Paul—"Behold, he prayeth." keeps believers upon their knees, as the prophet witnesses—"Lord, in trouble have they visited thee; they poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them." The Lord himself declares the same—"I will go and return to my place till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face; in their affliction they will seek me early." Accordingly they did seek him—"Come," say they, "and let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up." Oh blessed fruit of affliction! when sanctified by the Spirit it teaches the children of God to pray fervently, and to continue instant in prayer: it discovers the weakness of the flesh, and the rebellion of the will, and shows the necessity of drawing near to God for strength and patience. It keeps the mind in a praying frame, expecting by the grace of the Spirit communion with the Father and the Son. The cross makes this communion necessary. It cannot be endured without a belief of the Father's love in Jesus, and therefore the Spirit of prayer keeps this belief in exercise, and enables the soul to plead the promise of strength to endure patiently, and to bring forth much fruit. The promise cannot fail. They who trust in it cannot be disappointed, but shall find grace to help in time of need. As prayer is thus necessary, so the Holy Spirit generally makes it sweet under the cross. Is any afflicted among you? Let him pray. Prayer is the appointed means of his comfort. If affliction send him to God, God will meet him and make him joyful in his house of prayer. How encouraging are these words!—"Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you." In every case of distress, draw nigh in faith to God: he is a very present help. Seek his face, and you will find him near unto you: for the Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him, nigh to hear, to answer, and to comfort. Thus his promise runs—"Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer: thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am."—What is your burden? I am present to give strength to bear it. What is your grief? Here are my comforts—Do your tribulations abound? Here are my consolations abounding also. Here I am—Ask what you will believing, and it shall be done unto you. Oh what times of refreshing are these? The Holy Ghost sensibly comforts the afflicted. When they draw nigh to God, he is present to make their hearts joyful. He dispels their darkness with the light of his countenance, and turns their mourning into joy. And thus they have not only communion with God in prayer, but also such communications of his heavenly love, that they can often say, It is good for us that we have been in trouble.

In times of trouble the WORD also is generally sweet. All people in distress look out for some comfort: and the Holy Spirit directs believers to the Scriptures. "Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope."

The afflicted feel their want of patience and comfort, which puts them upon careful hearing and reading of the good word of God. They want to know what it says of their case; and when they meet a suitable promise, then they have a ground of hope. Their present trials require them to seek for something more than the truth of the promise. This being credited, they therefore expect the promised blessing. When the famine was in Canaan, Jacob and his family could not have been kept alive by believing there was corn in Egypt: they must either fetch it or die. Trouble calls for the experience of the promised blessings, and when they are received at such a time, they are sweet indeed. They feel as ease doth after pain. When the Holy Spirit applies the comfort, the promise by which he applies it is precious. It is like a reviving cordial to a fainting heart. Oh how sweet are thy words unto my taste; yea, sweeter than honey unto my mouth. Honey is sweet; but the word is sweeter. When through patience and comfort of the scriptures the afflicted believer enjoys the good of the promise, then he can say—Now I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me; let, I pray thee, thy merciful kindness be for my comfort according to thy word unto thy servant.

Sweet is the comfort which the afflicted receive from God the Comforter under the cross; not only in suffering but also after it. AFTERWARD also "it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness." He who carries the cross of Christ does not labour in vain and spend his strength for nought; but he is bearing forth good seed. If he sow it in tears, yet he shall reap in joy. The Lord looks at the fruit, and intends to bring forth much of it by the cross. We are apt to look at the suffering, and forget the fruit. He has the end in view in the use of all means; and the Holy Spirit has revealed this clearly, that we might depend upon him for receiving the proper fruit of affliction. The Lord says, he led his people through the great and terrible wilderness, wherein were flying fiery serpents and scorpions, and drought, that he might humble them, and that he might prove them, to do them good AT THE LATTER END. He intended to do them good. This was first in his heart. Then the way in which he would do it: he would lead them through many afflictions; by which they should find at the latter end how good God was to them. The promise of this was their encouragement to bear the cross till they reaped the fruit. In like manner the Lord says to the afflicted Jews—"I know the thoughts that I think toward you, saith the Lord; thoughts of peace and not of evil, to give you AN EXPECTED END"—such an end as you would wish, and having my promise, such as you may safely hope for—my thoughts indeed are not as your thoughts—you think I have cast you off, and that your present cross is to crush you: now I mean to do you good by it; and so the end will prove. Wait a little in faith, and all will come to a happy issue.

Are these scriptures the truth of God? Has the eternal Spirit promised in them that, although the bearing of the cross be very painful, yet it is very profitable? Will he afterwards cause them to bring forth much fruit who have been exercised with it? Art thou then waiting, O my soul, under all thy troubles for the promised end? Dost thou expect it, and in patience tarry the Lord's leisure? Canst thou look back, and see how merciful the dealings of thy God have been—how gracious his rod—how loving his correction? Canst thou look forward under every cross, persuaded that God will do thee good at the latter end? that he will cause many peaceable fruits to grow upon this seemingly barren tree? yea, that these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work for thee an eternal weight of glory, far more excellent than can be conceived? O God the Holy Ghost! I do believe it: I would not doubt of the truth of the promise in thy word, nor of the truth of thy grace in my heart. I therefore beseech thee, O thou Spirit Jehovah, to enable me to keep up communion with thee in all my trials, that I may bring forth those peaceable fruits of righteousness. Thou art the giver of every grace. I acknowledge thee to be the author of my spiritual life: I was dead in trespasses and sins, and thou hast quickened me. It is of thy mere gift that I have any faith, and that upon the trial it was found to be true faith. I bless thee for this grace, and humbly pray for the continuance and for the increase of it. Meet me in the use of all means, and enable me to grow in faith, rooted and grounded in Christ Jesus, that I may also grow in love to his Father and to my Father. O thou divine revealer of his heavenly love! shed it abroad more abundantly in my heart, that I may learn more resignation to his will, more subjection to his authority, and more submission to his rod. I acknowledge thee, O holy-making Spirit, to be the teacher of patience; and what I have learned was thy revelation. It was in thy strength that I was enabled to go on with any quietness bearing my cross. Thy grace made me willing, and nothing else can keep me willing, to have the flesh crucified with its affections and lusts. O God, put forth thine almighty power, and enable me to part with every thing which would hinder my fellowship with the Father and the Son. I desire so to walk this day as to have growing fellowship with the eternal Three; and I desire it through thine influence. O God the Holy Ghost, carry on thy work. Exalt and purify my faith and patience, and every grace: if it be thy will to do this under the cross, oh make me willing and able to bear it. Let every cross bring forth richer and riper fruit, until thou give me an exceeding great and eternal harvest of glory. I ask this in the name of Jesus, and I expect an answer of grace through the Father's love in him, to whom with thee, O blessed Spirit, three persons in one Godhead, be equal glory, worship, and praise, now and for ever. Amen.

Meditate, O my soul, with seriousness upon this great subject. Study the scripture account of the cross. The knowledge of it enters into the very essence of the peace and comfort of thy walk. Thou canst not run away from the cross; thou canst not cast it off: remember, if thou wilt be Christ's disciple, thou must take it up daily and follow him. If it be very heavy and very grievous, yet it will not hinder thee from following him. He carried the heaviest part for thee —he endured the curse and punishment due to thy sins—he left no wrath for thee to suffer. Blessed be his love, the cross has no curse in it now—thy sufferings are all sent from love—and his love will help thee to bear them and to profit by them; for he has promised to bless and sanctify them to his people. And he makes them a blessing indeed. Never on this side of heaven does he give them such near and happy communion with himself as under the cross. Oh read then, and study what is revealed in scripture concerning it. Go over it again and again. Learn well, and inwardly digest the doctrine of the cross of Christ—the necessity—the benefit—the blessings of it. Meditate and feed upon the sweet promises relating to it: mix faith with them, that they may nourish and strengthen thee in time of need. But never forget that thy cross, be it what it will, is appointed for thee in covenant love. It is the portion allotted thee by thy heavenly Father—decreed in weight and measure to an atom. Thou shalt not bear it one moment longer than he has determined; and many precious fruits it shall produce. Thou wilt find suffering times growing times—growth in faith and patience, in mortification to sin, and in fellowship with the ever-blessed Trinity. The author of thy faith puts it to the trial: it comes out of the lion's den unhurt: it comes out of the fiery furnace refined. God is glorified hereby, and thou art strengthened. He sends the cross to teach thee patience, and he continues it for the exercise and for the improvement of the same grace. He intends by his chastening to crucify the flesh, and to mortify thy members which are upon the earth. In love he takes away sensual, that he may give thee spiritual joys. He does not hate thee; but love guides every stroke of his chastening. He is only weakening thine attachment to earthly things, that he may increase thy communion with Father, Son, and Spirit. Oh what blessings are these! Meditate, O my soul, much and often upon them. Pray for the experience of them in time of need; and be assured with all these helps, the cross will be exercise hard enough for thy patience. Thou canst carry it only in the strength of almighty grace. May the Lord strengthen thee from day to day to run the race set before thee, till thou win the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

CHAPTER X.

The believer exercised with the inward cross, learns to walk more humbly with his God.

The outward cross is not always a burden alike heavy. God gives his children a little respite. After they have been long tried, he sometimes removes their trouble, and gives them ease and outward prosperity. Their sun arises as it doth in nature. After many cold and dark days, a fine season comes—finer for coming after them. The sky grows clear and serene; the air is soft and refreshing; the sun shines with warm and enlivening rays; every thing looks pleasant, and smiles around you. So it is in the kingdom of grace. The believer may not be always in heaviness through manifold afflictions. He has his times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. He prospers and is in health. The blessing of God is upon his substance. Every thing that he takes in hand succeeds. He is happy in his circumstances, and happy in his family. He sees the goodness of God in these mercies, and he is thankful. But if the heavenly Father sometimes indulge his children with the removal of the outward cross, yet he never does with the inward. They carry it all their days; and a heavy burden it is. So long as they are in the body, while they are in this tabernacle, they do groan, being burdened: for

The INWARD CROSS is the fault and corruption of sinful nature, which doth remain in the regenerate, and is their continual grief and plague; because it is always opposing their holy and happy walk with God. It is called in scripture

THE FLESH; the whole man being carnal, and full of lusting against the Spirit;

THE OLD MAN; being the first in us, before the new man is created by the Spirit of regeneration;

A BODY OF SIN; made up completely of members and appetites, in which there is not only an absence of all good, but also a propensity to all evil, insomuch that nothing can move or stir in this body, but what is sinful;

THE LAW OF SIN; because sin rules and governs the natural man;

INDWELLING SIN; because it dwells in the whole man, both in soul and body;

CONCUPISCENCE, or LUST; which the apostle says, he should not have known to be sin unless the law had said—Thou shalt not covet or lust.

This fallen nature is also said to be corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, to be contrary to the Spirit, to rebel against the law of God and not to be subject to it, neither indeed can be. "This corruption of nature doth remain, according to our reformers," Art. 9—"Yea in them that are regenerated, whereby the lust of the flesh," called in Greek, froneema sarkos, which some do expound, "the wisdom," some "sensuality," some "the affection," some "the desire of the flesh," is not subject to the law of God: and although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet the apostle doth confess that "concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin." And in the 15th Art. of Christ alone without sin, they say, "that all we the rest, although baptized and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things: and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us."

The compilers of our articles were holy men, and taught of God. They spake his mind and will according to the oracles of truth. And it will be a great comfort to a poor soldier, wearied with fighting against those lusts, which war against the soul, to find that the best Christians in every age have been engaged in the same holy war. This will mightily encourage him to take to him the whole armour of God, that he may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand.

Attend then, O my soul, to the law and to the testimony. Pray for the spirit of wisdom and revelation. Desire grace to submit to the truth of God, that, whatever he teaches plainly and expressly in his word, thou mayst believe it, and abide by it. Read and pray, till thou art satisfied, and the conviction of mind influence thy heart and walk. Art thou to carry the inward cross all the way to heaven? Is there no discharge in this war? no truce to be made? not even a cessation of arms? But art thou to be fighting on the good fight of faith till the captain of thy salvation take thee out of the field of battle? Oh hard service! to be night and day—at home and abroad—in the closet and in the church—at hearing the word and meditating upon it—fasting and praying—at the shop and at the exchange—every where and at all times—forced to be in arms against the assaults of indwelling sin! This is a warfare terrible indeed to flesh and blood. The length of it—never ended so long as breath is in the body; the painfulness of it—consisting in being at war with a man's self, and in resisting his bosom sins and strongest appetites—What discouragements are these from entering into, and from continuing in this battle! Why should it be wondered, then, that some persons, who only follow the camp, and are not of it, should repent when they see this war, and return to Egypt? or that others, pretending to be on Christ's side, but never one with him, should dream of shaking off this cross, and of sitting down here in a land of perfect peace? This is the coward's paradise. They want to rest quiet on this side of Jordan, and would not go over with Jesus to fight for the promised land. O dear Saviour, keep thy noble army from this delusion of Satan! So long as they are in the body of sin and death, make them good soldiers of Christ Jesus, resisting unto blood, striving against sin; for so long must we be in this hot battle. It is decreed by the sovereign will of God—and he is always of one mind. He has revealed it in his word of truth, that the corruption of nature doth remain in his regenerate children; they have an old man and a new; they have flesh and spirit; they have nature and grace; and he has described the combat which is to last through life between these two. The beloved apostle bears a clear testimony. He is speaking of those whom the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, and who had fellowship with the Father and with the Son, and who proved the truth of this by their walking in the light. He puts himself among them, and declares—"If we say, that we have no sin now, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us"—If WE say—he saith not, If thou say, as if he spake of some particular person; nor if ye say, as if he intended ordinary Christians alone—but if we apostles, or whatever we be, say so; if any of us, if I, for instance, should think I had no sin now, who am a saint of a hundred years old, because I was a great favourite of the Lord Christ, and have been a great sufferer for him, or because I have lived blameless before men, and have been a witness for the truth in my writings, and am ready to seal it with my blood; if, upon account of any thing done by me, or in me, of any real excellency or attainment, I should fancy myself in a state of sinless perfection; the Holy Ghost charges me with self-deceit. A dreadful delusion! arising from the pride of my heart and its rebellion against God, and discovering the most gross ignorance of God's righteousness in the holy law, and of Christ's righteousness in the glorious gospel: but if I was to say, as well as to think it; if I should tell any body, Now I have no sin; I am perfect; now, at this time, I have received perfect purity of heart; for ever since I have received it, I have had nothing stirring in me for one year, for two, twenty, forty years, but love, pure love to God; God is in all my thoughts, and nothing but God; I do his will on earth, as it is done in heaven; if I should say so, I should tell a great lie;—for I should deceive myself, and the truth would not be in me.

Are these indeed the very words of the apostle? "If we say that we have no sin now, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Can no other sense be fairly put upon them, but that the holy John had sin in him at every given moment of his life? Is this the plain literal meaning of the passage? As it certainly is, observe then, O my soul, the decisive evidence given here by the Holy Ghost concerning the inward cross. Pray for his teaching that thou mayst understand, and pray for his grace, that thou mayst profit from, this scripture. Here is his infallible record concerning St. John and all highly favoured believers—He asserts, that there was no time of their lives in which they were free from indwelling sin: God forbid, then, that I should think I have no sin! He avers that if they should say they had none, they were deceived and that if they should stand to it, as popish mystics, and protestant perfectionists do, the searcher of hearts declares that they lie, and do not tell the truth—the truth is not in them: for the father of lies has flattered them and drawn them into self-idolatry, with a wicked design to corrupt their minds from the simplicity that is in Christ. Beware, O my soul, of this deceit! The Holy Ghost has warned thee of it. He foresaw how the first sin would break out in after times, and pride would persuade men that they were perfect in the flesh; he therefore so guarded this scripture, that none can mistake it but such as turn away their ears from the truth. He put all the words in the present tense, lest any should think he was speaking of time past, or of what men were before the blood of Christ had cleansed them. If WE NOW SAY—We, who now have fellowship with the blessed Trinity, and are walking in the light of their countenance—say that WE HAVE NO SIN, nor had any formerly, he is not speaking of that: If he were, the Holy Ghost understands grammar, and can make no mistake in expressing himself; he would certainly have used the past tense, but he uses the present, NOW HAVE NO SIN, so as not to want the cleansing blood of Jesus this moment as much as ever—If we have any such thoughts, WE NOW DECEIVE OURSELVES, AND THE TRUTH IS NOT NOW IN US. How forcible and strong is this testimony from the mouth of John! And the sense as well as the grammar shows that he is speaking of believers, and that there is sin in them; for throughout the chapter he treats of the very same persons, and describes not what they were before, but what they are since they received the grace of God. They were cleansed from all sin by the blood of the Lamb, were admitted into communion with the Father and the Son by the Spirit, and they enjoyed this communion, walking in the light, as God is in the light. These are the persons here mentioned; of whom God says, they had sin still in them, indwelling sin; the fault and corruption of nature still remained in them; and if they fancied it did not, they would be sadly deceived; they would entirely mistake the covenant of grace, which was to bring sinners sensible of their wants and miseries to live out of themselves upon the fulness of the God-man; they would forget their own character, under which alone they can be saved, salvation being only for sinners; they would fall into the crime of the devil, by pride exalting themselves against the person and work of the incarnate God; and they would quite pervert the law and the gospel; for, in order to maintain their inherent perfection, they are forced to legalize the gospel, and to make it consist of certain terms and conditions, upon the performance of which sinners shall be saved; and then, in order to comfort themselves with their having performed these terms and conditions, they are forced to turn rank Antinomians: they lessen the evil of sin, they excuse it in themselves, and make just nothing of it: they call it by several pretty soft names, such as infirmity, frailty, excrescence, and at last they get quite rid of it by laying it upon the devil, and by terming it an injection of old Satan. And thus they deceive themselves into perfection, and insist upon it that they have no sin, although they have enough in them to damn the whole world. O God! open the eyes of these self-deceivers! and bring them into the way of truth.

Such is the clear evidence of the Holy Spirit. He asserts that the greatest believers, while in the body, have sin in them. Dost thou yield, O my soul, to his testimony? Art thou fully convinced of it from the work of his grace, as well as from the word of his truth? Dost thou feel indwelling sin? Is it the plague of thy heart, and the burden of thy life? When thou art willing to walk humbly with thy God, is it continually in thy way, raising objections, putting difficulties, and suggesting hindrances? Is it like a heavy weight pressing thee down in thy race, that thou canst not run so long, or so fast, as thou couldst wish? Since this is indeed thy daily cross, and the bearing of it the hardest part of thy warfare, oh read with diligence the scripture account of it. Take notice of the Lord's champions, how they felt under this burden, from whence they derived strength to bear it, and had comfort under it. Hear the man after God's own heart crying out—"Mine iniquities are gone over my head, as a heavy burden; they are too heavy for me." David had a heavy load: he was ready to sink, and he could not cast it off: he could not go into his closet or to the house of God: he could not sit upon his throne, or go in and out before his family: but this grievous cross so bowed him down greatly, that he went mourning all the day long. The burden of it was intolerable, and would have crushed him under it, if he had not learned how to cast it on the Lord—"Make haste," says he, "to help me, O Lord God of my salvation!" Here he found relief: the prayer of faith was heard, and God was the strength of his salvation.

Under the same burden a New Testament saint went groaning all his days. He had a hard conflict between the flesh and the spirit, and he has left the account of it upon record. Blessed be God for the seventh chapter of the Romans! We there read of the inward cross, with which all the children of God are exercised. In the very same Paul there was delight in the law of God after the inward man; but he found another law in his members, rebelling against the law of God: the flesh, in which dwelleth no good thing, never ceased to assault the spirit with its vile thoughts, legal workings, and rebellious inclinations: when he had a will to do good, he could not do it so perfectly, as he desired: his best moments were never free from the inroads of indwelling sin: therefore, in the bitterness of his soul he cried out,—"Oh! wretched man that I am!"—Oh! that sigh came from the bottom of his heart—I know what he felt—he groaned, being burdened—weary and tired with this continual conflict, he looked out for deliverance—"Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" He saw by faith his almighty Saviour, and in him expecting everlasting victory—"I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." He rested upon Christ in the battle, and through him waited for deliverance, knowing that one day he should be made more than conqueror.

Well, then, O my soul, here is comfort. If the corruption of nature be thy cross, so it was to David, and so it was to Paul. Thy case is not singular. It is common to every soldier who is fighting under the banner of Christ. This cross is unavoidable; because it is in thy bosom. It is thine inmost self—thy whole nature—which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts. Thou hast not an atom of thy body, nor the least motion or stirring of any faculty in thy soul, but sin is in it; and therefore it is capable of being a plague to the new man. The Holy Ghost speaks thus of the inward warfare—"This I say then: Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh: for the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would." These words are addressed to the Galatians, who were believers, and called into the liberty of the gospel; but by false teaching they were under a great temptation. They had begun in the spirit, but they thought of being perfected in the flesh. They set out with salvation by faith, but expected salvation at last by works. Among other arguments to convince them of their mistake, here is one unanswerable; namely, No works of ours can save a sinner but such as are perfect; no works of ours are perfect; therefore they cannot save a sinner. And that none of them are perfect, is certain, because in every one of them there is something of the flesh of corrupt nature, as well as something of the spirit and of spiritual nature. These two are contrary as life and death, and they are always in action, every moment the one lusting against the other; so that no believer can do the things which he would, so perfectly as the holy law requires.

How grievous must this inward cross be to a real believer! For it consists in the opposition which he finds within him to God and to the things of God. The flesh ever lusteth against the spirit—the old man against the new. There is a continual war between these contrary powers. The flesh is a complete body of sin, armed with every member and instrument of rebellion that can resist the motions and actions of the new man. There is darkness in the understanding, always clouding the light of the glorious gospel; and therefore we know but in part. The will of the flesh always opposes the holy will of God. There is enmity in the heart working against the love of God and of his will. There is pride to weaken humility—anger to oppose meekness—the carnal mind to fight against spiritual mindedness. When the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak. When you draw near to God in prayer, the imagination will not be confined: it will wander after a thousand vain objects. When you are hearing the word, it will disturb your attention with its unaccountable excursions. It is so sportive and flighty, that you cannot keep it within any bounds. Is it not so, O my soul? Art thou not sensible of this heavy cross? Dost thou not find something in thee always resisting and weakening the exercise of thy graces? and is not this the great plague of thy life? Can there be a greater, than to carry about with thee a sinful nature, daily trying to hinder thee in thy holy walk and happy communion with God? Oh how much does it concern thee, then, to be well skilled in bearing this cross, and behaving under it as a good soldier of Christ Jesus! And to this end the principles before laid down are absolutely necessary. Without them thou canst not rightly understand the nature of indwelling sin, and canst not possibly gain victory over it. Only the doctrines of grace received into thy heart can enable thee to walk with God under this cross. Call to mind, then, what was agreed on in the covenant of the Trinity, and was fulfilled in the person and work of Immanuel for thy peace with the Father, and for thy returning to him in love, and has been applied to thee by the Holy Spirit, who has given thee faith in Jesus, and has manifested the love of the Father in him: thou art therefore now one with thy covenant-head; in him complete and perfect, although thou art in thyself still a sinner. Thou hast a body of sin, through the lusting of which thou art not able to keep the holy law according to its full demand in any one instance. But thou art, before thy Father, what thy surety is. He sees thee in him, without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing—accepted as he is—beloved with the same love—looked upon with the same joy—and blessed with all spiritual blessings in him. Thy surety lived for thee: thou hast the righteousness of God for thy justification. Thy surety died for thee: in him thou art as truly dead unto sin as Christ himself is. Thy surety rose again, and took possession of spiritual and eternal life for thee. He was delivered for thine offences, and raised again for thy justification. Thou shalt reign with him, as certainly as he has now the crown upon his own head. Such is the perfect salvation which is for thee; although thou art still the subject of sin: for thy pardon is without exception or reverse—all trespasses are freely forgiven. Thy justification to life is absolute; for it is God himself that justifieth. He chose thee in Jesus, that thou shouldst be holy and without blame before him—and so thou art. As a member in his body, thou art without blemish. Here is thy relief, under the inward cross. The Father chose thee in his Son, looks upon thee in him, and deals with thee according to covenant love; there is therefore now no condemnation to thee, who art in Christ Jesus. With the sweet sense of this upon thy conscience, persuaded that God is at peace with thee, take up the inward cross. In this delightful view see the curse removed. Thou hast no reason to fear wrath, or death, or hell. Victory over all sins and enemies is certain. Daily, eternal victory is promised. In this faith follow the noble army, who carried this cross to their graves. Fight as they did, looking unto Jesus. Sin is in thee: it was in them; but they looked upon it as a vanquished foe, slain, and put to death when Jesus died for sin once. Likewise reckon thou also thyself to be in him dead unto sin—freed from the dreadful stroke of justice by his death—freed as truly as he is—and therefore thou art no more liable than he is to be condemned and punished. And for the strengthening of this faith, seek for fellowship with him in his death. It is thy privilege, as thou art planted in the likeness of his death to derive power and efficacy from it daily to put sin to death. The more steadfastly thou believest that thou art one with him in his death, the more wilt thou find thy sinful nature crucified with him. Communion is always according to the faith of union with Christ. The strongest faith must have the strongest hold of him, and thereby draw the most virtue from him. It is true, as our faith increases we become more spiritual; and we see corruption more as we see motes in the sun beams. The senses of the new man by exercise gain a quicker perception of sin—we become all over tender as the eye—jealous of the motions, yea, of the appearance of evil. This is real growth. Sin is more felt, in order that the power of Jesus may be put forth to make us hate it, resist it, and overcome it more. As believers are more sensible of their sinfulness in the first Adam, so they grow up into the second Adam, the Lord from heaven: they bear the cross of the corruption of the first, which leads them to constant fellowship with the second—in his death, for the pardon of their corruption—in the power of his death to mortify sin, that it may not have dominion over them.

Corruption is in thee, and it will strive for dominion. Thy sins will sometimes fiercely assault. Their allies, the world and the devil, will join them with stratagems and force: when the battle is hot, and thou art weak, then it behoves thee to live by faith upon Jesus as thy surety, now acting for thee in heaven, as he acted for thee upon earth. He is gone up, as thy high priest, to carry thy name within the veil. He bears it upon the ephod on his shoulders, and upon the breast-plate on his heart: his power and his love are engaged for thee, now he is in glory. He stands in the presence of God, as thy representative. The Father sees thee in him: and thou art in his sight what thy forerunner is. As he stands there, so dost thou stand—righteous as he is righteous—holy as he is holy—beloved as he is beloved—and shalt be blessed as he is blessed. View by faith thy nature in him, exalted and glorified, and for the joy set before thee in him take up thy cross. It is a heavy burden—it is a hard warfare. True. But consider, who shall lay any thing to thy charge for indwelling sin? It is God that justifieth thee from it, who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for thee. He appears in the presence of God for thee, as thine intercessor. He is always in court to represent thy person, and to carry thy cause, especially as to what concerns sin. "If any of us sin," says the beloved disciple, "we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins;" in this office he is skilful, and faithful, and compassionate. He has thine interest at heart—thy safety, thy comfort, under this cross, and thy victory over it. His very glory is so interwoven with thine, that they are one; yea, the advocate and his clients form but one spiritual body, of which every member is what the head is. O my God and Saviour! I bless thee and worship thee for acting for me as mine advocate and intercessor in heaven. Increase, I beseech thee, my faith, that I may see more of the glory of thine office, and may make more use of it, in the bearing of mine inward cross. Oh let thy faithful witness abide with me to enable me, without doubt or wavering, to trust in what thou hast done for me upon earth, and to draw comfort from what thou art now doing for me in heaven. Into thy hands I desire to commit my cause. Lord, undertake for me. Be surety for thy servant for good, and guide me with thy counsel, till thou bring me to thy glory. I ask this for thy mercies' sake. Amen. Is this the true state of the case? Is it certain from the word of God? Is it confirmed from matter of fact? Did the highest believer upon earth experience this inward cross? When his conscience summoned him to the bar of God, and put him upon inquiring what he would plead there for his justification, had he any thing to urge but the sacrifice and righteousness of the ever-blessed Immanuel? And is not this thy plea, O my soul? Dost not thou find so much weakness and infirmity in thy holy things, that thou wouldst seek atonement for the iniquity of them through the intercession of the great high priest? And thou wouldst not think of standing before the throne to claim eternal life as the reward due to thine own holiness. Is not this thine experience? If it be, then take up thy cross in this FAITH. It is thy grief that sin is in thee. The motions and lustings of it are thy burden. The resisting and opposing them is thy continual warfare. And thou hast no prospect before thee of enjoying perfect deliverance from this heavy cross, until death release thee. Blessed be God for the salvation that is in Christ Jesus! There is a provision made in the covenant of grace for the pardon of indwelling sin, for victory over it daily, and for the eternal destruction of the whole body of sin: it shall have no existence in the members, any more than it has in their glorified head. Here is a comfort for thee, O my soul! of God's own providing and of God's own applying. When it is applied to the heart, the cross will be easy. Observe carefully what is revealed concerning the being of sin in the best Christians, and concerning the pardon of it. The Holy Ghost declares it dwells in them, but they are forgiven all trespasses—they are in Christ without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing—in the first Adam they are heirs of sin, death, and hell—in the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, they are heirs of righteousness, life, and glory. He is their covenant head: and they are before God, what he is. This is the record of truth —YE ARE COMPLETE IN HIM. Abide by it, O my soul. Give it full credit, and boldly plead it against all the charges of guilt, and fears of wrath.—

"It is true, I have sin in me, but it is pardoned. God has forgiven me ALL trespasses. I stand before him in my surety, who undertook for me, and I am perfect in him. The Father chose me in his Son: he looks upon the face of his beloved, and sees me in him. In him he is well pleased; so he is with me. As he loves him, so he loves me. This is the glorious privilege, which by faith I now enjoy. I deny sight and sense; and I stick to the word of God. I adhere strictly to its testimony concerning me, believing myself to be dead indeed unto sin in Christ, and in him absolutely freed from guilt and condemnation. The Father is at peace with me, and he loves me in his Son, and with the same love with which he loves him—His Father and my Father. With this persuasion I go to war with my corruptions. I see their traitorous designs. They are fighting against every thing that is dear and precious to my soul. But having the promised grace of the almighty Saviour for my help, I desire to set upon them in his name. I know he has them among mine other enemies under his feet, and I have his word for it that he will put them under mine. Yea, Lord, I believe, and on thy faithful promise I trust, this day. Although I must carry my cross, yet I bless thee and worship thee for removing curse and wrath from it: I can now take it up as thy soldier, and fight against it in thy strength, expecting victory from thee, and to thy glory. O my God, save me from indwelling sin. Let me feel it my burden. Glorify thy grace in me, and by me, that, being endued with power from on high, I may hold out resisting and conquering it till thou give me everlasting victory."

If this, O my soul, be thy constant dependence, then the cross will become light. Guilt makes it heavy. The curse in it makes it intolerable; but by faith thou canst see guilt and curse removed: then it will be no hindrance to thee in thy heavenly walk, but will daily call forth into use and exercise those graces which will help thee forward, and especially

PATIENCE. Here is great need of patience—a continual war—and within thee—thine own bosom the seat of it—and thine own lusts carrying it on and maintaining it. The more spiritual thou art, the more wilt thou feel this inward conflict. The more thou growest into Christ, the more will thy corruptions stir and move: they will be thy continual plague; so that thou wilt not be able to draw any comfort from what thou art in thyself. Here is exercise for patience. Every where indwelling sin is present with thee: upon every temptation ready with its flatteries to entice, and with its power to break out into act and deed. The opposing it is like cutting off a right hand and plucking out a right eye—as contrary to nature, as painful. The hand and the eye cannot be destroyed twice; but inbred lusts, overcome a thousand times, are not in the least discouraged from warring against the soul. Like the troubled sea, never at rest, they are always casting up some sinful mire and dirt. What canst thou do without faith in the Redeemer's blood, without patience to wait for the Redeemer's strength. Every moment there is need of faith and patience, and every moment, if these graces be exercised, they will be improved. The bearing of the cross continually, and the fighting under it on the side of God, will also be the means of teaching thee

THE TRUE SPIRITUAL MORTIFICATION, which does not consist in sin not being in thee, nor in its being put upon the cross daily, nor yet in its being kept upon it. There must be something more to establish perfect peace in thy conscience; and that is the testimony of God concerning the body of sin. He has provided for thy perfect deliverance from it in Christ. Every thing needful for this purpose was finished by him upon the cross. He was thy surety. He suffered for thee. Thy sins were crucified with him, and nailed to his cross. They were put to death when he died: for he was thy covenant head, and thou, as a member of his body, wast legally represented by him, and art indeed dead to sin by his dying to sin once. The law has now no more right to condemn thee, a believer, than it has to condemn him. Justice is bound to deal with thee as it has with thy risen and ascended Saviour. If thou dost not thus see thy complete mortification in him, sin will reign in thee. No sin can be crucified, either in heart or life, unless it be first pardoned in conscience; because there will be want of faith to receive the strength of Jesus, by whom alone it can be crucified. If it be not mortified in its guilt, it cannot be subdued in its power. If the believer does not see his perfect deadness to sin in Jesus, he will open a wide door to unbelief; and if he be not persuaded of his completeness in Christ, he gives room for the attacks of self-righteous and legal tempers. If Christ be not all in all, self must still be looked upon as something great, and there will be food left for the pride of self-importance and self-sufficiency; so that he cannot grow unto the death of Christ in sensible experience, farther than he believes himself to be dead to sin in Christ. The more clearly and steadfastly he believes this, as the apostle did—

I AM CRUCIFIED WITH CHRIST—in proportion will he cleave to Christ, and receive from him greater power to crucify sin. This believing view of his absolute mortification in Christ is the true gospel method of mortifying sin in our persons.

Examine then, O my soul, the mistakes which thou hast made, and the temptations which thou art under, concerning this leading truth in thy walk. Pray to thy God for his wisdom to guide thee. Without it thou wilt be afraid, where no fear is. Thou wilt be inclined to think this doctrine rather encouraging to sin, because it seems to carnal reason to take off thy mind from watchfulness against it, and from praying for victory over it. But be assured this is a great error. If thou art not complete in Christ, thou never canst be complete. Seek for the death of sin where thou wilt, it is not to be found but in his death. Try to conquer it upon any other principle than faith in his death, the very attempt is sinful, and proves thee to be under the law. Unless thou art one with him in his death, there can be no pardon of sin, and consequently no victory over it. Oh, fear not then to lay the whole weight of thy salvation upon Jesus! Depend on him, as dying to sin for thee, and look at thyself dead to sin in him—as completely dead to it as he is. Read the testimony of the Holy Spirit. Study the infinite, the everlasting sufficiency of his death for thine absolute freedom from guilt and condemnation. Trust without wavering: be not afraid to view the everlasting perfection of thy deliverance in Jesus: and this will weaken the tyranny, and crucify the power of sin. This will, and nothing else can. Read the sixth of the Romans, and pray for the Spirit of revelation to open it to thee. There thou wilt discover the true way to mortify sin. It is by believing that thou art planted together with Christ in his death: from thence only thy pardon flows; from thence thy daily victory is received, and from thence thy eternal victory will be perfected. Fight on; soon thou shalt be what Christ now is. The member shall be perfectly like the head. Oh glorious prospect! Thou shalt be with him and like him—spotless and fair, as Jesus, righteous and holy, happy in body and soul. Thou shalt see him as he is, and, awakening after his likeness, thou shalt be satisfied with it. Take up thy cross for the joy here set before thee. Bear it in faith: it will be light and easy to thy pardoned conscience: yea the carrying of it in patience will bring forth many peaceable fruits of righteousness: Among the rest there is one, which in the sight of God is of great price, and which is daily improved by the inward cross; namely,

HUMILITY, which consists in the right knowledge of ourselves, not only of what we have been, but also of what we now are. The best and holiest man upon earth has a corrupt fallen nature: he has flesh still, which is always lusting against the spirit. While he is alive to God, he feels it. He is sensible of the inward conflict. Dead men indeed feel nothing. A dead corpse has no sense of the worms which are eating it up. He that has these lusts in him, and warring against his soul, and yet does not feel them, cannot be spiritually alive. A natural man has no sense of them, because they are in him as worms in a dead body: just so is it with the perfectionist. But so soon, and so long, as he lives to God, he will perceive them. If he be in happy communion with God, indwelling sin is present to interrupt the enjoyment. If he exercise any grace, this besetting sin tries to weaken its actings. If he set about any duty, it will hinder him from doing it so perfectly as God requires, and as he could wish. The abiding sense of these truths will keep down pride. The believer will see nothing of his own to trust in; no faith, or hope, or love; no faithfulness to grace; no holy obedience; all is stained and polluted. He is forced to cry out, of his best duties: Unclean, unclean! In this school the disciple learns to walk humbly with his God. The more he knows of himself, the more humble he becomes. And he grows in this heavenly grace, the more he is acquainted with the mercy of God in Jesus. This, learned by divine teaching, keeps the believer meek and lowly in his own eyes. Nothing softens and melts the soul into holy tenderness like the sense of God's mercy. A man who feels the plague of his own heart, is never truly humbled until he be pardoned. But when he is justified from all things in Christ, in him a partaker of all spiritual blessings in earth and heaven; when he sees all his salvation of grace, of free sovereign grace, flowing from the absolute favour of electing love, and bestowed upon him, as unworthy an object as ever did or can partake of it; then he becomes truly broken-hearted. These truths, taught of God, bring every high thought into subjection to Christ Jesus. The soul bows before him, lies low at his feet, prostrates itself before the throne of his grace, and desires to be kept willing to take all its blessings out of his hands, and to use them to his glory. This is gospel humility, the true abasement of spirit, with which a man, sensible that he is saved by mere mercy, loathes himself. And while the experience of indwelling sin humbles him down to the dust, it produces, through God's grace, the happiest effects; for it keeps him in his strong tower and sanctuary, in which alone he is Safe. It is ever reminding him of his need of the blood of sprinkling—ever showing him his want of a perfect righteousness—and ever preaching to him the necessity of his being kept by the power of God. And while he hearkens to these lessons, trusting to Jesus, he will stand fast and be established. The arm of the Lord God Almighty will hold him up, and he shall be safe. While he lives thus out of himself, the sense of indwelling sin will lead him to his true

Happiness, which is all in the fulness of the God-man, He will enjoy the more of this, the less he finds in himself. When he cannot draw comfort from any thing of his own, he will seek it more in God. When all the streams are dried up, he will get nearer to the fountain head, and live more upon it. This is the portion of the Lord's people, and the inheritance of all his saints. And in this view indwelling sin is made the means of promoting their

Holiness. They see their continual need of Christ. They can do nothing without him: but, believing their oneness with him, they desire to improve it in experience. Every thing they do keeps them sensible of their sins and wants, and shows them the necessity of living by the faith of the Son of God. This is true humility. The more they are humbled, the more they receive out of the fulness of Jesus: for he giveth more grace—more to produce nearer fellowship with him in his death, whereby sin will be more dead, and in his resurrection, whereby the soul will be more alive to God: so that the humblest believer is the nearest to God, and is the safest, happiest, and holiest of all the men upon earth; because he has most fellowship with God. He dwells in God, and God in him. Meditate, O my soul, upon this use of the cross. Is sin in thee? Dost thou feel it? and art thou fighting against it? And does not this humble thee? Art thou freely forgiven all trespasses, indwelling sin among the rest? Dost thou know that thou art a saved sinner—a brand plucked out of hell? And does not this humble thee? I see reason enough to be humbled: but I feel pride in me lusting against humility. O my precious Jesus! humble me under thy mighty hand. To thee I look for all my salvation. Lord, save me from pride. Thou hast made me willing to be taught of thee to be meek and lowly, and I come to thee praying that the disciple may be as his master. Oh let me drink deep into thy Spirit. In every day's warfare against my corruptions, enable me to renounce myself, that I may find thou art carrying both me and my cross. Keep me humbled at thy feet, that thou mayest exalt me in due time. I pray to thee, my precious Saviour, for this grace, to mine eternal humbling, and to thine eternal exaltation. In life and death, and for evermore, I hope to glory only in the Lord, and to triumph in the God of my salvation.

Thus the believer learns to walk humbly under the inward cross. He is brought to trust all in the Saviour's hand. Daily he discovers more of the ruins of the fall, which lead him to fresh discoveries of the perfect salvation in Jesus. If he attend to what is passing in his own breast, he finds his need of a Saviour every moment and for every thing, by which means he grows in grace, and in the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord. He learns to put no confidence in the flesh, but to rejoice only in his completeness in Jesus, from whom all his comforts and victories are received. Thus, while self is laid low, the Saviour is exalted, and his perfect work is more depended on. The believer by hope and love attains more delightful communion with his God. Indwelling sin is his cross; but he bears it, looking unto Jesus; from whom he receives strength to go on, yea, to run the race set before him. By faith he sees in Jesus the corruption of his nature condemned and dead in law: he beholds himself freed from this as well as from his other sins. Guilt is the most galling part of this cross; but when guilt is thus removed from the conscience, then the cross grows light. When taken up in faith, and carried in love to the almighty Saviour, then it does not stop the believer in his fellowship with Jesus or in his happy walk with him. Glory be to thee, my Lord! of this I have some experience. Yes, precious Jesus, I know the infinite value of that sacrifice which put away sin. I bless thee for that offering which perfects for ever. Interested in it, I would not distrust my completeness in thee. Through thy holy nature I expect to be renewed after thy likeness. The fountain for cleansing from the filth of sin stands open: in it I daily wash my spotted soul. In thy divine righteousness I see the law and justice of the Father infinitely honoured by justifying me, and dealing with me, as perfectly righteous. Complete in thee I am. In thy work finished upon earth I am perfect, and am represented as such by thee in heaven. I believe thou appearest there as my divine intercessor, bearing my name upon thy shoulders and upon thy breast with a glory beyond all the precious stones in the world, O my blessed Jesus! increase this faith. Lead me from faith to faith; that while I am travelling heavenwards, mine eye and my heart may be more simply fixed upon thee. Come, thou glorifier of the Saviour, and discover to me more of the sinfulness of sin and of my need of his salvation. Holy Spirit, teach me, in the deepest sense of indwelling sin, to trust wholly to the offering of the body of Jesus. Oh lead me to his cross, there to see all my sins nailed, crucified with him, dead in his death, buried in his grave: in this faith strengthen me mightily to resist and to conquer my corruptions. Enable me to experience the power of his cross, that I may feel sin weakened in the love and in the practice of it. Almighty Spirit! in my daily warfare I find no strength less than thine can make me conqueror: and therein thou hast caused me to put my trust. Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord; awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old! Art thou not it that cut the pride of nature to pieces, and wounded the old dragon? O my God, magnify thine arm in subduing every sin. Thou seest my naked heart, and its sighings are not hid from thee. My corruptions are indeed my cross; and they would have been a sore burden, too heavy for me to bear, if the curse had not been taken out of them. But still, pardoned as they are, yet in this tabernacle I do groan, being burdened. I believe the day is coming when I shall have perfect and eternal freedom from sin and sorrow. The first fruits of this only make me long the more for the blessed harvest. But I desire to wait in hope, bearing my cross, till thy will be done. O Lord, make me willing to resist; give me power to overcome indwelling sin till the day of redemption, and mortality be swallowed up of life. Hear me, my good God, and answer me for thy name's sake, to the glory of Father, Son, and Spirit, the three in one Jehovah, to whom my heart now bows in worship, and my soul hopes soon to join the song of never-ceasing praise. Amen and Amen.

CHAPTER XI.

The believer fights the good fight of faith, and goes forth conquering and to conquer.

When the believer has been disciplined under the cross, and has learned to bear it with patience, the Captain of his salvation has other exercises for him. He has chosen him to be a soldier, and he intends to teach him to endure hardness. His life in Christ is one continued battle, not only against flesh and blood, but also against principalities and powers of earth and hell. He cannot discover their stratagems, nor overcome their assaults, but by being strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. His warfare is therefore to be carried on entirely by faith. The principles before laid down must be brought into use. What the spirit of God had discovered to him of his salvation in Jesus is to be tried in every battle, and if it be maintained, it will be improved. If he hold fast the confidence of his faith, he will behave like a good soldier. If he always take up arms in absolute dependence on the divine General to give him courage, to order him how to attack his enemies, to bestow strength upon him daily to resist them, then victory will be certain: yea, he will be invincible, while he stands strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. He will meditate upon the principles, which he had been taught of God, and will find peace in his own conscience, and joy in his heart, by bringing them into daily experience. His believing views of the warfare to which he is called will be such as these—

I am, through sovereign grace, called to fight under the banner of Jesus. He has not left me to fight as uncertainly; but he has conquered all mine enemies for me, and he has undertaken to conquer them all in me. It is true, I am weak; but my Redeemer is strong: the Lord of hosts is his name. He has saved me from my sins, from the shame and pain of them, from the wicked one and the wicked world, from the curse of the law, and from the wrath of God. He has given me a divine righteousness for my justification, and in it I am accepted before the throne. He has put it upon me for ornament and defence—it is a garment of salvation, which cannot be lost upon earth, and which will shine with never-fading beauty in heaven. The Father is perfectly reconciled, and loves me with a love that passes knowledge. I believe it: God is on my side: I need not fear what any enemy can do unto me. He has taken me into his protection. By his all-wise counsel I am guided; by his almighty arm I am defended. My battles are the Lord's. Indeed my enemies are many, and they are too cunning and too mighty for me. But why do they now fight against me? Is it not because God is my friend? They hate me because he loves me. While I lived in friendship with them, and was at war with God, they were always trying to make me happy. But, ever since I fled to Jesus for refuge, and sought redemption in his blood, they have taken up arms against me: and they have raged more furiously since I was enabled to believe in him. But I have no reason to fear their opposition. With them is an arm of flesh; but with me is the Lord my God, to help me and to fight my battles. I may therefore go to my daily warfare in faith, regarding the commands, waiting for the fulfilling of the promises of my God, and relying upon the provision which he has made for my present and for mine eternal victory.

Are thy meditations, O my soul, like these upon the Christian warfare? Examine thyself. If thou art at peace with God, thou must expect war. It is unavoidable. If it be in thy heart to please him who hath chosen thee to be a soldier, then all the powers of wickedness will be in arms. Night and day, with never ceasing rage, they will pursue thee. Deep-laid plans will be formed, and fierce assaults will be made against thy true happiness. They will be attempting, so long as thou art in the world, by some cunning or force to draw thee from thy God. Thy life from henceforth is to be one continued battle. Thy victory depends every moment upon holding fast thy confidence in God; and therefore thou must bring the principles of the doctrine of Christ into exercise. Thou hast seen how necessary they are for every step of thy walk, and thou wilt find them equally necessary for every part of thy warfare. This is a leading truth—thine enemies are God's enemies. Once thou didst join with them, and wast on their side, fighting against God; but he has saved thee from the guilt of thy rebellion. In free love he chose thee in his Son, and in sovereign mercy gave him for thee. The Son rejoiced to do his Father's will for thy salvation: he did it in his life: he suffered it in his death. The ever-glorious work is finished. And it has been given thee on the behalf of Christ to believe. The Lord the Spirit has satisfied thy conscience, and has comforted thy heart with the knowledge of this perfect salvation. The Father is thy Father in Jesus—thine by his own free gift—thine by his own unchangeable purpose; and now thine by thy free choice. He has made thee willing, in the day of his power, to take him for thy God. He is perfectly reconciled unto thee in his Son: and should not this perfectly reconcile thee to him? His love to thee is wonderful in all its properties, in its rise and origin, and in its free and full communication of every covenant blessing. And does not the belief of this engage thy heart in love to God? Dost thou not love him for his love to thee? and is it not thy daily prayer that thy love may abound yet more and more? Has not the sense of this peace and love been improved in thy daily walk with him? Hast thou not found the truth, and enjoyed the comfort, of these graces in thine experience? Oh fear not then, since God is on thy side; fear not, O my soul, to go to war with any enemy who would rob thee of the peace of God in thy conscience, or of the love of God in thy heart. This is the design of all those who fight against thee. They want to shake thy confidence in God, and so to draw thee from him. They know they cannot succeed while thou standest strong in the Lord, trusting to his being thy reconciled God and loving Father. Oh keep this trust in him as the apple of thine eye; bind it continually to thy heart in love; and fight for it as for thy precious life. Be assured, no enemies can prevail against thee until they have first overcome thy faith; because, while thou makest God thy refuge and strength, his almighty arm will be thy defence. Be not afraid, says he; I am with thee, and I will keep thee by my power through faith unto salvation.

In this warfare it is the chief business of the believer to have respect to the orders given him. He is entirely to depend on the Captain of his salvation. What has he said, O my soul, to encourage thee to go to battle without fear? Mind his description—it is THE GOOD FIGHT OF FAITH, in which thou art engaged. By faith thou art to attack thy foes; by faith alone thou canst conquer them; and faith must have his COMMANDS; or else it can have no lawful warrant to fight, and no just ground to expect victory. Indeed if he had spoken nothing, there could have been no faith; for his word comes first—it is spoken—it is heard—and then faith comes by hearing. Look well, then, to his word. Study it carefully. If thou obey it aright, thou art absolutely safe in the hottest battle, and thy victory is as certain as if the crown were already upon thy head. These are his standing orders:—"Fear thou not; for I am with thee: be not afraid; for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee, yea, I will help thee, yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness. Behold, all they that were incensed against thee shall be ashamed and confounded: they shall be as nothing, and they that strive with thee shall perish. Thou shalt seek them, and shalt not find them, even them that contended with thee: they that war against thee shall be as nothing, and as a thing of nought; for the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee—fear not; I will help thee. Fear not thou worm Jacob, and ye men of Israel; I will help thee, saith the Lord and thy Redeemer, the holy One of Israel." Are these indeed the words of God? Does he command poor worms, weak and defenceless, to go to war without fear? Does he encourage them to look up to his arm, promising to be on their side? Yes; the Lord of hosts fights for them: all their enemies are his, and therefore they may safely trust, and not be afraid. O my soul, read carefully; read again and again; mark and inwardly digest every word of this divine command: and in obedience to it expect his help. Face thine enemies, whoever they be, with holy boldness; for God is with thee. He has undertaken to fight thy battles. Look at this scripture. Canst thou meditate on it, and yet be afraid? Of whom, or of what? Oh, vile unbelieving fear! Beg of God to save thee from it. Honour the Captain of thy salvation. Trust him. Doubt not but thou art as safe, obeying his orders, and expecting his help, as almighty power can make thee. Observe the courage of one of thy fellow soldiers. Observe his victory—"When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies be turned back: this I know; for God is on my side. In God will I praise his word; in the Lord will I praise his word: in God have I put my trust; I will not be afraid what man can do unto me." The enemies of David came to swallow him up, but he encouraged himself in the Lord his God. He attended to his orders. He considered the word which was spoken to him. He depended upon it, and had reason to praise God for his faithfulness; for God fulfilled it unto him. There was in it a PROMISE, as well as a command—Do this, and I will be with thee. The promise is always made good to them who keep the command in faith. The one is our divine warrant to fight; the other is our encouragement to fight in certain hopes of victory. Attend, O my soul, to the promise; and fear not the accomplishment of it—"In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be far from oppression, for thou shalt not fear; and from terror, for it shall not come near thee. Behold, they shall surely gather together, but not by me; whosoever shall gather together against thee, shall fall for thy sake. Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy. No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise in judgment against thee thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord; and their righteousness is of me saith the Lord." Thou art here forewarned of thine enemies: they shall gather against thee: but the Lord is not with them. He is thy defender and mighty deliverer, and he will bring all opposition to nought for thy sake. However numerous their hosts may be, yet they shall fall. Whatever weapons of war they may form, yet none of them shall prosper. This is the certain heritage of all believers. Their righteousness and their strength is of me, saith the Lord: I will fight their battles, and I will never leave them nor forsake them: I will make them daily conquerors, and behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised them: I will make them more than conquerors.

Is this, O my soul, the infallible word of promise? Has the Lord of Hosts undertaken to stand by his people? Has he engaged to lead them out to war by his wisdom, to defend them in battle by his power, and to give them eternal victory to the praise of his own grace? Oh! what motives are these to strengthen thy heart and thy hands! What hast thou reason to fear, since the Almighty is on thy side? The battle is his. If hosts of enemies oppose, yet following his orders, and trusting to his strength, thy victory is infallibly sure: for then thou wilt fight against them strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and thou wilt be invincible

IN THE WHOLE ARMOUR OF GOD. This armour is the provision which God has made for the safety of his soldiers. He puts it on them, and he keeps it on them. It is a whole armour; a complete defence from head to foot. In great mercy their God, who provided it, has revealed to them the use of every part. In the sixth of the Ephesians the apostle has described it at large. He supposes them to be acquainted with the Christian doctrines, and to have walked in the comfort of them; and he calls upon them to bring them into practice in their daily warfare. "It only remains, my brethren," says he, "that ye be strong in the Lord;" for no strength less than his can keep you, "and in the might of what he is able to do"—by faith relying upon his promise, and trusting to his power, "putting on the whole armour of God," that, being strengthened mightily by his Spirit in the inner man, ye may be preserved dependent upon the Lord, and enabled to engage in his strength, and to conquer to his glory. Unless you thus rely upon his word and arm, you will not be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; for we wrestle not only against flesh and blood, but also against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places; therefore, take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be enabled to stand in the evil day against the combined legions of earth and hell, and after ye have done all to stand conquerors in the field of battle, when your enemies are driven out of it. Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth—this is the first grace in use—

SAVING KNOWLEDGE; what the Holy Spirit teaches. He guides believers into all truth necessary for their salvation. As the military girdle went round the loins, and bound all the armour together, so the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, binds together all the graces. It is of the essence of every one of them: it is light in the understanding, to discover what they are, that they may be received into the heart in love, and that, in obeying the truth, their influence may operate upon the life and conversation. When a man is thus taught of God, then he sees his need of the breastplate of righteousness, and he puts it on; namely, the

IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS of the God-man. The breastplate was armour for the vital parts—so is the righteousness of Christ—it is a perfect protection from every stroke of every enemy. He that wears it upon his heart, believing in the life and death of Immanuel, is armour proof against all weapons. If the strength of his adversaries could be collected into one arm, which was to strike one mighty blow, his breastplate would ward it off: the armour of God could not be hurt. The soldier, with it on, cannot perish, but shall have everlasting life. Therefore, covered with this invincible breastplate, he may face the stoutest foes, and attack them without fear. He may march on undaunted, "having his feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace."

PEACE WITH GOD, through Jesus Christ, is another grace of the Spirit which mightily strengthens the inner man. Whoever sees the truth of the gospel, and believes it, will discover God to be at peace with him, perfectly reconciled to him in Jesus, and who, out of his fatherly love, will overrule all things for his good. In the sense of this he may go on with holy boldness, as the soldier did with his greaves on. When his feet and legs were armed with them, he was not afraid of thorns or briers, of rough roads or sharp spikes. In like manner the peace which the gospel brings carries the Christian soldier fearless through difficulties: he will march on conquering, if he keep on his greaves. If he maintain peace with God, through Jesus Christ, he will not be stopped by war, or trouble, or temptation. But he must remember, that to every piece of armour faith is essentially necessary—the girdle is good for nothing without the belief of the truth—the breastplate is no defence without faith in the righteousness of God our Saviour—the greaves are no more than if the feet were covered with a bit of thin gauze—unless faith be mixed with the gospel: "therefore TO ALL THESE take the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one." What excellent things are here spoken of FAITH, as a grace of the Holy Spirit! When they used to fight with bows and arrows, the soldier could hold up his shield and keep himself safe: so the Christian soldier, if the fiery darts of Satan fly thick about him, by faith will quench them all. He has much combustible within him; and one spark would set him in a flame if he had not his shield: but, armed with it, and opposing it to the arrows of the wicked one, he may lift up his head with joy; for he has the helmet of salvation upon it. The grace here meant is

HOPE, and it is fitly compared to a helmet, which was armour for the head, and a defence for all the senses which are seated in the head. It is called the helmet of SALVATION, because it ALWAYS SAVES. It never can be destroyed: none of the senses of the spiritual man can perish in this warfare: and therefore it is a hope that maketh not ashamed. Hope, with his helmet on, fears no blows. It can truly say, I am commanded to be strong and of good courage; not to be afraid or dismayed: for the Lord my God is with me, whithersoever I go. Trusting to this command, hope is in wars and fightings full of glory and immortality. The Lord's orders to march forward are the ground of hope: and this supplies him with a weapon which none of his enemies can withstand, even the sword of the Spirit, "which is the WORD OF GOD." The scripture is called a sword—(an offensive weapon—and it is the only one which the Christian soldier has—all the rest being for his defence) because it is mighty through the Spirit working by it to cut off all opposers.

Our Lord, in combat with the old serpent, defeated him with this sword: and the noble army of his followers, now crowned in glory, overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony: they held fast their confidence in the word, and with it, as with a two-edged sword, they slew the old dragon, and gained eternal victory over him. Fight against him, O my soul, with the same weapon. Keep the sword in thy hand. Thou wilt stand in need of it every moment against that subtle foe. The Word is the means of overcoming the devil, and it is mighty through God, when heard and read in faith, and inwardly digested by prayer. The best soldier in the Lord's army is best acquainted with the necessity of prayer: he not only believes what God says of his armour, but he also depends upon him for the daily experience of it; and therefore, when he has put his armour on, in the PRAYER OF FAITH he calls upon the Captain of his salvation for orders, courage, strength, victory, and every thing needful—"Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance." O my God, teach me thus to pray. I would depend on thee, and express my dependence without ceasing: for I am sensible that without thee I can do nothing. Although thou hast chosen me to be a soldier, yet I have neither counsel nor strength for war. My foolish heart loves ease: it would have the crown; but it would be excused striving lawfully for it. I find nothing in myself that disposes me to endure the hardship of the Christian warfare. My whole trust therefore is in thee, Jesus, my Lord and my God. Thou hast called me to the battle: thou must fit me for it, keep me in it, and make me conqueror. All is of thee. The whole armour of God, which I have received, the saving knowledge, the righteousness, and the peace, that precious faith and glorious hope, that sure word, wherein thou hast caused me to put my trust—these are the gifts of thy grace; and on thee, my Jesus, I entirely depend for the right use of them. Thou must still cover my head in the day of battle. Mine eyes are lifted up to thee; my hopes centre in thee, from whom alone cometh all my salvation. O Lord of Hosts, keep me in this simple dependence upon thy word and arm, that I may exercise thy graces in fighting thy battles; and if thou art pleased to give me daily victory, I may be willing to return thee all glory. O faithful promise-keeping God! stand by me, and enable me to hold out, till I finish my course with joy, and, my warfare being ended, I may bless thee for evermore for that peace which passeth all understanding. Oh, grant me this for thy mercies' sake! Amen.

If this be thy dependence, if thou art standing in the Lord's strength, and trusting entirely to his armour, then consider, O my soul, thy safety in every battle. If thou go to war, calling upon thy God to be with thee, and to give thee victory, then victory is certain. Thou canst not be conquered, if thou fight in faith, relying upon the orders of thy General, expecting his promised help, and waiting for it in prayer, trusting to the armour which he has put upon thee. Is this, then, thy defence? Dost thou pray always? Begin the good fight; carry it on; and end it with the prayer of faith? Blessed be his holy name, since this is in some measure thy case! Go on in his strength, and fear not to fight his battles who hath chosen thee to be a soldier. Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart. The more bold thou art in thy faith, the stronger shalt thou be in thy warfare; for whatever thou hast courage to do at his command thou shalt perform in his strength. And why should a doubt arise? Hast thou forgotten that the great decisive battle has been fought and won? Immanuel stood up, the great champion for his people. The almighty warrior entered the lists with their enemies, and he conquered all their hosts. He triumphed over Satan and the world, over sin and death; and he led captivity captive. Remember, he calls upon thee to share in his victory, by faith to partake with him of the spoils, and to keep the vanquished enemies daily under thy feet. He has made them his footstool; and he will make them thine. This is thy warfare. And what hast thou to fear in it? What hurt can a dead man do thee? If he has a gun charged in his hand, he cannot fire it. He is not able to stir a finger. No more able is any adversary to destroy thee. Whilst thou art trusting to the complete victory of Jesus, thou wilt daily share with him in it. And the more simple thy trust is in him, the greater conquest will he give thee, because he will then receive from thee greater glory. How should this consideration inspire thee with courage!--it is for his glory that thou shouldst conquer. Thy God commands thee to fight on his side, promises to assist thee, has provided invincible armour, and has in his own person engaged and defeated every enemy against whom thou art to fight; and therefore he requires thee, in obedience to his orders, depending on his promises and armour, to bring him glory by conquering in his strength. O my soul! hast thou not a zeal to promote the honour of thy Saviour? Is not his fame and renown very near thy heart? Dost thou not think it a privilege to be any ways instrumental in exalting his great name? Yes, Lord; thou hast made me willing to glorify thee. Thou art my lawful king, and I desire to honour thee by following thine orders, fighting thy battles, and relying entirely upon thy promises. I would not question thy faithfulness to them, nor fear any enemy against whom thou hast commanded me to fight. I would not doubt of thy strength to carry me through the battle, or to give me the promised victory. In this faith I conduct my warfare, and I would have all my success to bring fresh glory to thee. I know that the courage which I have in the field of battle is not from nature, but from grace. It arises from the belief that I am armed with the whole armour of God, and that the enemies against whom I fight are his as well as mine—his whom he conquered for me—and is now conquering in me—and all to his own praise. From hence, Lord, arises my sure and certain hope of victory. I ground it on thy word. I fight in faith. I trust to thy complete victory; and now I am sharing in it. My daily victories are only the fruit and effect of thine. O my almighty Jesus, give me grace to ascribe all the glory to thee. It is thy due. Make me willing to give it thee for the victories obtained for me, and in me. Oh, keep me by thine almighty power through faith, till I have fought the good fight and won the prize. Grant me this, blessed King of saints, to thine eternal honour and glory. Amen.

CHAPTER XII.

The believer marches on fighting the good fight of faith, and daily gains victory over the world.

The world signifies the visible frame of nature; not the earth only, but also the present constitution of the universe of animate and inanimate beings: all which were created good at first, but, through the sin of man and the just sentence of God, are now subject to vanity.

The world is become a great enemy to fallen man; because it is always presenting something to his senses, which is a temptation to sin. It keeps him from God by its flatteries, promising to make him happy in its enjoyments. It sets them before him. He looks, and loves. He gives his heart a willing sacrifice to the world, and suffers himself to be entirely influenced by its hopes and fears.

While man was innocent, every object raised in him some spiritual idea, and thereby led him to contemplate and adore the great Creator in his works: but, upon the fall, he lost this use of natural objects: they did not, as they struck upon the senses, excite correspondent ideas in the mind; because the man was alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in him. His understanding was in darkness: he could not see the things of the spirit of God; neither indeed could he know them for want of spiritual discernment. Being thus deprived of the image and likeness of God in knowledge, having no will but the will of the flesh, and his heart being at enmity with God, he sinks into communion with the creature. His very mind is carnal: his affections are earthly: his pursuits are after temporal things: his enjoyments are in the delights of sense. In this state he lives a mere animal life, without God in the world.

Indeed he has within him an immortal soul; but it is apostate. It is fallen from God, and has no more communion with him by nature than the devil has.

The law has condemned it to death—The soul that sinneth shall die: and it is already spiritually dead to God, being as incapable of quickening itself as a dead corpse is: therefore it cannot attain, of itself, any true knowledge of God, or have any real fellowship with the things of God. While fallen man is in this state, his earthly and sensual appetites take the lead; and all the light in his mind, and the desires of his heart, only dispose him to seek for their present gratification. Outward objects offer themselves to him: they make an impression upon his senses, and sometimes act upon them very forcibly, soliciting and enticing to the enjoyment of some fancied good; and so long as he continues an unregenerate man, those temptations prevail, and keep him from God. He does not see God in outward objects. He does not love God for them. He does not enjoy them to the glory of God. God is not in all his thoughts.

Man has been called a microcosm. He is so wonderfully made, that the whole creation comes under the observation of some of his senses. His eye, by means of light, can discover the form, the surface of all objects. The ear takes in all sounds. The nose perceives all vapours and smells. The palate tastes all sorts of fluids. All sorts of solids come under the sense of feeling, which is in every part of the body, for the benefit and preservation of the whole. Thus every object in the universe is fitted to act upon some of the senses, and was intended by the Creator to excite some spiritual idea. But this use was lost by the fall. The impression made by outward objects does not raise up the mind to God, and excite adoration and praise, but keeps the heart from him, and affords a continual temptation to live to the world, and to the things of it. Whatever is presented to the eye, to the ear, &c. can stir up and bring forth evil; and actually does, according to the scripture: for "the whole world (as fallen from God) lieth in wickedness," and is at enmity with him; and therefore believers are commanded —"Love ye not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him: for all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world." Mind, ALL that is in the world is the means of feeding some lust: for which reason the apostle calls it—"this present evil world" —evil because of sin, and because of its temptations to keep the heart in love with it, and to shut out the love of the Father.

How awfully solemn are these scriptures? What strict examination, O my soul, should they put thee upon! Search and try thyself by them; and see whether thou art saved from the love of the world. It is a blessed part of redemption; and it is one of the brightest jewels in the Redeemer's crown. How infinitely glorious is this character!—"Jesus Christ gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world." This deliverance is worthy of God. We had sinned by loving this present evil world, and he came to save us from our sins; it ruled over our hearts and lives, and kept us under its tyranny; and he came to deliver us from the love and from the power of it. Thrice happy are they for whom he thus gave himself. O my soul, read and study the everlasting honours of this great victory, and see whether thou art indeed a partaker of them. Jehovah was made flesh for his people, and, as their divine surety, came to conquer their enemies—the world among the rest. He was in their nature to enter into open war with it, and to overcome every temptation, by which it had drawn Adam or any of his descendants from God. Thus he was to conquer the world for them; and then by his Spirit he was to conquer it in them. He began the battle with his first breath, and every moment of his life he was victorious. The world has its snares for every age and state; but he fell into none of them: his hands were clean: his heart was pure. He never lifted up his soul to vanity. He was in his infancy the holy child Jesus: and he grew in wisdom and stature. When he was twelve years old, he was wiser than his teachers; for he sat in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions: and all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers. His delight was in the law of the Lord; and in his law did he meditate day and night. He saw things as they are there described in their true nature. The world could not impose upon him. He lived above its offers of good: and he feared not the worst of its threatened evils. When he began his ministry, he fought a pitched battle and became an eternal conqueror. The prince of this world was permitted to try every object by which the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, or the pride of life, had seduced mankind. They were presented to Christ in their richest dress. The beauty, the pleasure, the honour, and the riches of the world were set before him in all their glory. But they made no impression. They did not darken his understanding, nor influence his heart, nor provoke any sensual appetite. He rejected every pleasing offer: he withstood every flattering allurement. Thus he conquered the world; but not for himself. His victory over all its temptations was for his people. He accounted their enemies his. He fought their battles. He conquered, as a king for his subjects. And he gives them to share with him in his triumph, when they believe in him; for thus he encourages them—"These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace: in the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good courage; I HAVE OVERCOME THE WORLD." The world is your enemy. It had you in bondage, and you could not free yourselves; therefore I came in your nature, God manifest in the flesh, to conquer it for you: and I have obtained a perfect conquest. When I have proclaimed it to your consciences, and pardoned your idolatrous attachment to the world—when IN me ye have found peace—yet still the world will be your enemy. Because I have chosen you out of it, therefore it will hate you. My peace will occasion and increase your tribulation in it; but fear not. Remember, it is a vanquished foe. Attack it in my strength, as partakers of my victory. Fight against it, and treat it as under my feet and made my footstool. Whenever it tempts you, depend absolutely upon my conquest, and you will find my grace almighty to crucify the world to you, and you to it.

How animating are these words! With what courage should they inspire the Christian soldier! Although the world be his enemy, yet it cannot conquer him, and rob him of his crown. The main battle has been fought, the victory is gained, and the conqueror is already crowned in the name and person of all the redeemed. By faith he gives them their share in this victory, as it is written—"Whatsoever is born of God, overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world—even our faith." Every person who is born again by the Spirit, has a new nature, spiritual and heavenly, and has new senses to exercise about spiritual things. His renewed faculties are formed for heavenly things, as his bodily senses are for material. By faith he sees a better world than this, and surveys its beauties and glories. He has ears to hear the joyful sound of gospel grace, and to receive it. When that name, which is dear and precious above every name, is preached, it is to him as ointment poured forth; the sweet smelling savour refreshes his heart and exhilarates his spirits. Then he tastes that the Lord is gracious—foretastes his heavenly love, and as truly lays hold of and enjoys its spiritual blessings as he ever did of any thing material. He is created anew in Christ Jesus, not only that he may know these things, but may also partake of them—as truly now by faith, as he ever will by sense: and the more he knows, and the more he partakes of them, the more will he be delivered from this present evil world; "For this is the victory that overcometh the world—even our faith." By faith we see the victory of Christ, and rest upon it; and the more safely we put our trust and confidence in it, the more fellowship we shall have with him in his fruits—more wisdom to see the vanity of the world, as he saw it—more grace to deliver us from the love of it—and more strength to subdue its temptations. These are some of the happy effects of his conquests, which he left us to enjoy here, as pledges of our being one day what he now is. He is more than conqueror; so shall we be through him that loveth us. As our faith increases, we shall share more with him, and triumph more over the smiles and frowns of the world. Since this is the only way to conquer the world, art thou, O my soul, conquering it in this way? and hast thou faith in the victory of Jesus? Dost thou depend on him for the pardon of thy former love of the world, and for the crucifying the love of it in thy heart? Art thou relying upon his victorious grace to make thee a daily conqueror over all its temptations? Examine thy warfare, and see whether it be carried on according to the scripture rule, and with the promised success. Look at some of the Lord's champions. Survey the triumphs of Moses, and remember, the Lord's hand is not shortened—"By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward." How great was this faith! how glorious its victories! It was a divine grace, and exercised by a divine operation—mighty through God. By it Moses saw the reality of heavenly things: by it he tasted their sweetness, enjoyed their blessedness, and had a hope full of glory and immortality. The world made him its highest offers; but he rejected them. His eye was kept single, his heart chaste, towards his God. The honour of Pharaoh's alliance he despised. He preferred affliction with the people of God to the pleasures of sin. He embraced reproach when it came on him for following Christ; and he esteemed it beyond all the treasures of Egypt. He saw the vanity and emptiness of earthly enjoyments, and he trampled upon them, having respect to the recompense of reward. Thus he was crucified to the world. What an exalted character! There is no such hero in the records of profane history; but, thank God! there are great numbers in sacred, who followed the steps of his faith. Every soldier of Christ Jesus is called to war against the world; and every good soldier is a daily conqueror. The world is always present, and has its temptations ready to stop him; but he meets them strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, trusting to the whole armour of God. Then victory is certain. And in order that the Lord may have all the glory, he will keep him fighting and praying in this manner:—

This world is not my portion. My happiness does not consist in loving and enjoying the things of it. It is an evil world; it lieth in wickedness; Satan has his seat and throne in it; and it is condemned to fire. Thank God! mine eyes are opened to see a better world than this; and I am travelling to it. I believe it was the purpose and will of the Eternal Three to choose me to be an heir of the world to come. Glory be to the Father for his free choice, and for all the blessings of his love! Glory be to the coequal Son for his complete and everlastingly perfect salvation! Glory be to the Eternal Spirit to whom I am indebted for what I believe of the Son's salvation, and for what I have experienced of the Father's love. On thee, O God the Holy Ghost, I place my dependence for carrying on the work which thou hast begun. I would be guided by thy counsel every step of my walk, and strengthened by thee for every part of my warfare. Keep me in the right way; and make me conqueror over all the enemies who would stop me in it, or turn me out of it: especially, deliver me from this present evil world. While I am going through it to a better, preserve my heart from the love of it. O my God! give me a stranger's temper, and a pilgrim's frame. Let me live as a sojourner here below, that the good things I meet with on my journey may not tempt me to make this my rest, and the evil things I meet with may not lead me to fret and murmur, as if God was not my Father, and his heaven my home. O thou divine Teacher! show me daily the glory of my Saviour's victory over the world, that I may share with him in it; and enable me to go forth conquering and to conquer in his strength, and to his praise. Help me to look upon the world, and to treat it, as he did, that, feeling the emptiness of its offered happiness, I may with a single heart cleave to my Father in Jesus, and may be saved from the spirit of the world. Keep me waiting for my appointed time, sitting quite loose and free to the things about me—and let heavenly and eternal things be always present to my faith, in their reality and blessedness, that I may grow more alive to them, and more dead to every thing else. Preserve my heart, O my gracious God! that it may be simple with thee when I am in my worldly business. Enable me to cast all my cares and burdens on thee, believing thou carest for me. Oh, daily crucify the world to me, and me to it, that, when its offers stand in competition with thy love, I may have grace to reject them. In this holy war, carry me on glorifying him who hath called me to be a soldier Grant me this for Jesus' sake, Amen and Amen.

CHAPTER XIII.

The believer marches on resisting and overcoming the wiles and the assaults of the tempter.

SATAN is a continual adversary. He rebelled against the sovereign will of the Most High in heaven, and was cast out. As soon as man was formed, he began to tempt him to rebel against God, and he succeeded. Ever since the revelation was made of the divine purpose to redeem sinners, he has set himself up against it, and with impotent rage opposed it. He is always trying to hinder sinners from coming to the Saviour, and, when they are come to him, to hinder them from living by faith upon his fulness. On the side of Satan are principalities and powers, combined armies and united legions of apostate spirits,—formidable to man for their number—more so for their subtlety and cunning—they have stratagems and wiles, depths of skill to deceive—in which they are so successful that they have deceived the whole world. Their courage is desperate. They fear nothing; for they were mad enough to take up arms against the Almighty. No wonder, then, that they should be unwearied in their attacks against man. They are always upon the watch—ready, as one temptation fails, to present another. Their strength is very great—they are called principalities and powers—rulers and princes—yea, the god of this world; because they work as they please in the children of disobedience, whom they keep so fast bound in the chains of sin, that no human arm can break them asunder. And it is the only joy they know—the joy of hell—to rivet the chains of sin upon these poor captives, till they bind them in everlasting chains of darkness.

These, O my soul, are thine enemies. They had drawn thee into their rebellion, and they are still trying to draw thee into their torments. They have free access to thy fallen nature. They know how to make use of the objects in the world to work upon thy senses, and to stir up evil thoughts. They have fiery darts always at hand to throw at thy faith, and rest not, night and day, in attacking thy peace and happiness in Jesus.

Bless the Lord, O my soul! and all that is within me, bless his holy name, for undertaking to save thee from those enemies. The love of the Father gave his Son to be the woman's seed—Jehovah incarnate—for his people. In their nature he was to bruise the head of the serpent: his cunning, his poison, and all his power to hurt, lie in his head: when this is bruised, he is defeated; the battle to be fought was foretold, and the victory to be won was promised to Adam: and by faith in it he and all the redeemed in the Old Testament conquered Satan. In the fulness of time God was manifest in the flesh: he came to destroy the works of the devil. Sin is his great work: by it he drew man from God, and by it he keeps man from God. Immanuel begun the destruction of the works of the devil by taking human nature. His manhood was perfectly holy—it had not, it could not have, any sin; because God was in Christ.

There was every thing in his holy life which the law could require. He obeyed all its precepts with uninterrupted conformity, and being coequal and coeternal with the Father, his obedience was therefore divine, absolutely complete, and infinitely sufficient to justify for ever. He was tempted indeed, but he overcame every temptation. He defeated Satan in all his attempts, insomuch that when he was entering upon the last scene of his life, he could declare—"The prince of this world cometh, AND HATH NOTHING IN ME." He did come, and the great pitched battle was fought, which was to decide for ever, whether the seed of the woman or the serpent, should be crowned conqueror. The battle began in the garden of Gethsemane, and was finished upon Mount Calvary. Every stratagem of infernal policy was then tried; every assault of devilish malice was exerted against the Captain of our salvation; but he conquered them all, as it was foretold—"Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under thy feet." He trod upon the serpent's head, and crushed it, but at the same time the serpent bit his heel.

The heel is the lowest part, his body—this fell in the conflict, but he completed his victory by the loss of his life. The apostle speaks of the cross, upon which he bled and died, as the great scene of this engagement, and on which he vanquished and triumphed for ever over the powers of hell: having spoiled principalities and powers, and taken away all their armour wherein they trusted, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them upon the cross, leading them as you would captives in chains; rebels still, but unable to rob the Lord Christ of the glory of any part of his conquest. Thus through death he conquered death, and him that had the power of death, that is the devil. O blessed and Almighty Jesus! eternal thanks are due to thee for this most glorious victory. Satan is now a vanquished foe. He is under thy feet, thou highly-exalted head of the redeemed. Thou hast for them, and in their stead, overcome all his wiles and assaults. He may tempt, but he cannot conquer them. He has no right to accuse them—thou hast made an end of sin. He has no power to torment them—thou hast brought in everlasting righteousness. He cannot pluck them out of thy hands—they are dear to thee, and kept as the apple of thine eye. Glory be to thee! thou wilt soon bring them out of the reach of his temptations, and thou wilt be to them an eternal and infinitely perfect Saviour.

In this faith, O my soul, thou art called upon to take up arms against the old serpent. Thou art to fight against him under the banner of JESUS—a name terrible to the devil and his angels. Trusting to the victory of Jesus for thee, and to the strength of Jesus working in thee, thou art daily to bring him honour and renown. How safe, how blessed is such a warfare! Thou hast the wisdom of thy God and Saviour to discover to thee the wiles of Satan. Trust to it, O my soul. Leave thyself simply to his direction; and although Satan be subtle and cunning—although he has depths of policy, and plans out of number, yet thou shalt not be ignorant of his devices. Thy all-knowing Saviour will detect his plots, and turn the counsel of that Ahitophel into folly. And if he attack thee as a roaring lion, yet fear him not. Thy Redeemer is strong. He has bruised the serpent's head; resist him in faith, and thou shalt bruise it also. Lean on the arm of thy Jesus; depend on his promised strength; follow his orders, and thou shalt tread Satan under thy feet daily.

But, above all, remember that thou canst only conquer him by faith—by faith in the victory of Jesus, built upon thy faith in the word of Jesus: for thus the scripture testifies of the conquerors now round the throne, "that they overcame the devil by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony"—they overcame him by depending upon the atoning blood, and by trusting to what the word says of its all-sufficiency to save; and they found by experience the promised victory. To the same effect the apostle Peter stirs up believers to a sobriety in the use of all creature comforts, and to a continual watchfulness against their enemies, in order that they might daily conquer—"Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour; whom resist STEADFAST IN THE FAITH." This brings victory. The believer resists the devil, and stands against him steadfastly in the power of Christ This power is almighty, and therefore faith, relying upon it, infallibly secures victory. The devil may throw his fiery darts thick and fast, but the shield of faith is proof against them. It is able, through God, to quench them; so that the fire of temptation shall not inflame the soul. How precious are these scriptures! How encouraging to the Christian soldier! they promise him every thing needful for the battle, and for victory. Why, then, shouldst thou doubt, O my soul, of the promised blessings? Take courage; fight under the banner of Jesus; keep close to his colours; follow strictly his orders; and he will keep Satan under thy feet to-day, and thou shalt be more than conqueror over him for ever.

Considering thy war with Satan in this light, what is there in it, O my soul, to stop thee in thy way to heaven? Thou art called upon to fight against him; but then it is in the Lord's strength, and as a partaker of his conquest. He made all thine enemies his. He fought thy battles. His triumph is thine. Thou mayst therefore sing of victory before every battle. Thou dost not fight to gain the pardon of thy sins or to make thyself righteous, but to oppose thine adversary, who would draw thee into sin, and, if he could, would rob thee of thy righteousness. He hates thee because Christ loves thee. But his hatred is in vain. Thy Saviour has conquered him for thee, and by faith will conquer him in thee: for thou art kept by his almighty power. Trusting to this, go forth strong in the Lord. While thou art living in communion with him, thy warfare will be successful. If thou attend to his word, and follow his orders, he will encourage thy heart and strengthen thy hands with such promises as these:—

I have chosen thee to be a soldier; and I send thee out to fight against all the enemies of thy peace. But thou dost not go to this warfare at thine own charges, nor carry it on doubtful of victory. I have provided every thing needful for maintaining the battle, and for bringing thee off conqueror. Thou shalt find much profit in this holy war. It will be the means of keeping up constant fellowship with me. Thou shalt see thy need of coming to me for courage, for orders, for strength; and by faith thou wilt receive sensible experience of my being present with thee, and on thy side. Only trust me, and thou shalt find me faithful to my promise of help and victory. Go forth, then, to thy daily warfare, and boldly face Satan. Fear him not in the least; for that would betray a doubt of my having him under my feet, or of my putting him under thine. Give not place to him; no, not for a moment: but resist him, and continue to resist him, steadfast in faith and prayer—trusting to my promise and depending on mine arm.—Be sober; be vigilant. Thus oppose the devil, and thou wilt certainly conquer him. And having conquered, fight on. In the fight, look to me for victory; having obtained it, expect a fresh battle, and look still to me for victory: and thus go on conquering and to conquer. Thy crown is in my keeping. As sure as I have it on my head, it shall be on thine. Thou shalt soon sit down with me on my throne, a crowned conqueror for evermore.

Glory be to thee, my precious Jesus, for these faithful promises, in which thou hast caused me to put my trust! and now, Lord, let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant be established, and do as thou hast said. Thou hast put it into my heart to desire to be a good soldier, and to fight thy battles against all the enemies of thy crown and dignity. O thou glorious Captain of my salvation! arm me for my daily warfare with Satan. He is too cunning for me: O my God! teach me his devices. He is too mighty for me; but the seed of the woman hath bruised his head. Yes, almighty Jesus, thou hast destroyed the devil and his works. I believe in thy victory. Oh let me partake of its fruits, and daily bring thee honour and renown by my victories. Make me strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, that I may not fear Satan. Send me out against him armed with thine invincible armour. Strengthen me, O my God, that I faint not through the length or sharpness of the battle, but enable me to persevere till thou discharge me from the war. Thus in a constant dependence upon thee, would I fight the good fight of faith, keeping up communion with thee in every battle, and growing more acquainted with my wants, and more thankful for every supply. O my loving Jesus! increase my fellowship with thee. I desire to war a good warfare; and every thing needful for it is from thee. From thy fulness I expect it; and when I receive it, I would use it to thy glory. Hear, Lord, and answer me for thy mercies' sake, Amen and Amen.

CHAPTER XIV.

The believer, kept by the power of God, perseveres in his holy walk and victorious warfare.

After the believer has made a great progress in his walk, and has been very successful in his warfare, yet he is not out of the reach of any temptation. He is still liable to be stopped in the way of duty. His enemies may cheat him by some stratagem, or gain some advantage over him by open force. While he is attending to these things, as they come before him in his daily experience, a thought will often arise—

I am afraid my profession will at last come to nothing, and I shall be a castaway. I feel so much corruption working in my duties, and my heart is so ready to revolt and to turn from the Lord in every battle, that I cannot help being uneasy about my final state. How can I? It is not in me to hold out and persevere against so much opposition from within and without? What signifies my resolution to walk forward, or to fight for an uncertain crown? I think I gain no ground. Mine own carnal will plagues me, and I love ease and quiet as much as ever. My corruptions seem as many, and mine enemies as strong, as they were. One day I fear I shall perish by their hands. My heart faints at the thought. My courage fails me. Oh! wretched man that I am! where—to whom—shall I look for strength to enable me to hold out unto the end?

No believer is absolutely free from such an attack; and there are seasons very favourable to it. If his mind be in heaviness through manifold temptations, and be reasoning legally upon them; if he be under the hidings of the Lord's countenance, or in a time of desertion; if he be fallen into any great sin, perhaps his old besetting sin; if the guilt of it be upon his conscience, and the indignation of God be heavy upon him; then such thoughts find easy admittance; and, if they be indulged, they greatly distress the believer; for they directly assault his faith, and strike at the very being of his hope. As these graces are weakened, he moves slowly; and if unbelief prevail, there is a stop put to his progress in the heavenly road.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel! who has made ample provision for victory over this temptation. The principles before insisted on are now to be brought into practice. Here is a fresh occasion to try their power and influence, and to make it appear, that in these distressing circumstances the Father has given his children good ground to rely upon his unchangeable love. He has revealed to them the immutability of his counsel and of his oath, that when they have fled to Jesus for refuge, they may comfort their hearts and say:—I have been afraid of falling away; but it is without reason; for I have still immutable things to trust in:—although, to my sense and feeling, every thing seems to make against me, yet God has promised not to leave me nor forsake me. Oh that I may honour his promise, and, without doubting, rely upon his faithful arm to make it good.

Consider, then, O my soul, the principles of the doctrine of Christ. Review them carefully. Thou seest what influence they have upon every step of thy walk, and how mighty they are through God to carry thee through all thy difficulties. Oh study then the perfect freeness and the absolute sufficiency of the salvation of Jesus. Read and mark the bonds and securities which a faithful God has given thee to trust in, and not to be afraid. The time to honour them most is to believe them when thou hast the least sensible evidence; for that is the strongest faith. If thou canst believe upon his bare word, and it is a very good warrant, thy feet shall stand firm upon the rock, and thy goings shall be well ordered: and that thou mayst believe this in the hardest trials, God informs thee that thy continuance in grace does not depend on thyself. "Thou standest by faith;" and faith should direct thee to what God has undertaken and has promised to do for thee. He would have thee to place the confidence of thy heart upon his tried word, which is a never failing foundation; and if thou wast to build all thy hopes of persevering upon it, it would quiet thy fears, and comfort thy heart. Thou wouldst then see that God has not left thee to thyself to stand or fall, but has engaged never to leave thee nor forsake thee. He has declared, he will not turn away from thee to do thee good, and he will put his fear into thy heart, and thou shalt not turn away from him. View thy case in this comfortable light, and while thou art considering the safety of thy persevering, as revealed in scripture for the ground of thy faith, may every promise lead thee to trust more in God, and to trust less to thyself, and then the snare which was laid for thee will be broken, and thou wilt be delivered.

But take heed of carrying thine opinions to scripture, and of forcing it to speak for them. Beware of that common mistake: and beware of human systems. Pay no regard to men or names. Simply attend to the promises of God concerning thy persevering. Thy present trial has convinced thee that thou canst not depend on thy own faithfulness: this therefore is the time to learn practically the faithfulness of God, and to improve thy faith in it from such scripture arguments as these:—

First—the nature of the divine covenant; which is not only the unchangeable will of the Eternal Three, but is also their agreement, confirmed by oath, concerning the heirs of promise.

The Father loved them as his children, freely, with an everlasting love: he chose them, and gave them to his Son: he engaged to keep them by his power through faith unto salvation.

The Son accepted them, and wrote all their names in his book (not one of them therefore can be lost): he undertook to be made man, and to live and die for them; to rise from the dead, to ascend, and to intercede for them; and he sitteth as king mediator upon the throne till every one of them be brought to glory. The Holy Spirit covenanted to carry into execution the purposes of the Father's love, and to apply the blessings of the Son's salvation. He undertook to quicken the heirs of promise, to call them effectually, to guide, to strengthen, to sanctify, and to comfort them; yea he is not to leave them till the number of the elect be perfected: therefore HE ABIDES WITH THEM FOR EVER.

In this covenant the Eternal Three have undertaken for every heir of promise —to do all for him, and all in him—for the means, and for the end—so that not one of them can perish: for faithfulness to the covenant is one of the highest honours of the Godhead: "I am Jehovah your Alehim, which keepeth covenant: I will ever be mindful of my covenant—My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my mouth." What strong consolation is there in these words! Study them, O my soul, that by them thy faith may be established, and they may do thee good, like a medicine.

Thou art afraid of falling away: but the blessed Trinity have undertaken to hold thee up; and their covenant engagements are to be the ground of thy believing that they will fulfil what they have promised. Observe and adore the goodness of God: see how he meets thy doubts and answers thine objections: "An oath for confirmation is, among men, an end of all strife: wherein God, willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge" to Jesus. Thy faith should run parallel with this promise, and should safely trust as far as it warrants thee: now it gives thee sufficient reason to conclude that thy state before God is immutable, and that he has determined thou shalt not fall away and perish: for observe,

Secondly, his design in the covenant. He knew thy frame, thine infirmities, and thy temptations, and therefore he provided the covenant, and promised the blessings of it upon oath, for thy sake—to end ALL strife in thy conscience—and to give thee strong consolation. This was his mind and will. He revealed it for thee, to settle thy heart in believing, and to administer to thee great comfort. Weigh attentively each of these particulars, and then say what more could have been done to satisfy thee of thine immutable persevering.

But thou thinkest, "Such trials as thine are uncommon, and perhaps not provided for in the covenant, and therefore it can be no disparagement to the divine faithfulness if thou shouldest fall away." How can this be since the everlasting covenant is ORDERED IN ALL THINGS, and on the part of God is absolutely SURE?—nothing that concerns thee is left out of it—not a single hair of thy head—thy trials are all appointed and ordered, and the end also which they are to answer.

Perhaps, from the clear evidence of the divine record, thou art convinced of the covenant of God to save the heirs of promise, and of his engaging to keep them that they shall never perish; but thou art afraid thou art not in the covenant, nor an heir of promise. From whence arise thy fears? From scripture? No. All scripture is on thy side. Hast thou not fled, as a poor sinner, to Jesus for refuge? Hast thou not acknowledged his divine nature, and his all-sufficient work? And though thou art now tempted to doubt, yet some faith is still fighting against unbelief? These are covenant blessings. Oh look up then to Jesus! —why not thy Jesus? But, however, look to him—keep looking on—and he will give thee reason to be ashamed of thy doubts and fears.

But the Lord hides himself from me, and therefore I fear I am not in his favour. This objection is answered in the charter of grace—I WILL NOT TURN AWAY FROM DOING THEE GOOD. He has hid his face, and thou art troubled: this trouble is for good. It should put thee upon inquiring into the reason of God's hiding himself. It should humble thee, and should exercise thy faith upon such a scripture as this—"For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him: I hid me, and was wroth, and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart: I have seen his ways and will heal him: I will lead him also, and will restore comforts to him and to his mourners." Although he hid himself, yet he had love to his people—although he smote them, yet it was a fatherly correction. But,

Thou fearest, God not only hides his face, but has also quite forsaken thee. He may, as to thy sense and feeling, but not as to his own purpose, which changeth not. Hear how he speaks to thee, and silences thy doubts—"For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee: in a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." How gracious is thy God! What infinite mercy is it, that he should give thee such promises, so suited to the trials of thy faith, to preserve thee under them, and to bring thee out of them! Read carefully, over and over again, these promises; and may every reading of them disperse the cloud of unbelief until thy soul be enlivened with the light of the Lord's loving countenance.

But perhaps thou art in a worse case, as to thine own apprehension: "thou thinkest God is incensed against me, and justly—he has cast me off, and I can expect no more favour at his hand: once, indeed, I thought he loved me; but I have fallen into a great sin—an old, besetting sin: my conscience accuses me of committing it against light and conviction: it is a foul black spot, such as is not to be found upon the children of God."

Thou art fallen: and wilt thou lie there, and not be raised up again? Thou art under guilt: and wilt thou nurse it, and add sin to sin? Aggravate the sinfulness of thy fall as much as thou wilt, yet thou canst not be truly humbled for it, but by returning to God, and by trusting in the plenteous redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Then thy heart will be softened and melted into love; for grace will have its due honour, and thou wilt see what the scripture says of thy case in its divine truth and majesty. Thou wilt feel thyself exactly what the word of God says of thee—a fallen sinful creature—in thee (that is in thy flesh) dwelleth no good thing—so that there is not any sin, but thou art capable of falling into it through the strength of temptation. So long as thou art in the body, the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; in this conflict thou mayst fall; but the covenant secures thee from perishing. Abraham, the father of the faithful, fell: the friend of God fell into the same sin again and again. Moses fell: so did David. Peter, forewarned, fell: so did all the apostles. Yet they were believers, and they did recover themselves out of the snare of the devil: for whatever sin thou art fallen into may be pardoned, as theirs was. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin"—there is in it an infinite virtue to wash away every spot and stain: it is a public fountain—it stands open for daily use, that believers may wash and be clean—it is always, at every given moment, effectual—it CLEANSETH, in the present tense, now—to-day, while it is called to-day: for there is nothing new to be suffered on the part of Christ, in order to take away sin. He put it away by the sacrifice of himself: the Father accepted it; and thus proclaims the free forgiveness of all the trespasses for which the atonement was made—"I will be merciful to their unrighteousness; and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Why dost thou reject the comfort of this promise? It is suited to thy present distress, and it is the remedy for it. Thou art fallen into unrighteousness—God says I will be merciful to it. Thou art fallen into sins and iniquities: he says, I will remember them no more. Thou mayst remember thy fall; but let it be in order to rise from it by faith. It should teach thee thy need of the blood of the Lamb. It should bring thee to sprinkle it afresh upon thy conscience, and to live safe and happy under the protection of it. Thus apply it to thy fall, and thou wilt repent aright; thou wilt be truly humbled and made more watchful. Thou wilt live more by faith in thy covenant God, wilt glorify more the infinitely perfect salvation of Jesus, and wilt be more dependent upon the grace and keeping of the eternal Spirit.

Consider then, O my soul, the rich abounding, superabounding grace of thy God in making such a provision for raising thee up, when fallen into sin. He intended the promises in the covenant should be the means of thy recovery, as they give thee good ground still to trust in a covenant God, and in his immutable counsel and oath. Oh lie not then in guilt. Rest not in unbelief. Give not place to the devil. The Lord has put words into thy mouth: may he help thee in the faith of thy heart to take them up and say—"Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy! when I fall, I shall arise; when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me: I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him, until he plead my cause, and execute judgment for me: he will bring me forth to the light, and I shall behold his righteousness." If the Lord open to thee the rich treasury of his grace in this scripture, and enable thee to depend on the ample security here given for raising thee from thy fall, then consider, in the Third place, the express promises made in the covenant—that the believer shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life. These promises are not conditional, made to the believer upon certain terms, as if upon doing his part God would do his also; for he does not stand by his own will, or strength, or faithfulness—he does not hold out to the end by his own diligence and watchfulness in means—or receive the crown of glory as the merited reward of any works of righteousness done by him. The promises are all of free grace, not dependent on man's will, but on God's: not yea and nay, but of absolutely certain fulfilment. They were all made in the covenant to Christ the head, and are already made good to Christ, as the head, for the use of his members—"For ALL the promises of God are in him, yea, and in him, Amen." He was given for the covenant of his people, and, as such, he undertook to do all their works for them, and in them; and therefore all the promised blessings of the covenant are laid up in his fulness—"in him they are yea"—and laid up, as the head has the fulness of the senses, for the use of his members—"in him they are, Amen." He communicates the promised blessings freely, not conditionally; by believing, and not for working; "Therefore," says the apostle, speaking of Christ's righteousness, "it is of faith, that it might be by grace, to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed."

In this sovereign manner and style runs the covenant, and every promise in it—I WILL BE THEIR GOD, of mine own mere motion and grace, and according to the good pleasure of mine own will—AND THEY SHALL BE MY PEOPLE—my will shall make them willing in the day of my power; for I will work in them both to will and to do: yea, I will be a Father unto them, and they shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. The word FATHER relates to his children, and expresses the unchangeable love of his heart towards them: it is a dear covenant name, and denotes the inseparable connexion between him and his children. Whenever they hear it, it should always excite in them an idea of his everlasting affection. He loves his family as a Father, and loves every one of them with the same almighty love. He cannot change. He cannot cease to be a Father, and they cannot cease to be his children. His name is a security to them, that they cannot perish; for if one of them could, they all might. And then his covenant purpose, to bring many sons unto glory, would be defeated—his relation to them as their Father would be broken—he would be a Father without children—he would deny them the promised blessings—he would forget to be gracious to them—his will concerning them would change, or would be overruled by some opposite will—and his great plan in the covenant would come to nothing. But these things cannot possibly be. He is the Father of his children, and he has engaged by promise and oath, to love, to bless, and to keep them for ever. Out of perfect love he gave them to his Son, who undertook to be their Saviour: he came, and was made man, Jehovah incarnate, to live and die for them. He was so delighted with them (for he has all their names written in his book) and with the work, that he was straitened till it was accomplished. Blessings on him for ever! it is finished: the royal Saviour is upon the throne, almighty to save his dear redeemed. He would lose his name, which is above every name—the honours of his salvation would fade away upon his head, and the glories of his offices would come to nothing—if one whom Jesus lived and died to save should perish. But it is not possible. Whom he loves, he loves unto the end. "I give unto them," says he, "eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." They are his seed—and it was covenanted that he should see his seed. They are the travail of his soul—and he shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied. How can he be satisfied if any one of them should be lost? He prayed—"Holy Father, keep, through thine own name, those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are one." And the Father always heard him. He prayed that they might be with him where he is, to see his glory: and the Holy Spirit covenanted to bring them to it—he undertook, as his name Spirit imports, to breathe life unto them, to call, to convert them, to keep them, and to give them every thing needful for their spiritual life. How can they fail of coming to glory, being thus kept for it by the power of God? The Holy Spirit would lose his name Spirit or breath of life, and his office, which is to abide with and to dwell for ever in the elect people of God, if any one of them should die from God, and perish. Thus there is full security given by the names and offices of the Trinity, that believers shall be kept from falling away. The Father cannot be without his children. The glory of Jesus would fade away if one of his redeemed was plucked out of his hand. The divine honours of the Spirit of life would be eclipsed if he was to forsake his charge and to suffer any of the redeemed to fall into hell. But these things cannot be. The will of the Father, Son, and Spirit, is the same concerning the salvation of the elect, which is as secure as covenant-bonds and oaths can make it.

Art thou then, O my soul, established in this great truth? Dost thou yield to the power of the evidence which the blessed Trinity have vouchsafed to give thee? Meditate carefully upon it for the growth of thy faith. Search the Scriptures, and observe how clearly God declares his fixed purpose to keep his people, and to hold them up unto the end. The great preacher of the gospel, in the Old Testament church, speaks thus of the unchangeable will of a covenant God—"The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." A great preacher in the New Testament church, has confirmed the same precious truth. He is treating of the golden chain of salvation, and showing how inseparable every link of it is; and in this prospect he triumphs—"Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us: who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loveth us." By the mouth of these two infallible witnesses the truth is established. They depose that the covenant is immutable, and that nothing can separate believers from the love wherewith God loves them in his Son. Oh, most comfortable doctrine! How encouraging is it, in any undertaking, to set about it with certain hope of success! How animating in our Christian walk, how reviving in the dark and difficult paths of it, to have God's promise that he will keep us and bring us to a happy end! How pleasing is it to go on by faith in our warfare, casting all our care upon him, who careth for us! How delightful is it to trust his promise, and daily to find it made good!—"Ye are kept by the power of God through faith unto eternal salvation." Here, O my soul, thou art to seek for strong consolation amidst the trials and difficulties of thy walk. Thou art afraid of falling: God has engaged to hold thee up. Thou hast been tempted to think thou shouldst fall quite away and come to nothing. But God says, thou art PRESERVED in Christ Jesus: his covenant and oath are made to confirm the faith of thy persevering. Thou standest by faith; and thy faith should lead thee to rest safely on what God says about thy standing: and for thy faith itself, its continuing, its increasing, thou hast his infallible faithfulness to depend upon. Thou art weak, but he keeps thee by his power. Thine enemies are strong, but none of them shall pluck thee out of his hand. Thou art willing to join them and to depart from the living God; but he has promised to put his fear into thy heart, and thou shalt not depart from him. He meets with thy doubts, and answers all thine objections in a word; for he hath said, I WILL NEVER LEAVE THEE NOR FORSAKE THEE.

Be of good courage then, O my soul, and go forward, strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and he will bring thee safe to the end of thy journey. He has promised it. Put thyself into his hands, and give him the glory of keeping thee. He will hold up thy goings in his paths, that thy footsteps slip not. The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil. The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore. How, then, canst thou miscarry, safe under his guidance and keeping? Commit thy ways unto the Lord. Do it simply. Look up by faith to his promise, and then lean on his arm. Thus going on, thou mayst rejoice at every step in the Lord thy God. He has left thee a sweet hymn upon the subject; with which the weary travellers to Sion have often refreshed their spirits. Take it up, and sing it after them. Study it. Mix faith with it: and with perfect reliance on what God, who cannot lie, has promised in it to do for thee, sing and make melody with it in thy heart unto the Lord:—

"In that day sing ye unto her, A vineyard of red wine: I the Lord do keep it: I will water it every moment: Lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day: Fury is not in me: Who would set the briers and thorns against me in battle? I would go through them; I would burn them together. Or will he take hold of my strength, that he may make peace with me, then he shall make peace with me. He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud, and shall fill the face of the world with fruit."

O my good God and faithful keeper! I do believe these precious promises: help mine unbelief; forgive my distrusting thy faithfulness; and enable me steadfastly to rely upon it for the future. What return can I make unto thee for grafting me into the true vine! O Lord! this love surpasseth knowledge. I was fit for nothing but the fire; and thou hast brought me into the vineyard of red wine, and hast enabled me to trust in that blood of the Lamb, which cheereth God and man. On this my soul lives and is refreshed. And being through grace in him, and living upon him, I bless thee, holy Father, for thy faithful promise to keep me unto the end. I am still an easy prey to all those who seek the hurt of my soul; but thou hast given me thy word that, lest any hurt me, thou wilt keep me night and day. I confess, gracious God, that I have dishonoured thee by doubting of thy love, and by questioning its unchangeableness; but now I believe that fury is not in thee to any one branch of the true vine. There is love, and nothing but love, in all thy dealings with Christ, and with his. Forgive my guilty fears and suspicions of thy forsaking me, arising from my weakness, and from the strength of mine enemies: I now see that thou canst as easily consume them as fire can briers and thorns. Lord, increase my faith in thy promised strength, that I may lay hold of it for peace, and may keep fast hold of it for maintaining peace with thee always and by all means. Oh grant me this, my good God, that my faith may work more by love. Let me take deeper root in Jesus, and grow up more into him, blossoming and budding, and flourishing in his vineyard. I depend upon thee to keep me a branch in him, and to make me a fruitful branch, bringing forth plentifully the fruits of righteousness, which are by Christ Jesus, to the glory and praise of God. I believe the work is thine—thou hast begun it—and thou wilt carry it on unto the day of the Lord Jesus. Thou art faithful to thy word and work. In dependence upon thy faithfulness I hope to persevere. Let it be done unto me according to thy promises, wherein thou hast caused me to put my trust. Hear, Lord, and answer for thy mercies' sake in Jesus, to whom with thee and the eternal Spirit, three persons in one Godhead, be equal glory and praise for ever and ever. Amen.

CHAPTER XV.

The believer finishes his course, and enters into rest.

The believer is now happily arrived at the verge of life. Goodness and mercy have followed him all his days, and will not lose their glory by forsaking him at the close of them. It is appointed unto all men once to die; and his fixed time is at hand. The body is returning to dust; and the spirit must appear before the throne of God. In this trying hour he trusts to the principles which had carried him through life; and he finds them a perfect preservative from the fear and from the power of death. The same faith in a reconciled God and loving Father keeps peace in his conscience, and love in his heart. He depends upon the atonement of Immanuel, and is safe; he wraps himself up in the robe of Immanuel's righteousness, and is happy. He knows he shall be found in Jesus when he stands before God, and therefore looks upon death as his friend, and meets it with a hope full of glory and immortality.

This is the privilege of believers in Jesus. They die in peace. Their principles are mighty, through God, to support and comfort them in the hour of death. Reader! are these principles thine? Examine carefully. Come to a point in this matter; for it is of infinite and eternal moment. What is thy state? Art thou prepared to die? Perhaps thou art openly profane. And what wilt thou do upon thy death-bed, when the divine law accuses thee, justice condemns thee, and the terrors of hell take hold of thee? The stings of guilt at such a time will be worse in the conscience than all the tortures that thy sick body can possibly feel. But if thy conscience be asleep—Oh, what a dreadful death, if thou go out of the world with thine eyes shut, and open them not till thou find the flames of hell about thee!

Perhaps thou art not afraid, because thou hast a decent outside: Oh! take care of trusting in thyself, lest thou shouldst have thy portion with the openly profane. If thou make what thou art, or hast any ground of thy hope before God; if thou depend on thy duties or righteousness, or join them with the work of Christ, and meet death in this confidence; how dreadful will be thy mistake! how inevitable thy ruin! Such false hopes are thus described—"Behold, all ye that kindle a fire and compass yourselves about with sparks, walk in the light of your fire, and in the sparks that ye have kindled."—But mind the end—thus saith the Lord—"This shall ye have of mine hand; ye shall lie down in sorrow." And together with them will the open enemy of God and his Christ lie down. A denier of revelation is brought to the bed of languishing—a slow lingering distemper is carrying him off—the physician has given him over—his disease is mortal, and he is convinced of it. But, alas! he has no preparation for death and judgment. He has some Christian friends, and they talk freely to him about his eternal state; but he will hear nothing of his guilt or of his want of a Saviour. They get a minister of Christ to visit him; and he speaks to him of sin, which is the transgression of the holy law, and of the justice of God which is engaged to give transgressors their due, and of the impossibility of his finding mercy at the judgment-seat until every demand be satisfied which law and justice have upon him: he tries to persuade the dying man of the Godhead of Jesus, and of the divine work of Jesus, but in vain: he sets at nought the minister's advice, and with a hardened and impenitent heart replies—Be it as it will with me in eternity, I will have nothing to do with your Christ. So he died. We need not follow him to the judgment-seat to know what became of his soul. The infallible record has declared what will be the portion of the unbelieving. Their misery is as certain as the truth of God. O reader, examine thyself: for he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God.

Perhaps thou art in name a Christian: but what thinkest thou of Christ? The grand heresy of this day is about his person; and if thou art fallen into it, there is no hope in thy death. Is he Jehovah? Oh, leave not this matter undetermined. The truth of his word, and the glory of his work, depend entirely upon this one point: so does thy peace and comfort: for if thou believe him to be any thing but the self-existent God, thou shalt die in thy sins. His sufferings cannot avail for thy pardon, nor his obedience for thy righteousness, unless he be Jehovah. Without faith in him, as the self-existent Saviour, death will find thee under guilt, and judgment will leave thee among the enemies of God and his Christ.

Whatever evil there is in death to terrify, whatever pain to hurt, the blessed Jesus by the grace of God tasted it for all his. The grace of the Father gave him to be the surety for his people unto death. He died for them, and as truly tasted death, as ever the nicest palate tasted meat or drink. But it was like a taste—of short duration—it was not possible that he should be holden long under the bands of death. He rose again on the third day: and because he lives, believers in him shall live also. They are partakers of his victory over death, and share in all its blessings. The sentence of the broken law is repealed. They do not die to bear the punishment of sin. Christ sustained that. The pains and agonies of death fell upon him—"The sorrows of death (says he) compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me." He was a just man, who had no reason to fear death, but, being found in the place of his people with their sins upon him, he was to bear every thing that was dreadful in death. Hence his agonies at the approach of it—"My heart," says he, "is sore pained within me, and the terrors of death are fallen upon me. Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me; and horror hath overwhelmed me." He endured those inconceivable horrors to deliver them, who, through fear of death, had been all their lifetime subject to bondage. But the bondage is at an end when they believe in his victory. Their fears are dispelled when they see the glory of the battle which he fought and won—how, by dying, he took away sin, satisfied justice, removed the curse, conquered death, broke its sceptre, took out its sting, and left nothing in it but what is friendly to them. In these believing views they can meet death with confidence; for they cannot taste that in death which Christ tasted. He felt it, that they might not feel it: he died in agonies that they might die in peace. O my most loving and precious Jesus, I believe this; let not any unbelief in me dishonour thy complete conquest over all that is fearful or painful in dying. My times are in thy hand: when thou art pleased to bring them to an end, let me find death swallowed up in victory. Oh that I may then triumph with thy redeemed! What can separate us from the love of Christ?—shall the sting of death, or the fear of death, or of Satan, or of hell? No; thanks be to God!—these were all conquered when Jesus died; subdued for ever when he rose again. And he has left us many precious promises that we, trusting in him, shall share in his victory, and find the blessings of it in the hour of death.

Attend then, O my soul, to what he has engaged to bestow upon his dying disciples, as the fruit of his death; and give him credit, not doubting but he will make it good. Live now in the comfort of his promises, and fear not. The almighty Jesus will be with thee, and thou shalt conquer with him in the hour of death. Observe his word, which cannot be broken—"I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes." The ransom which he here engages to pay for his, he paid as their surety, and he daily applies it to them as their Saviour. Upon quoting this promise, and finding by faith the happy fulfilment of it, mark how the apostle rejoices with the Corinthians in the near view of death—"O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law: but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord." O thou most glorious conqueror! almighty Jesus! eternal thanks be to thee, that the law cannot accuse, sin cannot condemn, death cannot sting thy redeemed. Thou hast promised to make them happy in death, and faithful is thy word. The beloved John is one of thy witnesses—"I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord:" Write it for the use of my disciples, that it may be the ground of their faith when they come to die: I promise to make them blessed in their death: being IN me—members under me—their head, and living in the Lord—they shall die in the Lord: they shall have union with me, and communion too, when they are dying: the hour of death, the time of their dissolution, shall be a season of great blessedness: they shall have my presence in the last moments: I will walk with them through the valley of the shadow of death, and they shall fear no evil: my rod and my staff shall then comfort them. O my God, make thy word good. Sweet Jesus, write this promise upon my heart. Oh help me to mix faith with it, that when mine appointed time is come, I may experience the blessedness of dying in the Lord. I wait for the time: it is not far off. Oh keep me, Jesus, till that hour. Keep me, Jesus, in that hour. Save me through life and death, and bless me with thine eternal salvation. Hear, and answer for thy mercies' sake. Amen.

Meditate, O my soul, upon these blessings. Consider, how great, how many they are. Consider also thine unworthiness: thou art less than the least of them. And yet God has set his love upon thee, and has given thee the greatest of them. He has called thee to the knowledge of his love in Jesus, and has shed it abroad in thy heart. He has set thee in the way that leads to the eternal enjoyment of his love, has promised to keep thee all the way, and to bless thee at the end of it. He will make thee blessed in death, and blessed for evermore. Hitherto thou hast found him faithful. Not one good thing has failed which thou didst ask in faith, and wait for at his hands. Review all his dealings with thee, and see what infinite mercy there was in them. He made thy walk prosperous, thy warfare successful, thy crosses sanctified. Thou hast not taken a false step but when thou wast not living by the faith of the Son of God. Oh trust him then, and be not afraid. His love has brought thee thus far: he has led thee in the right way to the verge of life; and he declares he will not leave thee nor forsake thee in the hour of death. Fear not to look down; fear not to go down with Jesus into the grave. He has promised—"I will be with thee;" and wherever he is, there is heaven. He is with his dying friends, and they are blessed indeed. They die in faith—they live by faith in death—and as soon as faith ceases, they live with their God for ever. The body falls asleep, and rests safely till the morning of the resurrection. The soul in a moment enters into the joy of its Lord—a joy like his—pure and holy—a fulness of joy—and is satisfied for ever. Oh what will the heart feel in this blessedness! What acknowledgments will it make to God and the Lamb! To praise him for the wonders of his grace in bringing to that glory will be the happy employment of eternity. To see him as he is, in his divine majesty, is heaven. For how great communications of his love, the being ever with him, and ever like him, will make the soul capable of, we cannot perfectly conceive. These things are at present too high and heavenly even for our thoughts. By faith we sometimes have a little glimpse of the glory to be revealed; and it eclipses all the grandeur of the world. There are happy moments when we are permitted to behold the king in his beauty, when he discovers his matchless loveliness, and gives us a taste of the heavenly feast: at such blessed seasons the soul is bowed down and humbled to the dust, adoring the infinite mercy and goodness of God. If there be so much of heaven in these manifestations of divine love, what must the full enjoyment be? We may suppose a happy soul, entered into rest, thus meditating upon the grace which brought it to that glory:—

Blessing and thanks without ceasing be unto Father, Son, and Spirit, through whose sovereign grace I was chosen to this blessedness, and am now brought to the perfect and everlasting enjoyment of it. This communication with the Godhead, through Jesus, is as far beyond my former thoughts of it as the heaven is above the earth. How great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty, that the most high and holy One would thus communicate his love unto sinful creatures! Glory be to thee, holy Father, for predestinating me to the adoption of children, and for the free gift of the heavenly inheritance. Glory be to thee, incarnate

Jehovah, for the covenant undertakings for me, for thy life, death, and complete salvation. I worship thee, I glorify thee, O God the Holy Ghost, for quickening me, for teaching me and enabling me, through believing in Jesus, to experience the love of the Father, and for bringing me to enjoy his endless blessings. Surely the goodness and mercy of the holy Trinity have followed me all the days of my life, were with me when I walked through the valley of the shadow of death, and are now my most blessed portion in the house of the Lord. I am made a pillar in the temple of my God, and am to go no more out. Oh what exceeding riches of grace are these! What has God done for me! Angels and brethren, help me to praise. My debt is immense. No saved sinner can owe him more. It is growing every moment. My praises pay none of it. With my thankful heart, and it is all thankfulness, I only acknowledge his infinite goodness, and own myself his eternal debtor. Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever.

Reader! art thou in the way which leads to this glory? If not, may the Lord be merciful unto thee, and bring thee unto it.

If thou art seeking to be set right in it, remember Jesus is THE WAY. May his good Spirit enable thee to believe in his word, and to trust in it, till thou attain the salvation of thy soul.

If thou art in the way, and hast communion with the Father through faith in the atonement and righteousness of his Son, art thou maintaining it in thy daily walk, and improving it in every duty? And art thou going on thy way rejoicing in God? If thou art sorrowing for outward crosses, or burdened with inward conflicts, canst thou nevertheless find joy and peace in believing? Dost thou march on, victorious in thy warfare, keeping up communion with God against all opposition of thy spiritual enemies? And is thy faith established upon the faithfulness of God, that he will carry on his own work in thee unto the day of the Lord Jesus? In this faith dost thou hope to die? Has God indeed done these wonders for thee? Oh bless him then with me, and let us magnify his name together. Be thou exalted, Lord, in us, and by us. Every day we would grow up into nearer and holier communion with thee. We desire to be more like thee, and to show forth more of thy lovely image before men. Oh help us to praise thee better with our lips and lives. By the communion of the Holy Ghost we would communicate more by faith with the Son in his salvation, and with the Father in his love. O holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity! in this divine fellowship we hope to find our heaven upon earth: let it be growing and increasing, helped forward by all means, and, if it please thee, by these volumes. Make them, Lord, the instrument under thee of leading thy people into the right way, and of establishing them in it. Accompany the reading of them with the teaching of thy Spirit, and to the advancement of thy glory. I present the books unto thee, ever glorious Jesus, and lay them at thy feet. Thou knowest my heart: accept them graciously, as a public acknowledgment for inestimable mercies. In thy great compassion overlook the faults in them: what is agreeable to the scripture is thine own. Make use of it to thy praise. I devote myself, my body and soul, my tongue and pen, all I have and am, to thy service. I would not look upon myself as any longer mine own, but being bought with a price, I would glorify thee in the use of all thy gifts and graces. With thee I desire to walk through life. In thine arms I hope to die. Through thee I expect soon to enjoy perfect communion with the Father, and the Spirit. Therefore into thy hands I commend myself. Keep me in the right way. Guide me to the end of it, that I may finish my course with joy, and join thy redeemed in giving to thee, with the Father and the Spirit, the three in one Jehovah, equal and everlasting praise. Hear, Lord, and answer. Amen.

PREFACE.

THE present treatise is a continuation of some remarks formerly published concerning the experience of a true Christian, who, quickened by the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, lives by faith, and who is enabled to go forward in his walk by the faith of the Son of God. There was one volume upon this subject, entitled, "The Life of Faith," and some years after, two volumes on "The Walk of Faith:" in which the divine helps and supports were considered great and many, not only for the establishment of believers in the way, but also for their happiness in every step of it, that they might rejoice in the Lord always, yea, with such a fulness of joy as to make them triumph in the God of their salvation.

This is the grand Gospel privilege, which is granted to believers, as believers, and promised to them in the freest and fullest manner that any grant can be conveyed; springing from sovereign grace in the giver, and received, not from any qualification in themselves, but entirely from his own bounty, continued and increased with all the rich and ripe fruits of faith, to the praise of the glory of the grace of God.

It has been long observed, and much lamented, that there are very few of these happy believers who give such a perfect credit to the promises of God in Christ, as to rest their hearts upon his faithfulness, without any doubt or wavering: they do not trust so far as the promises warrant them; which stops the exercise of faith and hinders the growth of the spiritual life. Weak faith has little fruit. Strong faith improves love to God, loving obedience, patient suffering, persevering warfare, and the other fruits of the Spirit: indeed, for this very purpose it is commanded that we might trust and not be afraid: and there are promises made to them who obey the command; and all things promised are possible to them who believe: for there is strength sufficient in the promiser to make faith grow, yea to make it grow exceedingly: and he has done it, giving us a happy instance in the church of the Thessalonians, in which persecution raged, but faith was victorious, and patience triumphant. It has pleased God to give us in the scriptures many encouragements for the growth of faith, which are in the following treatise set before the reader, that we may honour his word, and trust in it at all times, especially when appearances make against their being fulfilled. Then it is high worship, against hope to believe in hope, as the father of the faithful did: and they are his children, and follow the steps of his faith, who, when sin is felt in its defilement, in its guilt, in the sense of inward corruptions, and of strong temptations, in the many troubles of life, in the infirmities of age, and in the approach of death, put their whole trust and confidence in the promises of God. Nothing else is appointed, either to bring in the peace of God to the conscience, or to keep it in. God only in such trials can be a safe refuge, and a sure defence; and faith, looking at what he has engaged to give, secures the promised help to the glory of God. Under these several heads something is here offered from the scriptures of truth to encourage a more steadfast reliance on the divine faithfulness than one commonly meets with. And what is said upon each head is here set before the reader, on the authority of God's word, and is also followed with fervent prayer, that the end of publishing this treatise may be answered, even, that the scriptural faith may be hereby increased, that it may abound yet more and more, and in such a great degree as may bring the highest glory to God, the truest holiness to the heart, and the happiest experience in the life, and in the warfare of the Christian. May the gracious Lord, who is the author and finisher of the faith, accompany it with his Spirit to the advancement of his own praise, and to the edification of his own people! To him who keepeth promise for ever, be glory in the church, through Christ Jesus, world without end. Amen.

THE TRIUMPH OF FAITH.

CHAPTER I.

Introduction.

WHERE there has been war, a triumph supposes a battle to have been fought, a victory to have been obtained, and the great rejoicings of the conquerors upon this occasion. The Christian has his matter of triumph; but it is spiritual. It is always in Christ, the Captain of his salvation. So it is written—"Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ." The apostle is speaking of his preaching the Gospel. He carried the sweet savour of Jesus' name from place to place: but it was not always received as a joyful sound, nor welcomed, as it deserved. He met with great opposition. The Holy Ghost witnessed, that in every city bonds and afflictions awaited him. As these abounded, grace did much more abound. For he was carried on through persecutions, imprisonment, stoning, whipping, perils of various kinds, suffered for Christ, and Christ made him victorious over them all. He not only enabled Paul to conquer, but also made him more than conqueror—he was the blessed instrument of pulling down the strong holds of sin and Satan, and of setting up in the world, that kingdom of Jesus, which is flourishing to this day, and which will triumph to eternity. A poor weak man had all the Roman empire against him; but he did wonders. Through Christ strengthening him, he went on conquering and to conquer: and to Christ he gives all the glory; acknowledging that the Gospel, his preaching it, and the success of it, was of God; the excellency of the power was of God. "Thanks be unto God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ." He, for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate, that as our surety he might live and die and conquer for us. It was to the everlasting honour of his grace and mercy that he would engage in this war, and undertake to deliver his people from the tyranny of their enemies. They were in bondage to sin—sold under sin—enslaved to divers lusts and pleasures—living according to the course of this world—according to the prince of the power of the air, the wicked spirit, who now worketh effectually in the children of disobedience. These tyrants were leading them captive at their will, hoping soon to have them delivered over to death, and then to everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. In this miserable state, under sin—under condemnation we all were—guilty and helpless—not only without any means of deliverance in our own power, but without any desire of it, being tempted to dream of liberty while we were tied and bound with the chain of our sins, and fancying that we were free, even while our enemies were waiting to exercise their utmost malice against us, by binding us with chains of everlasting darkness. Oh what mercies—what compassions are in our God—in our Jesus. He remembered us in this our low estate, and manifested the exceeding riches of his grace, in coming from heaven to save his people from their sins. To this end Jehovah was manifested in the flesh, as it is written, Jer. l. 33, 34: "The children of Israel and the children of Judah were oppressed together, and all that took them captives held them fast, and refused to let them go; but their Redeemer is strong;

the Lord of hosts is his name: he shall thoroughly plead their cause." He made all our enemies his own, and fought our battles against them. He obeyed, that the broken law, which stood against us, might be magnified by his obedience. The penalties of it he endured when the Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all. His cross was his triumphal chariot, on which he vanquished all our foes, Col. ii. 14, 15. He blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and he took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; and, having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in that same cross. By dying on it, he put away sin by the sacrifice of himself; and by his rising from the dead on the third day, according to the scriptures, he overcame death and him that had the power of death, that is the devil. And now as God-man in one Christ, the almighty Saviour of his redeemed, he is seated upon his throne of grace: all his enemies being made his footstool, he is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him. Such was the battle which the Redeemer fought. Such was the victory which he obtained. The important news of it is the substance of that blessed gospel, which he ordered his apostles to preach to every creature, and which he promised to assist them in, and to be with them for that purpose to the end of the world. He is as good as his word to this day. Still faith cometh by hearing it. The Holy Spirit witnesses to it, that it is the truth of God—and he applies it, and makes it the power of God unto salvation. He enables the hearers to mix such faith with it, that they receive, and enjoy the happy fruits of Christ's victory. Once they were dead in trespasses and sins, but now Christ hath quickened them. They were guilty, and bound over to condemnation, but the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath freed them from the law of sin and of death. Once they walked after the course of this world; but now they walk with God. Their old enemies are still fighting against them, and watching for their destruction; but they are enabled to gain daily victory over them, over the world, the flesh, and the devil, through the strength of Jesus, and through the power of his might. Their wants are many, and they are daily made more sensible of them; but they have an abundant supply of every thing that pertains to life and godliness, out of the infinite fulness of God their Saviour.

Thus far the three volumes went, which were formerly published upon this subject, entitled "The Life of Faith," and "The Walk of Faith." The present treatise relates to the improvement of the former doctrines, considering the scripture motives and encouragements for the believer's rejoicing always in the Lord, and triumphing in the God of his salvation. The ground of his triumph is the work of Christ: his warrant to depend upon it, is the word of Christ: and his actual dependence is the work of the Spirit of Christ. Building upon these principles, he is commanded to go on from faith to faith, still pressing forward, that he may see more clearly the glory of the person, and the glory of the work of Christ—what he is to trust in for his title to salvation, and for the things which accompany salvation, and may, by every day's experience, be growing into a more settled dependence upon the word of Christ, and upon his faithfulness to fulfil it, and thereby may be learning to expect constant supplies, and according as his faith increases, receiving greater supplies of the power of the Spirit of Christ—that the God of hope may fill him with all joy and peace in believing; that he may abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost: and we have an encouraging example in the Thessalonians, who had great trials, and met them with great faith. The apostle commended it highly; but by practice it had so improved, that, having occasion to mention it some time afterwards, he says—"We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly." We have the same promises and the same helps as they had—promises exceeding great, and exceeding precious, containing a free grant in Christ of all spiritual blessings—a full warrant to make use of them for life and godliness, with commands and encouragements to trust and not be afraid of any enemies, or of any dangers: because he is faithful who has promised to be with them—to guide them with his counsel—to keep them safe by his power—to bless them with his love—and never to leave them nor forsake them: so that, in all difficulties and troubles, they may go on their way rejoicing, until faith and patience have done their perfect work. To this purpose, a divine, whose praise is in all the churches, has given his testimony; "It is an everlasting spring of comfort, and encouragement unto the people of God, both in prayer, and unto prayer; they pray to him, who is mighty, mighty to do what they pray for. The Lord's promises are our richest inheritances, and that not only because he hath promised greater and better things than are in the compass of any man's power to make good, or in the compass of any man's understanding to comprehend, but because he will certainly be as good in performance as he hath been in promise: for he is in one mind concerning all that he hath promised: he will be merciful as he hath promised, and pardon sin as he hath promised, and sanctify all our troubles as he hath promised: he will give us his Spirit as he hath promised, and save us eternally as he hath promised." A great layman thus confirms the same truth—"Were God but believed in what he says, all the temptations of Satan and the doubtings of our unbelieving hearts would be silenced and brought to nothing. What exceeding folly is it in our hearts, that God who never deceived any that trusted in him, should be distrusted by any, and not believed by all. He is the God of truth: so is his word the word of truth. And not any soul, that ever tried God by trusting him upon his word, but found him so. Oh, then, take God's word, and our hearts will be quiet. Though the heathen do rage, yet they imagine but a vain thing. In this glorious doctrine, free grace in God is the fountain, full satisfaction to divine justice the way, but perfect salvation and redemption to all his elect body in Christ the end. And truly when a soul can say, My beloved is mine, and I am his, he hath spoken all at once. I know no other light, nor rule, but the word and Spirit to make out any thing of God to any soul. The glory of the great day will be—God is mine, and I am his."

CHAPTER II.

Some scripture encouragements for the triumph of faith.

All the Old Testament words which we translate triumph, signify great joy felt in the heart, and expressed outwardly in word or deed; a jubilee of joy, even joy in the highest, as near as it can be to the joy of heaven. In the New Testament the word is used but twice; First, for what Christ engaged to do for us; and secondly, for what Christ engaged to do in us: for as he undertook to fight our battles against all our enemies—sin, the world, Satan, death, and hell: and the Captain of our salvation has gained a complete victory, and had a most glorious triumph over them in his own person—when he blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and he took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross: and having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in that same cross. And he still goes on conquering and to conquer; by the preaching of his cross and passion, his resurrection and ascension, he is to this very day exalting the honours of his victory and triumph in the hearts and lives of his redeemed, giving them such a share in his conquests, that they ought to be ever praising him with joyful lips. Now, thanks be unto God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ. This was the apostle's happy experience. He found that the Gospel, and his preaching it, and the great success which attended it, were the fruits of Christ's presence with him, and blessing upon him: therefore to him he gave all the glory. So do we still. We see the triumphs of the cross spread far and wide, and we praise him for our day of Gospel grace. The crucified Saviour in his majesty rides on prosperously in the chariots of salvation, and his enemies fall under him. In the day of his power he makes them a willing people. They submit to his sceptre, and acknowledge him to be their Lord and their God. Under his banner they fight the good fight of faith, and they daily conquer, yea, they are more than conquerors through him who loveth them—crowned conquerors in glory everlasting. Thus it appears that the triumph of the Head includes the triumph of its members. The fountain from whence springs their present and their eternal joy is God—God in Christ. They glory in the victories of the God-man; because of his commandment; because of his free promise, which is a perfect warrant for the fullest confidence, and because of his goodness, truth, and power, which are bound to fulfil all his engagements. Looking to these infallible securities, the believer's heart is established, trusting in the Lord. Being of the true circumcision, he would put no confidence in the flesh, but would be daily crucifying it with its affections and lusts, and bringing all high thoughts of self to the obedience of Christ. If he has been long standing in the faith—an old Christian—if he has received much consolation from his Lord, or has been very active and successful in his service, his trust is never in himself. The ground of his believing is always one and the same. He has no new doctrine to learn. No new warrant to encourage him to believe. The word of God: "Thus saith the Lord" is always sufficient, and ought to draw forth the fullest credit, that can possibly be given to the testimony of the God of truth. What was advanced before in "The Life of Faith" and in "The Walk of Faith," is taken for granted in the present treatise. Here is no new doctrine. Salvation is in Christ Jesus, and in no other: I am, says he, the truth, the one saving truth, like himself, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever—one Lord, one faith, one salvation. And whoever believes this aright is in a safe state, in which there is no change with respect to God; no variableness or shadow of turning. Whatever his own apprehensions may be, the word of the Lord endureth for ever. He may be tempted in a legal hour to cast away his confidence, but the counsel of the Lord shall stand. He may change, but I, saith God, change not. For the gracious gifts and calling of God are without repentance—they are such that it cannot repent him of bestowing them, or of continuing them, when once bestowed. As the believer has no new truth to learn, only to improve the principles of the doctrine of Christ; so he has no new title to expect. Under the free grant and gift of God, salvation comes to him of grace in the most sovereign way that can be conceived: and his warrant to receive it is the divine command: and when he has been enabled to receive it by the obedience of faith, the divine promise assures him that he shall not perish for his sins, but that he shall have everlasting life. Believing the promise, is the best title that possibly can be to this salvation; for we are saved freely by grace through faith, and that not of ourselves, neither salvation nor faith; both are the gifts of God; and under the title all the blessings which accompany salvation are included, all the things which are freely given to us of God—a sufficiency of present grace, and the full possession of eternal glory. This is the good old foundation, upon which the heirs of promise have always built their faith and hope. They knew that all fulness was in Christ for their use and enjoyment; and they were persuaded that they should honour him most by believing this with the strongest certainty. They could not trust too soon, nor too much, to his faithfulness. And therefore they come boldly to the throne of grace, that they may receive out of his fulness at all times, for all things, for body and soul, for earth and heaven, what they wanted, and what he had promised. The more they live thus by faith, they will experience more occasion to rejoice in the Lord; and to find that his arm to fulfil will always go as far as his promise, even to bless the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ. This indeed is strong faith; but it is the gift of a strong God: it does not depend in the least on what the believer can do for himself, but on what the Almighty has engaged to do for him, and in him, and by him; for he requires and commands it in this high degree: there is grace sufficient to bring it into use and practice, as far as the commands go; all things promised being possible to him that believeth; and they who have trusted most to the faithfulness of God, who, against hope, believed in hope, have experienced that God did never leave them nor forsake them. He magnified his word above all his name. There he has made his name to shine forth, and all his attributes are magnified in their greatest perfection; the believers on earth, and the saints in heaven, praise God for his word, because it is the instrument of his Spirit, by which he bestows grace, and according to which he gives glory. The fulfilling of his word runs through time, and will run through eternity. Blessed be God for his word of promise! Blessed be the Lord, that it will be fulfilling for ever and ever. This being the case, it becomes necessary to inquire into the divine records, and to see what a full warrant God has given us to trust and not be afraid: and this to every believer, there being the same ground to believe with the strongest faith, as to believe at all.

This inquiry is the more necessary because of the place which faith holds in our religion. It reaches to the whole of it; so that nothing is good before God, however fair and specious it may appear to men without it. The conscience, the heart, and its affections, are purified only by faith. All duties, for their right motive, and for their acceptance, depend upon it. Without faith it is impossible to please God. No trials and afflictions can be patiently and profitably endured, unless faith be in exercise. Our whole warfare is carried on, and can be, by our being strong in the Lord, and fighting in the power of his might, finished victoriously only by faith. Indeed it enters so much into every thing wherein we have to do with God, that the strengthening of it is the strengthening of every other grace, which are weak or vigorous according as more or less faith enters into them. And therefore the scripture encouragements for our growth in faith should be well weighed with much prayer, frequent meditation, and thanksgiving, that they may have their proper effect upon the believer's heart and life. And as this can be done only by power from on high, assistance must ever be sought from thence, and depended upon. The Holy Spirit is the very breath of spiritual life and of all spiritual activity. Every godly motion of the heart is from his holy inspiration. So the scripture teaches, 2 Cor. iii. 5: "Not that we (even apostles) are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God." So we are taught to pray:—O Lord, from whom all good things do come, grant to us, thy humble servants, that by thy holy inspiration we may think those things that be good, and by thy merciful guiding may perform the same, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen. (Fifth Sunday after Easter.) And again (the Nineteenth Sunday after Trinity):—O God! forasmuch as without thee we are not able to please thee, mercifully grant that thy Holy Spirit may in all things direct and rule our hearts, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

A great divine has thus expressed the same sentiments:—

"In those who are truly converted, all saving truths are transcribed out of the scripture into their hearts. They are taught of God; so as they find all truths, both concerning the estate, and the gracious and happy estate of man, in themselves. They carry a body of divinity in them, and about them; so as from a saving feeling they can speak of conversion, of grace, of the Spirit, &c. and from this acquaintance are ready to yield and give up themselves to truth revealed, and to God speaking by it. And thus a man may know his estate before God, by his relish for the word. There is a heavenly and divine relish in the word of God; as for instance—Take the doctrine of his providence, that all things shall work together for the best to them that love God. What a sweet word is this! A whole kingdom is not worth this promise—That whatever befals a Christian in this world, there is an overruling Providence to sway all to good, to help forward his eternal good—that Christ will be present with us in all conditions—that he will give us his Holy Spirit—that, when we confess our sins, and lay them open, he is merciful to forgive them—that, if our sins were red as scarlet, they shall be as white as wool. What kind of incredible sweetness is in these to a heart that is prepared for these comforts! The doctrines of reconciliation, of adoption, of glory to come, of the offices of Christ, and such like, how sweet are they! They relish wonderfully to a sanctified soul. These truths that come out of the mouth of Christ, and out of the ministry concerning Christ, they are most sweet of all. Oh, how sweet were these words to the poor man—Thy sins are forgiven thee. Do you think they went not to his heart? The best discovery of a true affection to Christ, and of a true state in grace, is from our affection to the word of Christ. Wherever there is an interest in Christ, there is a high respect to the word.

A believer trusting to these helps, and making a diligent use of these means in reading the charter of grace, will find such a faith frequently described and required, as relies on the truth of God without doubt or wavering, as depends on his faithfulness to his promises, with the fullest confidence of the heart, and waits on his fulfilling them, steadfastly persuaded that he has spoken nothing with his mouth but what he will infallibly make good with his arm.

All the gifts and graces of God come to us in his promises, and cannot be received or enjoyed but in the way of believing. What, then, can be a greater encouragement not to stagger at any promise through unbelief, than that God has declared it is a service well pleasing and acceptable to him. It is high worship to be strong in faith, giving glory to God; for it is a gift of his love, and a grace of his Spirit, and his own special work in the hearts of his people. In the day of his power he makes them willing, and he enables them to set to their seal, that God is true. So we read—"By faith in Christ Enoch walked with God, and he had this testimony, that he pleased God; but without faith it is impossible to please him:" therefore Enoch's state, and his walk, and his translation, were all by faith. Now, we know that the judgment of God is according to truth; and that he has declared in the word of truth that whatsoever is not of faith is sin: so that it is impossible it should please a most holy God, who has magnified his word above all his name, and who delights to see his people do the same, magnifying it, by giving it the fullest credit of their hearts, and the most perfect dependence of their lives.

He has also required this by his express command:—This is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, who has said, "Ye believe in God; believe also in me"—with the same faith and with the same worship: and when the gaoler inquired of Paul and Silas—Sirs, what must I do to be saved? they answered—Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. And this belief is commanded in very trying circumstances, when the outward supports of faith seem to fail, and the inward comforts are at a very low ebb: "Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light; let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God," —his God still. That relation is always the same; and so are the blessings which are included in it, and which he cannot fail to bestow on those who honour his word in such trials of their faith, that, against hope they believe in hope; for blessed are all they who put their trust in him.

For the farther confirmation of their faith, he has strengthened his commands with the most encouraging promises of grace to help in every time of need. Ask, and ye shall have; for he giveth to all askers liberally, and upbraideth not, come they ever so often, or ask ever so much; yea, our heavenly Father will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him: and his influence goes as far as any promise; for he is the mighty power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. Whatever is promised, he is almighty to fulfil. So we read, when our Lord cursed the barren fig-tree, the apostles marvelled that it presently withered away. Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, if ye have faith and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig-tree, but also, if ye shall say unto this mountain, be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done. And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive; for believing honours the truth of the promiser; and asking in prayer for the fulfilling of it, engages and secures the promised grace. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much; so much, that the prayer of faith hath opened and shut heaven. It has done wonders in removing mountains of difficulties, and conquering hosts of foes, which rendered it seemingly impossible that the word of God should be established. But faith gained the victory, and triumphed gloriously.

It has pleased God also to confirm all these arguments by revealing the motive on which he made the promises. It was love. They are all free-grace promises. In his counsels, in the revealing them, in the fulfilling them, love directs the whole. They are discoveries of what is in the Father's heart to his children, and are the means of conveying his fatherly blessings, especially such a persuasion of his love to them as will work love to him, and they work by love. For we love him because he first loved us: therefore he speaks to them comfortably, addressing himself to them in the tenderest compassion, and calling them by the dearest names:—his chosen—his beloved—his adopted—his children—his friends—heirs, heirs of God—joint heirs with Christ, who is Lord of all—his peculiar treasure—his portion. These, and many other endearing names, are intended to convince them of his love, to win and engage their hearts in love to him, that, when it is given them to believe the truth of his promises, they might be certain of their fulfilment. God is love: he delighteth in his people. His heart is so set upon them, that, in his dealings with them, love has the appointing, the directing, and the blessing of all. His love to them had no beginning; and it will have no end. It bestows on the happy objects of it grace, and it secures to them glory. Love has crowned their Head; and love will crown all his members: for out of his fulness they are most freely invited to come, and take all spiritual blessings as the earnest of eternal. Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon them! Who can believe it, and not love him again?

It has pleased God also to give us some examples of his singular favour to them who acted strong faith, and to whom he therefore administered strong consolation. The apostle says, "That whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the scriptures, might have hope." And then he prays, "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, by the power of the Holy Ghost." And when the Holy Ghost gives it this blessed effect, he always fills the heart with gratitude and thankfulness. Thus it operated in the day when the believer was enabled to say, "O Lord, I will praise thee: though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou hast comforted me. Behold, God is my salvation: I will trust and not be afraid: for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation. Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the fountain of salvation." Oh what reviving cordials did the father of the faithful draw out of it, who, against hope, believed in hope, that he should become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken: "So shall thy seed be: and being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God:" and being fully persuaded that what he had promised he was able also to perform. For this heroic faith he is celebrated in scripture, and proposed to us for an example. One of his children was enabled to follow closely the steps of his faith, through a life of continual and great sufferings, and to triumph in the prospect of a violent death: "I am now ready to be offered up; and the time of my departure is at hand: I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me in that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing."

We have another example given us in the fifty-sixth Psalm. On whatever occasion the prophet indited it, the Spirit of prophecy teaches us to apply it to the Son of David, who is Christ the Lord. It describes his great trials and continual persecutions, and his invincible faith, by which he was carried through them, when all the world was against him. The whole Psalm is a prayer made up of the most perfect trust and confidence in the faithfulness of God to his word; and he assures himself that heaven and earth shall pass away, before one jot or tittle of it could fail. He had enemies, many, mighty, cunning, cruel, united together to destroy him, Acts iv. 27; but his heart was established, trusting in the Lord. He read, he knew, he believed the promises made to him, and without doubt or wavering, he waited for the fulfilling of them. Thus he viewed the Father's covenant engagements, who had declared: "Thus saith God the Lord, he that created the heavens, and stretched them out; he that spread forth the earth, and that which cometh out of it; he that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein: I the Lord have called thee in righteousness: and I will hold thy hand, and I will keep thee, and I will give thee for a covenant of the people," &c. On this rock he built his faith, and could not be moved: "The Lord God," says he, "hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back: I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair! I hid not my face from shame and spitting: for the Lord God will help me; therefore shall I not be confounded; therefore have I set my face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed: he is near that justifieth me. Who will contend with me? Let us stand together. Who is mine adversary? Let him come near to me. Behold, the Lord God will help me. Who is he that shall condemn me? Lo, they all shall wax old as a garment: the moth shall eat them up." What an undaunted courage is here manifested! In this spirit of faith he prays—

"Be gracious unto me, O God, because fallen man would devour me: all the day long he is fighting against me, and oppressing me; all the day long mine enemies would devour me; for they are many who fight against me, O thou Most High. In the day, when I might have reason to fear, I will put my trust in thee: I shall praise God because of his word: in God I have put my trust; I will not fear what flesh can do unto me: all the day long they torture my words: all their devices are against me for evil: they assemble together; they hide themselves; they watch my steps as if they were waiting for my life. Shall they escape for their wickedness? In thine anger, O God, thou wilt bring these people under: thou numberest my wanderings; thou hast put my tears into thy bottle: are they not recorded in thy register? In the day when I shall pray unto thee, then shall mine enemies be driven back: this have I known for certain, because God is on my side: I will praise God, because of his word: I will praise Jehovah, because of his word: In God have I trusted; I will not fear what man can do unto me. Thy vows are upon me, O God. I will pay my thanksgivings unto thee; for thou hast delivered my life from death. Wilt thou not also keep my feet from falling, that I may be able to walk in the presence of God, in the light of life everlasting?"

Oh what a perfect trust and confidence is this! And how loudly does it call upon us to look to his example, that God would give us grace to follow the steps of his faith! Observe, O my soul, and consider the pattern set before thee:—He had God on his side—the promises—the power—the providences of the Almighty. He knew that every step was marked, every tear noticed, and that God had them in the book of his remembrance. In this faith he met his trials, and came off triumphant. Notwithstanding his many weary steps, and his strong crying and tears under that sorrow, which never had its like, yet he knew that he should be heard—and he was heard: his enemies fell before him: but they rose and returned to the combat. Upon the word he casts his anchor again. He trusts to it; and he finds it firm and sure still. The storm is great; it continues; it increases; all thy waves and storms, says he to his God, are gone over me. But, my soul, trust thou still in the Lord: for my hope is in him. His word is my stay. It cannot be broken. I praise him for it; again I praise him for it. Trusting in it, now my fears are gone. God is my helper, and I will not fear what man can do unto me. Oh what a pattern is here set for us! May the meditation upon it be useful. May the gracious Lord, who is the author and the finisher of the faith, bless the means of his appointing, for the strengthening of it. And in the use of them, looking up for the constant supplies of his Spirit, may he enable us to go on from strength to strength, keeping this example always in view, until he bring us in peace unto the end of our faith.

These are some of the scripture grounds upon which the triumph of faith is built. It stands upon the almighty power of God, as engaged to fulfil his word: for his word is his deed. To take him at his word is the proper exercise of faith. He hath promised, and it is done. To rest thus upon it, as what cannot possibly fail, is the foundation of Christian worship: and when it is established in the heart, in the love of the truth, it constitutes the chief of that service which is perfect freedom; for God has declared himself well pleased with our trusting to his truth and faithfulness. He has commanded us to do it without doubt or wavering; he has promised grace sufficient to enable us thus to believe; and we cannot put too much trust and confidence in his arm and power. And he has also given us examples of those who honoured him with the fullest reliance of their hearts, and had reason to rejoice in the Lord, who keepeth promise for ever. Glory be to him for such encouragements of our faith! Oh that they may have their proper effect. May the Holy Ghost apply them by his grace, and give us such a faith as may be well pleasing unto God; such a faith as he has commanded, and for the full exercise of which he has made exceeding great promises. Help us, O God of all grace, to trust and not be afraid: for thou art faithful: thy word and thy promises give us full security to trust in the Lord at all times; because in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength: and blessed are all they who put their trust in him.

But by what ways and means shall these arguments and encouragements have their full effect? This is the main point; and it is settled beyond dispute upon scripture authority. The same Spirit, who revealed the promises, is also the fulfiller of them: and he is almighty. The blessing on the use of the means is entirely from him: it is he who teacheth man knowledge: and from him we are to seek it in prayer. With all our reading, hearing, studying, meditating upon the scriptures, we must look up to him for his divine teaching. If any of you, believers, lack wisdom, let him ask it of God, who giveth to all askers liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him; but let him ask in faith. Here is a command and a promise. When we lack wisdom, which we always do, as much as we want breath, we are to ask it of the Spirit of wisdom, and it shall be given us. He will make us wise unto salvation. He will keep us in the use of means dependent on his leading us into all useful truth, and of his revealing to us the things which are freely given to us of God, to show them to us as realities, and to put us into the enjoyment of them as blessings. In this dependence on him, we live, and move, and have our being. Our spiritual life and faculties, and the exercise of them, and the improvement of them, are entirely from his influence. For the apostle, mentioning the several gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, says, "All these worketh that one, and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man his own gifts according to his own will." To him, then, we are to look up for every good gift and every perfect gift. Whenever we open the Bible, we should ask his light and his teaching. He is the chief commentator. He only can put the scriptures into our inward parts, and write them upon our hearts, so that we may experience them to be the power of God unto our own salvation. Our first reformers were of this sentiment, exhorting us to pray, that by the holy inspiration of God's Spirit we may think those things that be good, and by his merciful guiding may perform the same. Grant to us, Lord, we beseech thee, the Spirit to think and do always such things as be rightful, that we, who cannot do any thing that is good without thee, may by thee be enabled to live according to thy will, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen. (Ninth Sunday after Trinity.)

As they prayed, so they sang: for we meet with two hymns, inserted by the reformers in the Common Prayer Book, appointed to be sung at the ordaining of priests, and at the consecration of bishops. The first begins with these words—

Come Holy Ghost! our souls inspire,
And lighten with celestial fire, &c.

Out of the second I quote some verses, not for any excellency of the poetry, but for the soundness of the divinity expressed in these lines:—

Come, Holy Ghost! eternal God!
Proceeding from above,
Both from the Father and the Son,
The God of peace and love.

Visit our minds, and into us
Thy heavenly grace inspire,
That in all truth and godliness
We may have true desire.

Thou in thy gift art manifold,
Whereby Christ's church doth stand,
In faithful hearts writing thy law,
The finger of God's hand.

According to thy promise made,
Thou givest speech of grace,
That through thy help, the praise of God
May stand in every place.

O Holy Ghost! into our souls
Send down thy heavenly light;
Kindle our hearts with fervent love,
To serve God day and night.

Strengthen and 'stablish our weakness,
So feeble and so frail,
That neither devil, world, nor flesh,
Against us may prevail.

Grant us, O Lord, through thee to know
The Father most of might,
That of his dear beloved Son
We may attain the sight.

And that with perfect faith also
We may acknowledge thee,
The Spirit of them both always,
One God, in persons three.

From these authorities it appears to be the doctrine of the scriptures, and of our reformers in harmony with them, that spiritual life and knowledge, and faith in Christ, and hope in him, that maketh not ashamed, and holy love, with every godly motion of the heart, come from the holy inspiration of God the Spirit. It is from him that we understand the scriptures in the mind of the Spirit: it is from his grace that we grow in scripture knowledge, and persevere in the use of means, and at the same time in a constant dependence on his presence in them, for the furtherance and joy of our faith. He begins, he carries on, and he perfects our learning in his revealed word and will. Oh that he may make us, and keep us good scholars, in abiding sense of the necessity of his divine teaching! that the Spirit and the word may go together in our Bible studies, and our Bible experience: so that this may be the daily prayer of our faith:—

O thou Spirit of wisdom and revelation, who has taught us that secret things belong to the Lord our God, but those things which are revealed belong to us, and to our children for ever; open the eyes of our understanding to understand what is revealed in the scriptures for our use. Dispose us to hear them, read them, and meditate on them, with profit. And help us to mix more faith with them, that they may become more precious. In every day's reading, grant that we may find them to be the engrafted word, and that we are really branches grafted into the tree of life, and by the rain, and shining of heaven, enabled to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit abundantly. For all these blessings keep us ever dependent on thy divine teaching, that our fruits may grow richer and riper, we may be more humble in our hearts, and more thankful in our lives: and so we who can learn nothing as we ought without thee, may by thy grace be made wise unto eternal salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus—to whom with thee, O Father, and thee, O Holy Spirit, be equal honour and glory, now and for ever. Amen.

CHAPTER III.

The believer's triumph in the Lord his righteousness.

THE object of his rejoicing is always one and the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever, without any variableness or shadow of turning. It is Christ, God in Christ, concerning whom the commandment runs—Rejoice in the Lord Jesus always, and again I say, rejoice; there being in him a fountain of joy springing up into everlasting life. What he is in his own wonderful person—what is revealed of his gracious works and ways in his dealings with the sinners of mankind—what he did for them in the days of his flesh—what he does in them by his Spirit in time—what he has promised to give them in eternity: in every possible view that can be taken of him, a believer may and ought to rejoice always, and that with a fulness of joy; for thus the apostle offers up his praise—"Now thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ." For he has in his person every possible subject of triumphant joy. He is true and very God: and he is true and very man—God and man in one Christ. The prophet Isaiah foretold this marvellous union, and gloried in the prospect: For us men, and our salvation, a child is born, and a son is given: and his name shall be called Wonderful, because the child is the mighty God, and the Son is the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. This is the great mystery of godliness, of which the saints in the Old Testament sang with the sweetest melody in their hearts unto the Lord, as the prophet does in the one hundred and forty-eighth Psalm, calling upon all in heaven and earth, with all their inhabitants, to join him in the praises of Immanuel: because his name alone is excellent, and his praise above heaven and earth. So that New Testament saint felt it, who declared, that he accounted all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: For whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and I do account them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him—found so united to him as to be one with him: for he was united to our nature, in order to bring about another most blessed union—He taking our nature, that we might take his—He made the Son of man, that we might be made the sons of God—He having the power of an endless life, that he might give spiritual and eternal life to all believers: for they, in the day of his power, are joined to the Lord by one Spirit—the same Spirit in the members as in the Head—that through him, their Head, they might be able to say, truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, by the bond of his Spirit. It is not possible for man to conceive higher things than our Lord has prayed for in these words: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also who shall believe on me through their word: that they all may be one; as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me: and the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one." By virtue of this union with Christ, who is the head over all things to the church, his members have fellowship with him in his holy life: he is the Lord Jehovah their righteousness: For then he became subject to the law, and obedient to its precepts, born of a woman, and made under the law, that through his obedience many might be made righteous. Lo, I come, says he, to DO thy will, O God: and he did it by fulfilling all righteousness. As the surety for his people, what he did, when he magnified the law and made it infinitely honourable in all its demands, was for them, and for their justification, that it might be imputed unto them for righteousness, and they might be dealt with as righteous at the judgment-seat of God. In this the father of the faithful made his boast, and gloried all the day long: for we read that he believed in God, and God imputed to him righteousness, loving him as his friend, and blessing him in all things. Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead: for the children of believing Abraham are freely made heirs, as he was, of the righteousness which is by the faith of Jesus Christ. Hear with what heart-felt joy one of them celebrates his triumphant state in Christ: "I will hope continually, and I will praise thee more and more—my mouth shall show forth thy righteousness, and thy salvation all the day: for I know not the numbers thereof: I will go in the strength of the Lord God; I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine ONLY." He found the blessings flowing from it numberless, and endless: so that it was all he wanted for his justification to life, and for his title to glory—it ONLY. In the same Psalm, admiring and adoring the wonders of the gift of grace, he breaks out: "Thy righteousness, O God, is very high, who hast done great things. O God, who is like unto thee?" He was so complete in this righteousness of Christ, that he would mix nothing with it for his free access to God, or for his full acceptance before God. He knew that his righteousness of faith was appointed of God, was the gift of his grace, and was all-sufficient, being an everlasting righteousness: and therefore it effectually removed the consciousness of sin from his heart, and enabled him to come boldly to the throne of grace, where he stood perfectly justified in Jesus. And in the same spirit we hear a New Testament saint resolving to exclude all glorying, except in Christ, and in his righteousness, "in whom God can be just, and yet the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus. Where is boasting, then? It is excluded. By what law? By the law of works? Nay; but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law, and that Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." This was the apostle's highest ambition—to be found in his precious Saviour. Oh that I may rejoice in him through life, and may be found in him at the hour of death, and in the day of judgment—found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ—the righteousness which is of God by faith. Blessed testimony for Jesus! Encouraging example to place our whole trust and confidence in the Lord our righteousness, and our strength! For he is the same to us as he was to the apostle Paul; and we have as good reason to triumph as he had, because it is written, "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord; my soul shall be joyful in my God: for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation; he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and a bride adorneth herself with her jewels: for as the earth bringeth forth its bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth, so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring before all the nations." This is the righteousness of faith, and these are the fruits of it, which abound to the glory of God, even peace with him, joy in him, a holy walk with him, and a victorious warfare by him. In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory. Herein to glory is the believer's bounden duty. He is called to it as his gospel privilege, and according to his faith he does triumph in it as his present happiness, and as a good ground for his hope of eternal joy. Wonderful blessings are promised to this faith and hope; and they are truly experienced at this day. Bless the Lord, O my soul, for his providing such a garment for glory and beauty. He has warranted thee to put it on; and having through it free access into his presence, he has commanded thee to join that great multitude whom no one can number, who are standing before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed in white robes, and palms in their hands, and who cry with a loud voice, saying, "Salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever!" Their robes are as white as the light, being washed clean in the blood of the Lamb; and through him they have conquered, as the palms in their hands denote; yea, are more than conquerors; having crowns of righteousness upon their heads, which can never fade away; for grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord. Oh! what matter of triumph is here! A righteousness absolutely perfect and everlasting! This greatly enhances all our high joys in Christ, that there is full security for their continuance. It depends on the faithfulness of God to his word and promise, fixed in his eternal counsels, and established upon immutable things. "Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord, and mine is an everlasting righteousness. Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner; but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished." The state of a believer is always one and the same on God's part. He may vary in his apprehension of his state; but with God there is no variableness or shadow of turning. He may be a believer walking in darkness—tempted to doubt; he may pay too much attention to sense and feeling—may get into a legal spirit—his evidences may be clouded: when outward things and providences seem to make against him, his faith may be sore tried, and he may stagger at the promises of God through some fit of unbelief; the man changeth, but God changeth not; his mercies are sure mercies; they cannot fail; for they spring from the ocean of grace, and are streams which no created power can cut off; but they shall infallibly return to it again, and shall bring with them all the happy objects of his love. The Father chose them, and gave them to his Son, who has all their names written in the Lamb's book of life: for them he lived and died: and when he presents them at the last day to the Father—"Behold, I and the children whom thou hast given me;" not one of them shall be wanting; for the Holy Spirit is, by his office, the Lord and giver of life to them, and in the day of his power he enables them to receive Jesus, and to live by faith upon him, as members united to, and in fellowship with, their glorified Head. This covenant of the blessed Trinity is unalterable, being ordered in all things and sure. All the subjects of its grace shall infallibly be saved, according to our Lord's promise, and according to our Lord's prayer, viz. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." Trusting to these immutable securities, the heirs of promise are commanded to draw strong consolation, even to rejoice in Jesus with a fulness of joy, in darkness as well as walking in light—in winter as well as in summer—in adversity as well as in prosperity—in death as well as in life—because he has all power in heaven and earth to make good to them every covenant engagement: and he will do it; for the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and shall come to Sion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away for ever.

O thou most blessed God and Saviour! thou art the Lord our righteousness and our strength. I believe that the whole Israel of God shall be justified ONLY by thee, and in thee ONLY shall they glory. Oh! let thy Spirit abide with me to increase in me this faith, that by fresh supplies of his grace I may be kept from going about to establish my own righteousness, and may constantly submit myself to the righteousness of God. And by the same grace help me to bring forth the fruits of righteousness abundantly unto the glory and praise of God, magnifying thine atonement in the peace of my conscience, exalting thy righteousness in the love of my heart, and in my walk and warfare glorifying thy fulness: so that out of it I may receive a sufficiency of grace, by which I am now enabled to bless thee for the hope of glory. To thee, almighty Jesus, for the work of righteousness, which is peace—and for the effect of righteousness, which is quietness and assurance for ever—to thee be everlasting praise. Amen and Amen.

CHAPTER IV.

The believer's triumph in Jesus under a sense of the defilement of sin.

IT is in virtue of this fellowship with Jesus that believers are freely forgiven all their iniquities. His atonement was the work of our great High Priest, who was made sin for us, although he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. God is of purer eyes than to look upon the least iniquity: and there is a defilement in sin, which makes it exceeding filthy and abominable in his sight. He showed his utter abhorrence of it by establishing in the Old Testament such an abundance of legal pollutions as might exhibit to sense the defiling nature of sin, and might keep it ever before their eyes, and fresh upon their minds: and by making it necessary that the worshippers should be purified from these pollutions, and by establishing the means of their purification, and by forbidding every other, he would lead them to exercise faith in the great purifier, whose office it was to purge their consciences before they could offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. And it was a fixed law, that, if any one legally unclean neglected or refused the appointed means of being cleansed, he was to bear his iniquity; for an unpardoned sinner can have no communion with a most holy God.

Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled. The mind is the fountain from whence all the streams flow. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, &c.—these are the things which defile the man. An enlightened conscience is made sensible of this, and feels the necessity of being purified from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, in order to approach God and to have boldness and access with confidence to the throne of grace. His meditations at such times are like these:—

The more I know of myself, the more I am led to loathe myself, and to repent in dust and ashes; for I am a sinner, filthy and abominable altogether; by nature as vile as sin can render a fallen creature, and daily polluting myself in heart and life with fresh impurities. I have no means of cleansing myself; no hope that any thing in the creation can do it for me. Deep in my very constitution the stain remains. And I am forced to be crying out—Unclean! unclean! My case would be quite desperate if God himself had not provided a remedy, the report of which has come to mine ears in the gospel. Oh! it is blessed news—I welcome it to my heart—that God has opened a fountain which cleanseth from all sin. He has recommended it to me as having infinite virtue and everlasting efficacy to cleanse. And I have a command from heaven, vile and filthy as I am, to make use of it: for thus it is written—"In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness." When the Holy Spirit enables the sinner to believe the report, and to mix faith with it, then he has a warrant thus to pray—"Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow—Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities—Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." And the Lord hears and answers the prayer in these words—"I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh; and I will put my spirit within you, and I will cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them: I will also save you from all your uncleannesses." The sacrifices from the beginning preached this blessed doctrine: their blood could sanctify by thy divine appointment to the purifying of the flesh: how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, to purify the conscience from dead works to serve the living God! Blessed, for ever blessed, be his grace, who by his offering hath opened a fountain for sin and for uncleanness, in which the most polluted may wash and be clean: for Christ so loved the church, as to give himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with washing of water by the word; that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it might be holy and without blemish: for his blood has infinite virtue to purify the foulest sinner, even so to cleanse him, that he may be perfect for ever: and the great use of faith is to receive it, and to apply it, even as God himself has recommended it; and it has lost none of its virtue. To this very day it purifies as perfectly as ever it did, and believers now in life, and in the hour of death, feel its divine efficacy as truly as the martyred Stephen did. I find a dying Christian thus proclaiming his faith and hope in it, when heart and flesh were failing him: "Am not I, my friends, a monument of God's rich free grace, of his boundless love and mercy in Christ? Oh! most extensive is the efficacy of his precious blood; for it has reached to me, one of the vilest of sinners: Oh! here is boundless goodness, unfathomable love: this blood has washed clean my soul, the seat of defilement, that was as black as hell; purified my conscience, that was darker than the grave, and made it brighter than the light: in a word, this blood will make me, who was vile, most vile, a child of hell, an heir of wrath, holy before God, and fit to live with God and the Lamb, with angels and the spirits of good men made perfect, to all eternity; and in a few minutes my soul shall be made perfect also. Oh! blessed, for ever blessed, be God my Saviour, eternal praises be rendered unto thee." This is true faith, and high honour put upon the blood of Jesus, to seal God's testimony concerning it. He hath set forth Jesus Christ to be a propitiation through faith in his blood. Trusting to it, the foulest sins are washed as white as snow, and crimson sins as the purest wool. So the beloved says to his church —"Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art all fair; there is no spot in thee: thou art all glorious within." No angel can be whiter or purer, or stand more accepted before God, than he does who is washed in the blood of the Lamb. O blessed man, who hast obtained redemption by it! thou art commanded to enter with boldness into the holiest by the blood of Jesus—the way is open; thou art called to draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having thy heart sprinkled from an evil conscience, and thy body washed with pure water, that thou mayst hold thy profession of faith without wavering, as that great multitude did, who washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb: they are now crying with a loud voice, "Salvation to our God, who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever." They triumph indeed; and so mayst thou. Thou hast the same reason as they have. The same fountain, which washed their robes, cleanses thine—the same promises that it will—and thou shalt stand before God without spot of sin unto eternal salvation, as perfect as they. Jesus is thy Saviour, as truly as he is theirs: even to-day, thy conscience purged from guilt and thy heart purified by faith, thou mayst enter within the vail, and make sweet melody in thy heart unto the Lord thy God. Our elder brethren round his throne are employed in the same delightful work: we do it here as well as we can; they in heaven, and we on earth—the same subject in the church below, as well as above, and the same employment. We try to sing the praises of the worthy slaughtered Lamb in as high a note as they do. And when we fail, we try again, praying the Holy Spirit to enable us to keep in tune with them, that our songs may daily be more spiritual and heavenly. A poet of our own, feeling something of this harmony, would have us to celebrate the triumphs of the Lamb of God in these words:—

There is a fountain fill'd with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.

The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day;
And there have I, as vile as he,
Wash'd all my sins away.

Dear dying Lamb! thy precious blood
Shall never lose its power,
Till all the ransom'd church of God
Be saved to sin no more.

E'er since by faith I saw the stream
Thy flowing wounds supply,
Redeeming love has been my theme,
And shall be till I die.

Then in a nobler, sweeter song
I'll sing thy power to save,
When this poor lisping stamm'ring tongue
Lies silent in the grave.

The song of heaven is upon this same subject. The Holy Ghost has taught us the very words of their divine hymn, and what is the harmony of all the redeemed round the throne with one heart and one voice, blessing God and the Lamb. Oh that he may tune our hearts to join the chorus, and fit us now to sing in as high a strain as we can, and every day to aim higher, till we come to the completion of the heavenly vision thus described by the apostle:—

"After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, whom no one could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands: these are they who came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb: therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth upon the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb who is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of water, and shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. And they sang with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God, who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever!—Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen."

CHAPTER V.

The believer's triumph over sin in its guilt.

The forgiveness of sins is the grand doctrine of salvation, on which peace with God is built. Sin is present with the believer, but pardoned. Sin is felt, but ceases to condemn. This is the chief difficulty in experience. How the truth of God, and his holiness, and his threatenings, and the honour of his law can be maintained, and yet he can be faithful and just to forgive us our sins. The believer may be often shaken in his mind, and troubled with legal fears and workings, if he be not so well established by the Spirit and word of God as to submit in his conscience to God's way of pardoning sin: it was always one and the same, contrived and appointed in the everlasting councils of the blessed Trinity, and revealed upon the entrance of sin; viz. that a person in Jehovah would become incarnate, and take away sin by the sacrifice of himself. To him Moses and all the prophets gave witness that, through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins. The proclamation of grace holds it out most clearly. When Moses was permitted to see his glory, the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin." Every sacrifice preached this same truth visibly, showing the death which the sinner deserved, and the divine method of pardoning it, through faith, in the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; for Jesus is the very paschal Lamb who was sacrificed for us: and the deliverance which they experienced in Egypt, through the sprinkling of his blood, we feel the same in our hearts unto this day: through faith they kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them: through the same faith we keep the same feast, and having found redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, we live safe out of the reach of the destroyer. We know our danger as they did, and we look to the Lamb of God for safety. It is the Holy Spirit who convinceth both of sin and of pardon. His conviction of sin makes an impression upon the conscience of its infinite evil. He stops the sinner's mouth, and makes him subscribe to all that is said in scripture of his guilt and of his danger. Looking at himself under the law, and under sin, which is the transgression of the law, he is made to submit to the sentence of condemnation, and has nothing of his own to plead in arrest of judgment. Thus he is taught to think of the law, as God does, both of its precepts and penalties. He sees infinite justice, and holiness, and truth armed against him, and the desert of his sins to be everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, which he has no power to resist, and no means to escape. When the Holy Spirit convinces him of righteousness, and manifests the grace of God, in the free forgiveness of his sins, yet still he feels the exceeding wickedness of them. He loathes and abhors himself, as the subject of them, and groans, being burthened with the abiding sense of his corruptions. At his very best it is—O wretched man! who shall deliver me. &c.—but at the same time he can rejoice in God his Saviour—I thank God through Jesus Christ—He is the propitiation for my sins, and I have found peace with God through faith in his blood. Thus the Holy Spirit glorifies Jesus. He gives a faith steadfast in the atonement of Jesus, and settles such a peace in the conscience, as answers all charges from sin and from unbelief. And hereby he fulfils the proclamation of grace in the New Testament, which agrees exactly with the sentiments of the Old. When our Lord sent out his apostles to preach the gospel to every creature, his commission to them runs in these words: "And Jesus said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." They were to warn sinners of their danger, and to call upon them to look to Jesus, and to him only, for salvation. For he who commandeth all men every where to repent hath exalted Jesus to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance unto his people, and forgiveness of their sins. It is a gift of his royal grace—one of the high honours of his exaltation—that he can freely forgive every iniquity, and transgression, and sin, be they ever so many, or ever so great. For Jesus can take away all iniquity, and receive the sinner graciously.—We, says Peter, are witnesses of these things: and so also is the Holy Ghost; whom God hath given to them that obey him—that come at his call in the gospel, and obey it: the Holy Ghost, turning them from self to Christ, from sin to righteousness, from a life of sense to a life of faith, thereby witnesses their true conversion, which is a continual work of his grace in that repentance which is not to be repented of; and when he enables them to glorify God for this mercy, he gives great joy and peace in believing the forgiveness of their sins, according to the commission which our Lord gave to St. Paul at his conversion: "I send thee to the Gentiles, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith that is in me." When this commission is opened to a sinner in his name, and credited by the power of his Spirit, then the conscience is purged from guilt, by that one offering which perfecteth for ever. The believer in it has a clean heart given him. It is sanctified, and made a temple for the worship of the true God. To this the word witnesses—And the Holy Ghost is also a witness to him, that he may now enter with boldness into the holiest of all by the blood of Jesus—Every possible hindrance being removed, he may have access with confidence to the throne of grace—to a Father of mercies, loving him, and blessing him with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. When he lives up to these privileges, then he feels as he ought to do. His faith relying steadfastly upon the divine promises, and giving full credit to a faithful God, he has a good conscience purged from dead works to serve the living God, and, his heart consecrated for this service, he may sing of pardon and peace in as high a note of praise, and with as much spiritual joy, as ever any believer experienced. They had much in the Old Testament, when they sang the triumphs of the Lamb of God, in the twentieth Psalm: the argument of which is thus given us in Bishop Horne's Comment. "1—4. The church prayeth for the prosperity of King Messiah going forth to the battle as her champion and deliverer, for his acceptance by the Father, and for the accomplishment of his will;—5, 6, 7. She declareth her full assurance of faith, and her resolution to trust in him alone, and not in the arm of flesh;—8. She foreseeth the fall of her enemies, and her own exaltation; and 9. concludeth with a prayer to the God of her strength." As long as the temple stood, and the service of God was regularly carried on in it, the true worshippers had every day a solemn commemoration of that sacrifice which was to put away their sins. They were taught to look to that precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, whom God hath set forth in every sacrifice to be the great propitiation and atonement, through which alone they were to expect pardon and peace. While the lamb was burning on the altar, every morning and evening, they celebrated his praises with the choicest instruments of music, and with the sweetest voices, making also melody in their hearts at the same time unto the Lord. Among other hymns given by inspiration of God for this joyful occasion, they used to sing the twentieth Psalm, in which they triumphed in the God of their salvation, and declared their faith and hope in him in full concert, after this manner:—

"Jehovah will hear thee: in the day of trouble the name of the God of Jacob will defend thee: he will send thee help from his sanctuary, and he will strengthen thee out of Sion: he will grant thee according to thy heart, and he will fulfil all thy purposes: then we shall shout for joy in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we shall set up our banners, when Jehovah shall fulfil all thy requests. Now I have known that Jehovah will help the Messiah, his Christ, and will answer him from his sanctuary with the mighty power of the right hand of Jesus. Some put their trust in chariots, and others in horses; but we will cause the name of Jehovah our Alehim (the Trinity in covenant) to be remembered: they are brought down and fallen; but we are risen, and made still to stand safe; for the king (Jesus) will put forth his power to save us: he will answer us in the day when we pray unto him."

These are the words of the hymn, in which they express their faith in the future triumphs of the Lamb of God, and their hope in that one offering of his which was to perfect them for ever. The divine appointment, the divine acceptance, the divine application of his sacrifice, is the most noble subject that could be sung upon earth: indeed it is the subject of heaven, and will be the harmony and concert of eternity. May the Holy Ghost put our hearts in tune to join in it, and to adore and bless the Lamb that was slain, setting up our banners as they did, Rom. viii. 31, 32, 33, 34, conquerors over sin and Satan, and all their enemies. We have the same Jesus to rejoice in, and as good reason as ever believers had to rejoice in him with a fulness of joy. When the heart feels as happy as it can be here in God the Saviour, these are some of the delightful exercises of faith in his blood:—

Oh what am I, that such a sinner as I am should be thus highly favoured? A child of wrath by nature, even as others, and by practice—having sinned long with greediness—against light and conviction—sinning and sorrowing—sorrowing and sinning from year to year—a slave to the lust of the flesh, to the lust of the eyes, and to the pride of life, every moment fit and ripe for hell. Oh what a monument of infinite patience and long-suffering!—spared from day to day, and at last called to the saving knowledge of Jesus. Oh what exceeding riches of grace are these—that the Father would choose me in the Beloved, and give him to save me from sin and misery, that he would send his Spirit to quicken me, and to enable me to believe that there was mercy in Jesus for me, even for me, and plenteous redemption! What sinners can be more indebted than I am for such miracles of grace? Glory be to God in the highest! My Lord Jesus, the great God and my Saviour, gave himself for me, that he might redeem me from all iniquity, and might cleanse me from all sin: trusting to his atonement, and to his righteousness, I am led to admire the Father's full absolution: "Thy sins and thine iniquities I will remember no more." Thanks be to him for this unspeakable gift. He has pronounced them blessed, and he has caused me to feel some of their blessedness, whose iniquities he has forgiven, and whose sin he has covered; and therefore I look forward with thankfulness to the great day of redemption, when Jesus will present me to himself, holy and without blemish, as if I had never sinned. In this hope of salvation I triumph before God. Now I see the felicity of thy chosen—I rejoice in the gladness of thy people—and I glory with thine inheritance. Unto him who chose me in his Son—unto him who loved me and washed me from my sins in his own blood—unto him who gave me this faith and keeps me in it, for this fellowship with the eternal Three—be eternal praise. Amen.

CHAPTER VI.

The believer's victory over the dominion of sin.

We have heard from scripture some of the victories of faith over sin in its pollution and in its guilt; but there is still a hard warfare to be maintained against its dominion; for it reigneth absolutely in the children of disobedience, and it never ceaseth to strive for mastery in the children of God, who have an evil nature still—an old man, who is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and who is to be put off every day—denied in his desires—mortified in his affections, and crucified in his appetites. Thus the commandment runs: "Mortify therefore your members which are upon earth." And the new man, who is called to this warfare, is ordered to make use of Christ's fulness for promised courage, and strength, and victory; for without Christ he can do nothing. Sin is himself—he is a body of sin—and he has not only to fight against himself, but also against principalities and powers, hosts of foes, united under the banner of the god of this world, trying all their cunning, and all their force to bring the believer back into the bondage of corruption; and what he has of his own is on their side. His worst foe is his indwelling sin, which has a complete body with all its members and lusts, always enticing to something unlawful, and tempting to the commission of it. Every faculty is ready to become an instrument of unrighteousness unto sin. It is an absolute tyrant, who rules his slaves with the most cruel rigour, keeping them captive to his will, although nothing but destruction and misery be in their ways.

Thus original sin is described in the ninth article of our church—it is the fault and corruption of every man born of Adam; and notwithstanding it still remaineth in the regenerate, yet there is a promise of daily and of complete victory over the tyrant. Thus it is written, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, because ye are not under the law, but under grace." Once sin had full dominion, but it is taken away by the Spirit of Christ; not entirely destroyed, as to its being, but as to its ruling power—dethroned in the judgment; there seen as it is, exceeding sinful, exceeding dangerous—dethroned in the conscience; the believer no longer under the law, but under grace, is freed from condemnation—dethroned in the will; not my will, Lord, but thine be done—dethroned in the heart; I hate all evil thoughts, but thy law do I love! oh what love have I unto thy law;—dethroned in the life; crucified with its affections and lusts, by the power of the cross of Jesus. It is not quite dead, but it is put to a lingering death, kept upon the cross, dying daily. And thus the sin which is pardoned through the blood of Christ is conquered by the arm of Christ, as it is written, "He will subdue our iniquities;" and faith in his promised help keeps them under, subdues them effectually, so that they do not reign in the mortal body to obey them in the lusts thereof. Take an instance of this triumphant faith. Whatever the natural man can set his heart upon, or seek his happiness in—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, or the pride of life—Moses was enabled by the Spirit of Christ to overcome: "By faith, Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward." What but almighty grace could have given him such a complete victory? He gained entire dominion over sin, even when it came to tempt him with all the pleasures, and riches, and honours of the world. He was made strong in faith: Christ, ruling in his heart, brought every high thought into subjection to himself: so that Moses not only resigned all his temporal advantages for Christ's sake, but what natural men account a great paradox, he chose reproach, poverty, misery, rather than give up his interest in Christ. This is the victory which still overcometh the world, even our faith; for the New Testament furnishes us with such another instance of Christian heroism in the apostle of the Gentiles: his giving an account of his own experience, and by what means he was now no longer under the law but under grace—a sinner saved from the sentence of the broken law, and from all hope of being made righteous by his own personal keeping of it—"I, through that law," says he, "am dead to the law, that I might live unto God," &c. Once he was alive without the law—when he thought proudly of his own good life, that, concerning the law he was blameless—but when the commandment came in the power of the Spirit, then it slew him, and killed all his former legal hopes. What he had trusted in before for life, he now found to be unto death; and Christ, faith in Christ, was the only means by which he saw he could live unto God, by his grace and to his glory. By this faith he then experienced the power of the crucified and risen Jesus: I am in Christ, says he, crucified with him, truly and spiritually dead to sin, to self, to the world, by the virtue of his cross: nevertheless, by the same faith in the same Jesus, I live; the Spirit of life in him has quickened my spirit: he has given me a new birth into the spiritual world, and has brought me to live upon the fulness of Jesus, as really now by faith, as I hope to live upon him by sense in heaven; "Yet not I;" I neither had it of myself, nor do I continue it by any act of my own, "but Christ liveth in me: and although I seem to live outwardly like other men, yet the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God," depending upon him every moment for fresh supplies of his Spirit, to keep me in union and communion with the Father and the Son; and thereby he gives me to feel in my heart some of the blessings of that love of God in Christ which surpasseth knowledge. It is this that purifies my soul, and sanctifies my life: blessed, for ever blessed be his name, who thus loved me, and gave himself for me.

Such were the heroes of Christianity: they fought the Lord's battles, and in the power of his might they subdued sin: they obtained dominion over it through faith in Jesus. And the same faith in the same Jesus is still mighty through him to obtain as great victories. The truth of his promise, the faithfulness of the promiser, the strength of his arm to fulfil his promise; these did not fail Moses, nor Paul—never did, never can, fail any believer. Thus speaketh the Lord unto them: Sin shall not have dominion over you; having pardoned it by my blood. I will subdue it by my Spirit: trust me, you shall find strong faith an overmatch for strong sin; because it fights in the strength of Jesus, to whom all things are possible, and who must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. And sin and death shall be no more. Say, it is a besetting sin: this only gives more employment for faith, and for the power of Jesus. It may be a sin of constitution, breaking out into wrath and passion, that the man has no government of himself; but the Spirit of Christ can make him a new creature, and can enable him to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. It may be a long habit of sin: but is any thing too hard for the Lord? Has he not promised —"A new heart will I give you, and I will put my Spirit within you, and I will cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my commandments and practise them." Wherever grace reigns, this scripture is fulfilled. The armies of the Lord of Hosts fight under his banner, and no weapon formed against them can prosper: kept by his mighty power, they are daily more than conquerors, marching on triumphant over all opposition; for he enables them to hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of hope firm unto the end. Thus they were commanded to pray: "Order my steps, O Lord, according to thy word, and let not any iniquity have dominion over me." They looked to his word, and to his arm, for the right ordering of their steps, believing that he would keep the steps of his saints, and sin should not have dominion over them; now they were no longer under the law, but under the kingdom of his grace. The victory which he had promised, they expected; and he did put forth his power, according to that good word wherein he had caused them to place their trust. They found his grace sufficient to subdue the tyranny of iniquity; yea, where sin had abounded, grace did much more abound in daily victory over its wiles, and its assaults: and the power of Christ resting upon them, they were kept in this spirit of prayer.

O thou God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! strengthen me mightily by thy Spirit in the inner man, that Christ may dwell in my heart by faith, and I may have his strength to set against the power of my sins and mine enemies. For orders, for courage, for perseverance, for victory, for eternal triumph, I look unto thee for all. Blessed be thy name, that thou hast chosen me to be a soldier, and to fight under the banner of Jesus. I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously. He made all mine enemies his own; and they are now under his feet; and I believe, according to thy good word, that thou wilt put them under mine. Thou hast conquered them for me, and hast engaged to conquer them in me, and by me. It is of thy mere grace, almighty Jesus, that I am enabled to deny myself, to take up my cross, and to follow thee in this holy war. All my sufficiency is from the fresh supplies of thy Spirit. Oh grant me then abundantly to the increase of my faith, and to the praise of thy promised help. Cause me to depend every moment upon it; let me experience that when I am weakest in myself, I may be made strongest in the Lord. And when I have nothing left me to glory in of mine own, then my soul may magnify the Lord, and my spirit may rejoice in God my Saviour. Behold, God is my salvation: I will trust and not be afraid, because the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song: He also is become my salvation. To his grace and power be all the glory for ever and ever. Amen and Amen.

The believer's triumph over his troubles.

After sin is pardoned, and the pardoned sinner is enabled to fight the good fight of faith against it, yet there is another enemy assaulting him to the last moment of his life. Fallen man is born to trouble. The man in Christ is so far from being exempt, that many are the troubles of the righteous. He is, in common with others, liable to pain and poverty, and to afflictions of every kind: He is by his very profession exposed to some of the most trying nature—his owning Christ—his following Christ—his conformity to Christ—give offence, provoke the malice of wicked men, and the rage of wicked spirits. Wave does not follow wave more certainly than every day brings its fresh troubles, and forces the believer to seek for aids and comforts out of himself. This is a sore fight of afflictions. To bear up under them with any patience, and to reap profit from them, is a task above the power of mere man. Every little pain stirs up murmuring and impatience; and this rebellion against God's will is the parent of a thousand fretful tempers: and these, exercised by sharp suffering, render the man truly miserable. If his suffering continues long, increases much, it often drives the poor sinner to despair; and if he has no Saviour to flee unto, he is sometimes guilty of self-murder, and dies in the act of sin, rushing headlong into everlasting destruction—the wisdom of man, of Cato himself, furnishing no better remedy against the numerous evils of human life.

To man thus exposed to suffering, and helpless under it, his suffering remaining as long as sin remains, how necessary must be the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ! He has vouchsafed to give us his promises of help, suited to every possible case of distress. When it is his will that any of his people should be tried, he engages to make the trial of their faith much more precious than that of gold, which perisheth. He is with them, present with his divine supports and holy comforts. "Call upon me," says he, "in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me: Many are the troubles of the righteous; but out of them all the Lord delivereth them." They acknowledge it with gratitude; "God was our refuge and strength; we have found him a very present help in trouble;" helping us to bear up under the heaviest pressures, keeping his everlasting arms underneath us, as long as we suffer, and, if the sufferings increase, increasing our faith and patience until they have done their perfect work.

When, through the aids of his Spirit, these promises have their full credit, through his inward peace, which he alone can give, and which the world cannot take away—when he makes the heart to feel happy in God, enjoying the peculiar supports of the gospel, and living up to its privileges—then the believer finds the apostle's experience to be true—"always sorrowful, yet always rejoicing," and sometimes with a fulness of joy, according to what is written: "But now, thus saith the Lord, that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not; for I have redeemed thee; I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flames kindle upon thee: for I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour: Fear not: for I am with thee," to support, to deliver. This is spoken to the redeemed, who are God's property, and whom he bought with a great price. What could the Lord God engage to do for them more than is here promised, in order to still all their guilty fears, and to quiet all their natural fears? Trusting to the redemption that is in the blood of the Lamb, they are under his keeping; they go out in his strength to meet their trials and their enemies. Jesus is with them on their side; and therefore, believing in him, they need not fear any suffering. Jehovah is their Alehim, their covenant God in Trinity, their sworn allies, engaged by his almighty arm to save them from all evil, and to give them all possible good. "I the Lord," says he, "do keep thee—I will water thee with the dew of heaven every moment—lest any hurt thee, I will keep thee night and day." Having such great and exceeding precious promises, with what holy courage should the believer look up to a faithful God! and what strong consolation should they afford him when he is to go through the fire or through the water! He may sing with Jonah, "I will sacrifice unto thee with the voice of thanksgiving—salvation is of the Lord." Or with the triumphant faith of the three children who were not afraid to go into the furnace, heated seven times hotter than usual, fully persuaded that, whether they lived or died, Jesus would be with them. Threatened with the burning fiery furnace if they refused to worship Nebuchadnezzar's image, "They said, O king, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter; if it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thy hand, O king." And he did; he went with them into the fire, and they walked in the midst of the flames unhurt. The same Jesus is daily repeating the same miracle. He has approved himself in all ages to be the friend of his afflicted people. Whatever he sends to them, he sends it with his blessing. So they testify—"We know that ALL things work together for good to them that love God." They knew it by his promise, and they felt it by experience: it is good for us that we have been in trouble: we have gone through many seas and storms of afflictions, and through the raging fire of persecution, not only unhurt, but benefited: for Christ was with us. As the sufferings of Christ abounded, so our consolation abounded by Christ: he feels for them as his members, and has bowels of the tenderest compassion. In all their affliction he is afflicted. He brings in his supports, and comes with his deliverance in the best time. He leaves no accusation of sin in the conscience, but gives and maintains a sweet peace with God. Oh what matter of triumph is it, when this peace rules in the heart! always, and by all means testifying—"Since God is for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again; who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." Thanks without ceasing be to Jesus, the Lamb that was slain, for this complete and eternal victory over sin. The apostle carries on his praises, Rom. viii., that through Jesus all outward opposition shall fall before us—"Who shall separate us from Christ's love to us? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, for thy sake we are killed all the day long, we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter: nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that hath loved us." His love is in them all—appoints them, sends them, proportions them; and they conquer them all in his strength; not only conquer, but are more than conquerors: they are great gainers: they gain, what is better than all the world, fresh proof of his love; they gain experience of it: for they find that nothing can hurt them now he has taken them under his protection. For this his divine support we are taught to pray daily, asking it as a matter of mere favour, and expecting it only through the grace and intercession of our great High Priest:—

We humbly beseech thee, O Father, mercifully to look upon our infirmities, and for the glory of thy name turn from us all those evils which we most righteously have deserved; and grant that in all our troubles we may put our whole trust and confidence in thy mercy, and evermore serve thee in holiness and pureness of living, to thy honour and glory, through our only mediator and advocate Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

When this is the prayer of faith, outward trials become inward mercies: for the Holy Spirit keeps the heart settled with its whole trust and confidence upon his promised help; so that if the trials increase, he makes them redound to the glory of God. If the outward man be a greater sufferer, even ready to perish, he renews the inward man day by day. He brings in abundant grace to sanctify abundant sufferings: whereby he satisfies the hearts of the sufferers, that these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, will work for them a far more excellent and eternal weight of glory. The hope of this keeps them patient and thankful. By the power of the Holy Ghost they know this eternal triumph will be soon. Yet a very, very little while they will be favoured with the sight of the King in his beauty: they shall sit down with him in his throne, and shall reign with him for ever and ever.

For the further confirmation of our faith, he has set before us a cloud of witnesses, who testify, with one voice, that he sanctified all their troubles, and turned them into covenant blessings. So one of them said—"I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth: my soul shall make her boast in the Lord; the humble shall hear thereof and be glad: O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together: I sought the Lord, and he heard and delivered me from all my fears. The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles." Their very troubles become matter of triumph. He shut them up in the ark, and they were saved, when he drowned the world of the ungodly. Peter, speaking from experience, says, the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of their troubles, as he did righteous Lot, when he overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. The more the Egyptians oppressed his people, the more they multiplied and grew. Behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. The fire of persecution raged against the church, but the blood of the martyrs was fruitful, and increased it both in number and in grace. The seed of the wicked one have been at enmity with the children of the promise from the beginning; but these trusted in the Captain of their salvation, and he led them on conquering and to conquer: "Through faith they subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens, women received their dead raised to life again, and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." These and the other worthies mentioned, Hebrews, chap. xi. did wonders through Christ, who strengthened them: they loved not their lives unto death, fully persuaded that when he should call them to it he would be with them, and would enable them to finish their course with joy: and he did; for they all obtained a good report through faith, leaving us an example to follow the steps of their faith, and encouraging us to do it with holy boldness, whatever troubles we meet with in our way. We may, we ought to rejoice in tribulation; for we have the same Jesus to look unto, the author and the finisher of their faith and ours, the same promises of his support, the same almighty arm to make them good, and the same matter of triumph, which they experienced, whom he led on from strength to strength, until every one of them in Sion appeared before God. This is the certain heritage of the servants of the Lord; and their righteousness and salvation is of me, saith the Lord.

Of the same sentiments were our reformers, which they give us in these remarkable words in one of their prayers: O God, who art the author of peace and lover of concord, in knowledge of whom standeth our eternal life, whose service is perfect freedom, defend us thy humble servants in all assaults of our enemies, that we, surely trusting in thy defence, may not fear the power of any adversaries, through the might of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

And to the same purpose, in one of their homilies, they thus express themselves: All correction which God sendeth us, in this present time, seemeth to have no joy and comfort, but sorrow and pain; yet it bringeth with it a taste of God's mercy, and goodness towards them that be so corrected, and a sure hope of God's everlasting consolation in heaven. If, then, these sorrows, diseases, and sicknesses, and also death itself, be nothing else but our heavenly Father's rod, whereby he certifieth us of his love and gracious favour, whereby he trieth and purifieth us, whereby he giveth unto us holiness and certifieth us that we be his children, and he our merciful Father; shall we not, then, with all humility, as obedient and loving children, joyfully kiss our heavenly Father's rod, and ever say in our heart, with our Saviour Jesus Christ, "Father, if this anguish and sorrow which I feel, and death which I see approach, may not pass, but that thy will is that I must suffer them, thy will be done."

O thou hope of Israel! the Saviour thereof in the time of trouble! I acknowledge my reluctance to take up thy cross, and my weakness in bearing it: hold thou me up by fresh supplies of thy Spirit, that I may be safe: let thy strength be perfected in my weakness. Thy promises of help are exceeding great: through thee I do believe the truth of them; and I pray for grace to make a right use of them. Enable me in patience to possess my soul, that when it is thy will to try my faith, I may live up to my privileges, and may find it better to suffer with Christ than to reign with the world. O Lord, thou hast showed this favour to Moses: and thou hast done more than this—thou hast made thy witnesses glorify thee in the fires—they have marched on, fighting thy battles against hosts of foes, and they did not account their lives dear to themselves, so they might finish their course with joy, and die in faith, blessing and praising thy holy name. O thou faithful God! thou art the same to us now, as thou wast to them. Lead me on, then, in thy strength, trusting in thy word, and leaning on thine arm. Thou hast promised thy flock; and I hope I am one of them—"My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." O thou good Shepherd! let me trust in thy love, and feel thy supports, that, whatever lies before me to be done or suffered, I may be enabled to do it and to suffer it by the continual supplies of thy Spirit. And by his influence help me to persevere, till I win the prize of my high calling, and be admitted to join that great company whom no one can number, who stand before the throne of God and the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands: these are they who came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb: therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth upon the throne shall dwell among them; they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun smite them, nor any heat: for the Lamb who is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them into living fountains of water; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. O my Jesus! I bless thee for this most glorious prospect: it is of thy mere grace that I am in any measure enabled to join that great company: it is entirely of thy special favour that I have any good hope to come to their glory: for this, and for all thy mercies, to thee, with the Father, and the eternal Spirit, the three in one Jehovah, I give honour, and glory, and thanks, to-day, and I hope to do it without ceasing for ever and ever. Amen and Amen.

CHAPTER VIII.

The believer's triumph over the infirmities of old age.

It is appointed unto all men once to die. The time is fixed by an immutable decree. The days of our years are threescore years and ten, and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away. If some be permitted to live longer, yet the infirmities of old age must arrive, bringing with them labour and sorrow, the forerunners of death; circulation will become languid; the senses of the body will grow dull and heavy; the faculties of the mind will be impaired, and will discover it by not remembering proper names. In this decline of life believers are subject to the same infirmities with other men: they have no exemption from pain, or sickness, or death; but they have that which keeps up their spirits, and makes them patient and joyful. The consolations of God are then most needed: and he has promised them, and he is faithful: he never failed them who trusted in him. He has suited his promises to all the infirmities of age. He knows our frame perfectly, and has described it with an unerring pen, Ecclesiastes, chap. xii., that when we feel the signs of old age, we may apply to him for grace to profit by them. The symptoms there given are infallibly true and just, and are as so many monitors, warning the man that the vigour of life is declining, and that the body is returning to the earth from whence it came. Happy is he who takes this warning, and remembers his Creator in the days of his youth, before the wearisome days come, of weakness and pain. He has fled to Jesus for refuge—and finds and experiences what he has engaged to do for his people, when heart and flesh begin to fail them. Blessed be his grace for the abundant provision which he has made for their faith and patience: he says to them, "I will be with you; I will never leave you, nor forsake you: so that you may boldly say, The Lord is our helper, and we need not fear what the infirmities of age can do unto us." One of them, the Christian hero, thus encouraged himself in the Lord his God—"Thou art my hope, O Lord God; thou art my trust even from my youth: by thee have I been holden up from the womb: thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels: my praise shall be continually of thee—I am a wonder unto many; but thou art my strong refuge." This was his trust: and God did not forsake him. He remembered his word unto his servant, wherein he had caused him to depend. There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto him. O what great encouragement have believers to follow the steps of his faith! for his God is their God; the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, to young and old, who put their trust in him. His promise to the Israel of God cannot be broken. Thus he pledges his word of truth to them, giving them a warrant to pray unto him—"My mouth shall be filled with thy praise, and with thy honour all the day long: for thou wilt not cast me off in the time of old age; thou wilt not forsake me when my strength faileth." To this prayer the Lord inclined his ear, and vouchsafed this gracious answer: "Hearken unto me, O house of Jacob, and all the remnant of the house of Israel, which are borne by me from the belly, which are carried from the womb, and even to your old age, I am he, and even to hoary hairs will I carry you; I have made and I will bear you; even I will carry, and I will deliver you." These are some of his rich cordials for the aged: he provided them in his love, and he is sensibly touched with the feeling of their infirmities, in administering them; for he himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses. His compassions bind him to comfort and relieve his old disciples: and when they apply to him in the time of need, he is ever present to grant them his promised help; yea, so suited to their case, as to make them grow in grace, as they grow in years. They bring forth fruit in their old age, the rich fruit of humility, and the ripe fruit of thankfulness—fruit that endureth unto everlasting life. We have a happy instance of this in God's goodness to an ancient believer, who lived to be a hundred and seventy-five years old. He was the friend of God, who had blessed Abraham through life, and that in all things, and who even to hoary hairs loaded him with blessings. For God had promised him, "Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age:" and the sacred historian, relating the fulfilling of the promise, says, "He gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years, and was gathered to his people." His old age was good, in body and soul. Whatever infirmities he had, they were intended for good, and actually did him good. He was a very cheerful, pleasant old man. The peace of his mind had a sweet influence on his temper and behaviour. It kept him from being fretful and peevish in his family.

He was loving to his children, and kind to his servants; God himself being witness. He was also happy in his last years; for he spent them in faith; and when they came to an end, he died in peace; with his last breath he committed his spirit into the hands of him who had redeemed it, full of years: it is in the original one word—he was satisfied: so it is rendered, Psalm xvii. 15, "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake up after thy likeness." He was satisfied with what he had enjoyed of the favour and friendship of his God; who had been his shield to defend him from all sins and enemies, and also had promised to be his exceeding great reward: this he obtained, when he was gathered to his people, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, and to the most blissful communion of the Three in Jehovah. All the children of faithful Abraham, treading in the steps of his faith, have the same God to deal with, who keepeth promise for ever. It is recorded of Isaac, the heir of the same promise with his father, that he died in the same faith, an old man. He was tried with many infirmities; but we read of no complaints, though he was a hundred and eighty years of age. He expired in praise and thankfulness, satisfied with life, and happy in the prospect beyond death. And his son Jacob, a hundred and forty-seven years old, when he was dying, declared that he had waited for the salvation of God: waiting faith is strong faith: and after he had blessed his children, and had given commandment concerning his bones, he quietly, as if he had been going to sleep, gathered up his feet into the bed, and died in peace, an old man, and satisfied. All these lived in the world, strangers and pilgrims, looking for a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God: and they were not disappointed of their hope—they all died in faith—in an act of faith; and were gathered to their people—to the general assembly and church of the first-born. When they came to the end of their faith, they came to heaven. The moment they expired, they entered the city which God had prepared for them: and their bodies, sleeping in the dust, are in the covenant of life, and shall be raised and glorified in the morning of the resurrection: for our Lord proves that the dead shall rise, from this very circumstance: he says to the Jews—"Have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living." In this faith the patriarchs died: being children of the resurrection, they left their bodies in the hand and care of a covenant God, well assured that he would raise them up to glory and life everlasting, according to that good word wherein he had caused them to put their trust.

These examples of the loving-kindness of God to his aged servants were recorded for our learning, that believers, if God by his providence should bring them to old age, might be encouraged to trust in the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with such a confidence of their hearts as not to doubt of the divine truth, or of the divine power. Whatever he was to them, he is the same to us—our God as well as theirs—our covenant God engaged to glorify both body and soul; on whom we are commanded to cast all our cares and concerns in extreme old age. If what is of nature be failing, what is of grace cannot. If the life of sense be dying, the life of faith should flourish the more: it is a life that cannot die; for the branches thrive and bring forth fruit in their old age, not of themselves, but because they are ingrafted into the heavenly vine, in which they live for ever. "I am the vine," says Jesus, "ye are the branches; he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing." But, through my Spirit strengthening you, he will make you bud and flourish, and fill the face of the world with fruit. He will so fill you with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Christ Jesus, to the glory and praise of God, that your last days shall be your best days.

In this view of old age, it may become a favourable time for exercising and improving faith; because the activity of the life of sense is abating, and thereby many things are removed, which before obstructed the growth of the spiritual life. Now is the time to learn to walk by faith, and not by sense. A believer, young in years and young in experience, is often tempted to judge of himself by his feelings more than by the word of God. In a good frame, he is a good believer. Then all is well with him. But when he is walking in darkness, he is very apt to question his state—If all be right with me, why am I thus? My present frame is very dull and uncomfortable—I am not so lively as I used to be in prayer or in ordinances—my delight in God, and the things of God, is far short of what it was formerly—perhaps I have been deceiving myself, and crying Peace, peace, when there was no peace for me.

From this temptation age itself is a sort of deliverance: self-activity is weakened, and thereby, through grace, self-dependence. The believer, if he be a good scholar, will now learn to walk more by faith, and less by sight. The vigour of his senses is decaying. The high spirits of youth are abating. His present lesson is very plain and simple; and while he attends to what is passing in him, and about him, he has a thousand monitors, calling upon him now to learn and practise a perfect dependence on those things which are always one and the same, without any variableness, or the least shadow of turning. One record of God. One Saviour. One Spirit. One faith, of which the Saviour is the author and the finisher. This faith is made to grow and flourish, as there is less dependence on other things: and as age itself tends to weaken this dependence, it becomes, in the hand of the Holy Spirit, a favourable time to live less upon the things which are seen, and more upon the things which are not seen. Less of sense, more of faith. One scale rises as the other falls. The outward man dying, the inward man grows more lively—yea, grows up into Christ Jesus, and that in all things. O blessed old man! thou hast lived to a good time when this is thy experience; when in the prayer of faith thou canst cast all thy burdens on thy Saviour: "Lord, keep me, a poor helpless creature—now I feel that, of myself, I can do nothing as I ought, or as I wish to do—Glorify thy grace in me, and strengthen me mightily by thy Spirit in the inner man, that I may bless thee for thy salvation, and for things which accompany salvation. Into thy faithful hands, for life and death, I commit myself and all my concerns; for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth."

But it must be remembered, that old age does not produce these happy effects of itself. It is not of nature, but entirely of grace, that any one is able to gain such spiritual profit from bodily infirmities. The mere natural man, fortify him with all his boasted aids of reason and philosophy, yet he cannot help murmuring when age brings weakness, and sickness brings pains. He becomes peevish and fretful. Having no friendship with God, he cannot look up for divine supports when all human begin to fail him. Under a severe fit of the stone, or a long fit of the gout, he is often out of all patience. Uneasy in himself, he is out of humour with every body and every thing. How different is the believer in the same circumstances! His body feels pain as others do; but his mind is comfortable and at ease. Happy in God, he has patience given him to bear his sufferings, and grace to profit from them; yea, the peace of God rules in his heart always, and by all means.

An old man with this peace, which surpasseth all understanding, ruling in his heart, will be so far from complaining, that he has every thing to be thankful for which can render him blessed of the Lord. He is provided with an infallible antidote against all that old age can try him with:—It is true, I have an infirm body, but, thank God, I have a sound mind: age has brought upon me great weakness; but this makes more room for the power of God, that it may be perfected in my weakness. I have many pains, but not so many as he has comforts to give me: in the worst of them he keeps me patient. Father, thy will be done—I have an afflicted body, but I have a happy heart: although the outward man be perishing, yet I faint not, because the inward man is renewed day by day—My supports are great, the consolations of God not a few—I feel the symptoms of old age warning me daily of my approaching dissolution; through grace I take the warning—they find me living, and I hope they will find me dying, in the faith of the Son of God. The earthly tabernacle is taking down; but he does it with much tenderness and love, and assures me that he has prepared for me a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. May he who keeps it for me, and me for it, never leave me nor forsake me, till I be with him, where he is, and be like him, and enjoy him for ever and ever! Yet a very, very little while —hold on faith and patience, and I shall see Jesus in his glory, which is the heaven of heavens.

O thou merciful and faithful high priest, Jesus Christ, I bless thee for thy kind promises to the aged. Thou hast suited them in great mercy to all their infirmities, and thou art always with them to help in time of need. I begin to feel the sad effects of sin in my body, weakening it, and tending to bring it down to its appointed end. To thee I look, almighty Jesus! for thy promised grace. Oh grant me constant supplies of thy Spirit, that I may profit by my infirmities, may exercise and improve my faith in thee, that they may keep me humble, and I may pray more in faith, and keep me thankful, that I may be more in praise. Thine arm is not shortened, nor can thy compassion fail. Stand by me then, and hold me up according to thy word. Make me strong in thy strength, that I may daily put more honour upon thy love and thy power. In the decline of life, let me not doubt of thy faithfulness to support, and, when thou seest it best, to comfort me. Vouchsafe me the consolations of God, when my heart and my flesh fail me: then be thou the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever. When I am weakest in myself, then make me strongest in the Lord; and if it be thy holy will that I should become quite helpless, an infant again, make me lie quiet in thy hand, without murmuring or repining, but believing that thou art all my salvation, and enjoying in thee all my desire. Grant me this, Lord Jesus; for thy mercies' sake, let me die in faith. Amen and Amen.

CHAPTER IX.

Man consists of two parts—a body and a soul. The bodily life is dependent on the light and air of this world, and on the circulation which they maintain and carry on. When this connexion is broken, the body expires, it loses all sense and motion, and is dead. So the life of the soul is dependent on the light and air of the spiritual world. Jehovah in Trinity is the Creator, the only fountain of being; and there can be nothing independent of him: Christ is the light, and the Holy Spirit is the breath or air of all spiritual life; and when this connexion is broken, although the soul may exist, yet its happiness in God is broken, and at an end. Sin, that great murderer, sin, brought death upon body and soul: "For as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned:" and we read, The soul that sinneth, it shall die; sin separating it from its union, and thereby cutting it off from its communion with the Father of spirits. In the moment that Adam sinned, the spiritual death took place; for he had lost the spirit of life, and was dead in trespasses and sins: and that same moment his body became mortal, although he lived nine hundred years after. Thus we have sin, and death, and misery, entailed upon all his descendants, from the first Adam, who is of the earth, earthy. Oh how precious to a sinner in these circumstances should be the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, who stands at the head of thy spiritual world, that he may give his righteousness, and his life, and his happiness, to all that believe in him! He comes Jehovah of hosts in our nature, as our champion to fight our battles, and to conquer all our foes. Immanuel was made sin for us, and he died for our sins according to the scriptures, when the Lord laid upon him the iniquity of us all, and was buried and rose again the third day, according to the scriptures. We read therein of his noble challenge to death and the grave: "I will ransom my people from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death—O death, I will be thy plague—O grave, I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from mine eyes." It was the Captain of our salvation, the Lord of hosts is his name, who purposed this in the everlasting councils, and in due time fulfilled it by his almighty power "Because the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him who had the power of death, that is the devil, and might deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Oh what infinite condescension is this! what love, surpassing all knowledge! the most high God is manifest in the flesh, that, as God in our nature, he might be our surety to act and suffer for us men, and for our salvation. Accordingly he takes our sins upon himself, bears the guilt and punishment of them in his own body and soul upon the tree, gives his own life a ransom for ours, that by his death we might live. He was buried, but he rose again the third day, having loosed the bonds of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. In this conflict with death and the grave, repentance was hid from his eyes. He knew what he was to go through, more than any of us can conceive of pain and agony, yet he would not change his purpose of grace, although he was to become obedient unto death, the most tormenting, the most shameful, even the death of the cross. His enemies having brought him to the grave and the sealed sepulchre, seemed then to have him in their power. So they thought: but here Jesus made his complete and eternal triumph. By his resurrection he swallowed up death in victory; for he did not rise as a private person, but as the first-fruits of the dead, drawing the joyful harvest after him. The Lord is risen indeed, the head of the body, the church, and has the power of an endless life to quicken all his members. In which most glorious prospect, the apostle, quoting the passage above mentioned, breaks out into these raptures of joy, seeing all his enemies vanquished, and nothing but bliss and glory before him—"O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." The law armed death with its sting, as the just wages of the transgression of the law: but Jesus, our surety, magnified the law by his holy life in all its precepts, and by his death in all its penalties. He died for our sins, and by his rising from the dead, he demonstrated that he had taken out its sting, and had disarmed it of its power to hurt; nay, had done much more—he had changed death unto life. "I am the resurrection and the life," saith the Lord; "he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." By faith in him we share in the triumph and glory of his resurrection, and have a new song put into our mouths, with which we may make the sweetest melody in our hearts, even when our breath is failing us: "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

These are scripture views of the almighty Jesus. Out of his infinite compassion he undertook to save his people from sin and death, the works of the devil. And he has done it. It is finished. He has put away sin by his sacrifice, and he completed his conquest of death by his resurrection; and has had witnesses of these gospel truths in all ages, whom he sent to preach repentance and remission of sins, in his name. When it is the good pleasure of his own will to accompany the message with power from on high, then he blesses it by making it the ministration of righteousness and of life: as it is written, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth in him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life," already. The Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath freed the believer from the law of sin and of death, and has also created in him a new life: he has given him a new birth into the spiritual world, and spiritual senses to fit him for spiritual enjoyments: for he is actually passed from death unto life. By the Holy Spirit as the agent, and by faith as the instrument, he is made a child of God, united to Christ, one with him, interested in him, and so closely joined to him, as the members are to the head, as to be a real partaker of all that he did upon earth, and of all that he is now doing for his redeemed in heaven. He has a good warrant; for he is not only permitted, but also commanded, to apply to himself all the privileges and blessings which are contained in this large charter of grace. "Ye are complete in Christ, who is the head of all principality and power; in whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him, through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead: and you, being dead in your sins, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses, blotting out the handwriting of ordinances, that was against us, which was contrary to us; and he took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross, and having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in that same cross." In this view of the almighty conqueror of all our enemies, and of his enabling us also by faith to come after him, conquering and to conquer, what thanks and praises should be given unto him! There is no possible evil but he has removed it from us—and no possible good but he has obtained the right, and gives the possession. We are complete in him, our head—completely circumcised in heart by his circumcision, so as to put off the body of sin, and risen indeed with him by the faith of his own operation: through which we have the first resurrection from the grave of sin, and shall have the resurrection of the body from the grave of death. He now gives the first as a sure earnest of the second. He raises us from the grave of sin, and quickens us to newness of life, and thereby gives us a lively hope that we shall one day be with him and like him. In this hope the redeemed of the Lord have thus expressed their joys—We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners, in defiance of all our enemies—we need not fear sin, nor Satan, nor death, nor hell. Our Redeemer is strong: the Lord of Hosts is his name. He for us men, and for our salvation, was manifested to destroy the works of the devil. And he has destroyed them. He died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. His victory was complete, and in him we conquer. We come after him only to gather up the spoils of his triumph. Through faith in him, the sting of death is taken out of the conscience, and thereby the fear of it out of the heart—A believer ought to say, and when he is in his right mind he says with joy and gratitude—"The Lord is my light and my salvation; what then shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom then shall I be afraid? Yea, though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, I will fear no evil—I need not fear any, because thou, my Lord and Saviour, hast promised to be with me; thy rod and thy staff, they shall comfort me." What an infallible antidote has our Jesus here provided against all guilty fears, and against all natural fears! These promises to his dying followers cannot fail. He who made them is almighty to fulfil them, and almighty to enable us to believe that he will both support and comfort. Jesus, wonderful in his person, wonderful in all his works and ways—he has changed the very nature of death. He has turned it into life. Whosoever believeth in him shall never die, but is passed already from death unto life. The Holy Spirit has put him into present possession of a life laid up with Christ, out of the reach of death. So that when his body expires, it falls asleep in the Lord, and his spirit enters upon an eternal triumph of life and glory, among the spirits of just men made perfect.

Oh what a deliverance is this from the bondage of sin, and the terrors of the grave! It is the peculiar blessedness of believers in Jesus: for the natural man cannot but fear death, and look upon it as his enemy. He has no prospects but what are bounded by time. His whole happiness is in the present world, and in the enjoyment of what he calls the blessings of it. He was laying fine plans, and hoping to live to execute them—heaping up riches—living in the unrestrained liberty of sensual enjoyments—murdering his time—mispending his talents—without any concern about eternal things—when lo! an enemy comes, and puts an end to all his schemes. He dies. Perhaps he may be a sceptic, doubting of the certainty of a future state: he may wish there was none, but he can have no evidence: and if he continue to wish it, even to the last, oh what a scene will open when he meets a just and an angry God! He may be a materialist, and please himself with fancying that what we call his soul will vanish at his death into soft air; but the God of truth says, That when the dust shall return to the earth as it was, the spirit shall return to God who gave it: and in the morning of the resurrection Christ will re-animate the dust, and body and soul shall be united to live for ever. He may be one of the careless, quite unprepared; but when the messenger arrests him, he must go with him, and that in a moment. Perhaps he may be a moralist, trusting to his own goodness; he may fortify himself with arguments taken from Seneca; but these will furnish him with no armour, proof against the guilt of sin, or the sting of death. He may seek aid from philosophy, falsely so called; but its votaries professing themselves to be wise, in the hour of death found that they were fools. Every human help has failed, when most wanted. "But blessed is he who hath the God of Jacob for his help, and whose hope is in the Lord his God: who made heaven and earth, and all that therein is; who keepeth his promise for ever." Here is the Christian's never-failing support. God, even his covenant God, has promised to be with him, and to be his Saviour in death. God Jesus, almighty to keep his promise for ever, is his one hope, living and dying: and he is his gain, both in life and death. If he has won Christ, he has lived to a blessed time, and, whenever he dies, Christ will make death his friend, and will reconcile him to his going to the Lord, which is best of all. To look upon death as an enemy, to fear it, as if it could take from us any thing worth keeping, or as if it did not put us into the eternal possession of every thing worth enjoying; these are views of the resurrection of Jesus, very dishonourable to his victories, and very injurious to our interest in him. He undertook to conquer death for us, as our surety. He has done it. He has swallowed up death in victory. He has made it our friend and our benefactor: for he has engaged to support us in our last moments. He never did, he never can, fail any who put their trust in him. Experience has confirmed his faithfulness in all ages. His soldiers, whom he made valiant in fight, a goodly company whom no one can number, have triumphed gloriously—before death—in death—and after death.

Before death he prepared them to meet it in faith: for the great design of his gospel is to arm them against the guilt of sin and the terrors of death. And they are good soldiers of Christ Jesus who put on this armour, who have learned their exercise, and who by their daily battles keep their arms shining and bright: Looking to Jesus, the Captain of their salvation, for orders, for courage, for strength, for victory, all opposition falls before them. He enables them to fight the good fight of faith, and the more they conquer sin, the less they have to fear from death; for Christ is to them the whole armour of God, and the pieces of this armour are the graces of his Spirit. For with these the apostle says, in Ephesians, chap. vi., that Christ has perfectly equipped the armies of the Lord. They have the truth of Christ, the righteousness of Christ, the peace of God in Christ, faith in Christ, the word of Christ, hope in Christ, and prayer to Christ for fresh supplies of his Spirit, that he would enable them to make such a use of their armour, that they might get the victory over sin and death, and he might get all the praise. In this holy war He is every thing to them, and they find in him, and receive out of his fulness, whatever they want for the peace of their conscience, and for the happiness of their hearts. Sin is pardoned. Death is conquered. They experience the power of his resurrection, and, being passed from death unto life, they have believing views of their own dissolution. We read of their deliverance from the fear of death, and we have examples of those who were more afraid of sin than of death, yea, who chose to go into a burning fiery furnace rather than offend their God: hear how they triumphed—"Our God is able to deliver us; but if he does not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." Hear the witness of another Christian hero, how he was enabled to look upon death—"The Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying, that bonds and afflictions abide me; but none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear to myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God." This was a great victory; but the case is not singular: in the same faith died the noble army of martyrs, of whom we read—"That they overcame the accuser of the brethren by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto the death." And to this day, the Holy Spirit witnesses to the same truth, and seals it upon the conscience of believers in the hour of death. I call one evidence, a great dignitary in our church, a man of great learning, and never suspected of enthusiasm: being near his death, he thus expressed himself—"I cannot plead innocency of life, especially of my youth; but I am to be judged by a merciful God, who is not willing to see what I have done amiss; and though of myself I have nothing to present to him but sins and misery, yet I know he looks not upon me now as I am of myself, but as I am in my Saviour, and hath given me, even at this time, some testimonies by his Holy Spirit, that I am of the number of his elect: I am therefore full of joy, and shall die in peace."

Thus the precious Jesus was in the prospect of death more desirable than life itself. So he was to them in dying. All these died in faith. They were his witnesses, that he kept every thing hurtful from them, and brought them in triumph to the end of their lives. That great company round his throne, who are crowned conquerors, testify for him that he did not leave them nor forsake them one moment. He kept his word with them; he smoothed their bed in their sickness; he was tender over them, and wiped away all tears from their eyes. When fainting, he gave them strong consolation; when he called them to meet death in all its terrors, to suffer in flames of fire, to be torn to pieces by wild beasts, to be tormented in every way that malice could invent, or the power of tyrants could inflict, he was with them—their Saviour and their God—the tender care of his heart, and the mighty power of his arm, were never more felt than when most wanted. He kept his peace ruling in their consciences always and by all means, and gave them to feel that bodily pain could not lessen his love to them, nor abate or stop their love to him. I might bring a cloud of witnesses to prove the compassion of Jesus to his redeemed in their dying hours; but let these two suffice: Dr. Thomas Goodwin was upon his death-bed, when his friend Mr. Collins came to visit him, and to pray with him; to whom he said, "He rejoiced that he was dying, and going to have a full and uninterrupted communion with God."

"I am going," said he, "to the Three Persons, with whom I have had communion: they have taken me; I did not take them. I shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye: all my lusts and corruptions I shall be rid of, which could not be here."

After mentioning those great examples of faith, Hebrews, chap. xi., he said, "All these died in faith: I could not have imagined I should ever have such a measure of faith as I have in this hour. My bow abides in strength. Is Christ divided? No. I have the whole of his righteousness. I am found in him, not in my own righteousness, which is of the law, but in the righteousness which is of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ, who loved me and gave himself for me: Christ cannot love me better than he does, and I think I cannot love Christ better than I do: I am swallowed up in God."

The historian remarks, That with this assurance of faith and fulness of joy, his soul left this world, and went to see and to enjoy the reality of that blessed state of glory, of which, in a discourse on that subject, he had given a very lively description.

I may be permitted to call another witness to this blessed truth; a believer, who, just before his death, addressed himself to his friends in these words—"My brethren, is not this very amazing to you. When I contemplate the holiness of God, I cannot but cry out that I myself am vile, most vile: and then, when I consider the justice of God, could any one imagine but that I should be struck with most dreadful apprehensions of approaching judgment and deserved wrath? Instead of that, I am under no fear of the latter, and much desire the former. I long to appear before this holy, just God; I have a righteousness to plead that is perfect. The holy Jesus is my security: and I cannot be disappointed: in Christ the justice of God is as much my security as his mercy; here is a holiness that transcends that of all the angelic host. There is no charging my Redeemer with possible folly: Oh, I know I am pardoned for the sake of Jesus Christ, my only Lord and mediator; I am sure of it: I am fully, freely pardoned: I shall soon be thoroughly sanctified and fitted for glory: Oh, I want words to express my gratitude, to tell my joy: adored be God, my Lord, my Saviour: this is the work of God alone: Oh unfathomable love! infinite condescension! unmerited, unbounded grace to a vile offender! I deserve hell; I enjoy heaven."

followers, may it be given thee to find him near to thee in that time of need! If thy faith be in him, doubt not. Take courage, and live up to thy privileges. Regard his promise. Observe his faithfulness to it. Depend upon his arm. Trust in him and be not afraid. Since he has overcome death, why shouldst thou fear that it will overcome thee? Is not his victory thine? Whatever thou feelest in thyself, if nature shrink, and thou hast many uneasy thoughts about thy dissolution, remember that all thy salvation is in, and from him, and he has made thee a free gift of salvation, and of all the things which accompany salvation—he undertook it all—he has finished it all—he has put away sin by the sacrifice of himself—he has conquered death. It is now a vanquished foe. In his hand it is the royal way to the kingdom—the only way. Trust him, he will not suffer it to hurt thee. Trust in him, and thou wilt find there is nothing in it that ought to frighten thee. Breath may be failing thee; but Jesus will not fail thee. He has pronounced them blessed; he will infallibly make them blessed, who die in the Lord. Only believe, and thou wilt experience that he has dying consolations for his dying friends. They live in death. He makes them blessed in dying; yea, sometimes to encourage the faith of others, and to recommend his own grace, he has vouchsafed to give them, at the time of their death, a foretaste of the glory which was just going to be revealed. In this faith they leave the world, casting all their care for time and for eternity, for body and soul, upon him who careth for them. Jesus, into thy hand I commend my spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth. I believe in the resurrection of the body: thou hast promised it, and I hope it shall be done unto me according to thy word. Christ is the first-frûits, and afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming, when he will bring the joyful harvest with him; therefore into his faithful hands I commit my body. I take my leave of it in faith. It is not possible that the grave should hold me in any more than it could him: and I not only hope to be raised from the grave, but I shall be brought out of it in triumph, on that day of wonders, when Jesus Christ, the great God and our Saviour, shall change this my vile body, and shall make it like unto his own most glorious body. Oh what a change! Oh what a miracle! This very body, which is now sinful dust, shall be like the Son of God, who is the standard of all perfection—even this body of mine shall be conformed to his most glorious body; although it be now a house, so infected with the leprosy of sin, that it must be taken down; yet, out of its ruins will the Lord raise it a monument to his eternal praise, even a habitation of God by his Spirit. Come, then, thou blessed of the Lord, Oh welcome, welcome death! Thou art the smiling messenger from my Jesus, bringing with thee glad tidings of great joy—of a salvation secured from all possible evil, and the enjoyment of all possible good. In sure and certain hope of this complete and eternal salvation, I resign my body into thy hands, thou Lord of life, and giver of glory—I intrust it with thee to be kept against that day, when all that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this prospect, for believing views of it, for the earnest, and for some little foretaste of it, to the Eternal Three be eternal praise. Amen.

Such are the hopes of a real Christian, which he is warranted, which he is commanded, to entertain in the hour of death, which God in his infinite grace actually favours his people with, to the strengthening of their faith, and to the silencing of unbelievers. Never did he display his faithfulness more signally than in our times. Many instances might be given, but I select one, who thus expressed himself to his friends surrounding his death-bed.

"My soul is abundantly comforted and refreshed: my body is dying, but my mind is still vigorous and alive: I feel the cold hand of death is actually upon me; and you may feel it too, if you touch my feet and legs; they are once more clay. Blessed be God, death is no king of terrors to me. He is a welcome messenger, because sent by my heavenly Father. Here I am, O Lord, waiting thy pleasure; ready to obey the summons: thy will, O Lord, be done. Blessed be God, that the attack is made below: my head is as yet very clear and untouched, and, till my heart feels the damp, I hope to be engaged in work suitable to a death-bed: it is not to me a bed of languishing or wasting: this poor remainder of a body is hardly capable of any greater decay till it moulders in the grave; and there let it moulder. Who would not part with it as it is? It is now my burden, my bar to happiness, and hindrance to a lively spiritual communion with God. But, O my friends! it is united to Christ, and shall therefore one day become a glorious body. This corruption shall put on incorruption, and shall be for ever with the Lord." Thanks be to God for such a witness—may my latter end be like his.

CHAPTER X.

The character of the persons who have most reason to triumph in Christ.

They are such as know most of themselves, and have seen the deepest into the mystery of iniquity. The Holy Spirit has convinced them of sin —of original sin, the fountain from which all the streams flow of actual sin, in thought, word, and deed. In this conviction he has put life and power: it is far more than a moral persuasion—he makes it practical and abiding: for the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus quickens the dead sinner, and making him free from the law of sin, and of death, gives him the faith of God's elect: and by the daily use and exercise of that faith makes him more sensible of his obligations to Jesus. In every act of faith he leads the believer out of self to the Saviour—humbles him that he may exalt Christ—empties himself of self, that he may fill him with the good things of Christ—casts down, and keeps down every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and brings into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. In his hand, and by his blessings, this work prospers. The loftiness of man is humbled, and the haughtiness of man is bowed down, and Jehovah alone is exalted in that day—according to the oracle of truth—"He shall glorify me"—which is the office of the Holy Spirit to testify of Christ, and to glorify Christ, by taking of the things of Christ, and by putting the believer into the possession of them.

In this school of humility every view that can be taken of self is abasing: and as the lesson becomes more and better experienced, sin more discovered in its exceeding wickedness, and more felt in its exceeding great danger, the believer is enabled to rejoice more in Christ Jesus, as he has less confidence in the flesh; and when he attains to the highest of his triumph, which he can have in Christ in this world, he is then the lowest in his own eyes—

When he looks back and surveys what he was by nature and practice—

When he considers what he is now, although he be renewed by grace—

And when he looks forward to what he hopes to be at the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ—

Every thing in the scripture doctrine, and every thing in scripture experience, leads him to conclude—Behold, I am vile, I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes: so that whenever he is tempted to glory, he has nothing left him to glory in but the Lord: self always abased, that Christ alone may be exalted.

When he looks back to what he was by nature and practice, the more he knows, he will be the more deeply humbled for what he was when under the law and under sin, and for what he still feels of a body of sin and of death. He was the creature of God's power, made out of nothing—distinguished by his being in the image of God, and by being capable of communion with him in all the graces and blessings of his love. He was under the best law that could be given him for promoting God's glory and his own happiness. He was bound to perfect and continual obedience to it, and was left to his own will and power, that he should not offend in any one point: but upon his transgression he became liable to suffer the threatened pains and penalties of the broken law. Every right view of himself in this state ought to humble and to abase the sinner; and it effectually does when the conviction is from God. He then finds that his nature was earthly, sensual, and, having not the Spirit, it was alienated from the life of God. All his thoughts and actions were not only irregular, but also contrary to the holy law. His very imagination was evil, only evil, and that continually. His understanding was not only ignorant of spiritual things, but was darkness itself. His will was a rebel. His affections apostate, ever at enmity with God. Misery and destruction were in his ways: of the way of peace he had no knowledge, neither was there any fear of God before his eyes: for although death and hell were threatened, and were ready to give him the just wages of his iniquity, yet he was quite careless and secure. Like the atheists of old, when warned of their approaching destruction by the prophet—"Let us eat and drink," say they, "for to-morrow we die."

This true knowledge of the exceeding evil of sin and the right humiliation for it, come by believing, and are the genuine fruits and effects of it. Legal conviction has guilt and bondage in it, and worketh sorrow unto death. But the conviction of the Holy Spirit reveals the remedy along with the disease, and produces such a repentance as is not to be repented of—turning from sin to Christ—teaching us practically and daily what we are in ourselves, and how much we want such an almighty Saviour to teach us how to trust in him as our great high-priest, and to live happy and holy under his government, which is perfect freedom. Every act of this faith is humbling. The believer is made to feel his need of that in himself which he is commanded to trust in Christ for. And the more he is enabled to depend upon Christ, he will certainly have the less in himself. And when his whole dependence is as it ought to be, fixed upon Christ, he will come to the apostle's experience, even so to rejoice in Christ Jesus, as to put no confidence in the flesh. Herein consists the triumph of the Christian. In every step of his walk and warfare he is led from self to Christ—kept humbled in his own eyes, that he may exalt the Saviour—emptied of self, that he may live upon the fulness of Jesus, and may thereby be taught to rest his heart in him at all times, and for all things.

With respect to sin, which is his daily burden, under which he is always sorrowing, yet in Christ he can always rejoice. The more he knows of the exceeding wickedness of sin, the more precious is Jesus, and the more he does value the blood of the Lamb of God, which cleanseth from all sin. In his conscience purged from guilt, he can triumph with exceeding great joy, that there is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus: for where sin abounded, grace does much more abound: that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord. His grateful acknowledgments are such as these:—

I was even as others once—by nature a child of wrath, and an heir of misery—I was going on in the broad way of destruction—careless and secure—and I am quite astonished to see the danger that I was in—I tremble to behold the precipice which I was ready to fall over when Jesus opened mine eyes, and by the light of his word and Spirit, showed me my guilt and my danger, and put it into my heart to flee from the wrath to come. Oh, what a most merciful escape! I cannot think of it without adoring the compassionate Saviour, who remembered me in my low estate; for his mercy endureth for ever: and hath redeemed me from the hand of all mine enemies; for his mercy endureth for ever. Not unto me, not unto me in the least, but to the superabounding grace of my God be all the glory. That the Father would make me an object of his choice and love—that Jesus Immanuel would humble himself to be manifest in the flesh, and be obedient unto death, for me and for my salvation—that the Holy Ghost would give me a new birth into the spiritual world, and would quicken me into union with Jesus, and to the enjoyment of the Father's love in him,—adored for ever and ever be the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity. That such a filthy sinner should be cleansed from all sin—that such an ungodly creature should be freely justified by grace—that such a miserable sinner should be blessed with all spiritual blessings—that such a weak creature should be strengthened mightily by the Spirit in the inner man, and when weakest in myself, then to be strongest in the Lord—Oh what riches! What unsearchable riches of grace are these! Abide with me, O thou Spirit of the Father and the Son, and keep me constantly dependent on the fresh supplies of thy divine influence. By thy daily teaching keep open to me the depth and mystery of iniquity, the exceeding wickedness of sin—of my sin, that by thy holy inspiration I may live more by faith, and nothing may be suffered to hinder my growing fellowship with the Father, and the Son, until I am admitted to full and eternal fellowship. Amen.

Thus reflecting with self-abhorrence upon what he was by nature, when he was under the law, and under sin, which is the transgression of the law, alive to sin, but dead to God—He is led to consider,

What he is now, although he be renewed by grace, a believer and a man in Christ: how he feels himself, after much and sound experience of his title to salvation, and of his enjoyment of the things which accompany salvation. Every day, and in every thing, he has fresh matter for the deepest humiliation. He finds that he is still a man in Adam—still he carries about him a sinful nature, an old man as well as a new, a body of sin with all its members: he has spirit, but he has also flesh; and that which is born of the flesh is flesh, nothing but corruption, as that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. The old man has flesh still, with all its appetites and lusts: the new man is by the Spirit of life, that is in Christ Jesus, alive to God. In the same person sin dwelleth, as we read, "When we were in the flesh, the motions of sin, which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. And the new man liveth, who after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." The apostle in Romans, chap. vii. not only confesses that he had nature and grace in him at the same time, but also describes it at full length. Indwelling sin was his continual grief, and his heavy burden: an apostle in Christ; and yet he felt the plague of his own heart: and it was his daily cross, which he was forced to bear—and his constant enemy, against which he was always at war—no peace, no truce could be made. The flesh was ever lusting against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these two with such unceasing opposition, night and day, that he could not do the things that he would, either so continually or so perfectly. He describes this battle as it was carried on in his own experience, the two combatants striving in him for mastery. He was a good soldier of Jesus Christ, and as well instructed and armed as ever any believer was for this warfare; having on the whole armour of God, and yet wearied with this daily conflict, he is forced to cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" He had no deliverance in or from himself; it was against himself that he fought, and of himself he was led to despair. But, looking to Jesus, he takes courage, assuring himself of a complete victory, and of an everlasting triumph in the Captain of his salvation—I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then, (this is the conclusion of the whole matter) so then with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin.

This is still the experience of every true believer, at all times, and upon all occasions: he has a practical comment upon the seventh chapter of the Romans in his own bosom: he has heartfelt experience of the warfare between the flesh and the spirit: he finds it hard fighting; harder, because it is continual—it will never cease so long as flesh is flesh; that is, so long as the believer lives in the body and in the present world. Indwelling sin never rests—it is like the troubled sea, always casting up its filthy motions, and then the most troublesome when he would be the freest from them. Oh what humbling lessons doth he learn in all his approaches to God! he knows his privileges, and he wishes to live up to them; but he cannot. When he would draw near to God in the prayer of faith, the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. On his bended knees desiring to confess his sins, and to humble himself under the mighty hand of God, imploring pardon through the redemption that is in the blood of the Lamb, and expecting it freely, as the most sovereign mercy that a poor sinner can receive. Alas! alas! even then shame and confusion cover his face. He desires to keep his thoughts from wandering; he would have his whole heart engaged in the duty; but he cannot: his imagination is not to be restrained. When he would be uniting all his affections in fervent and effectual prayer, vain, foolish thoughts force themselves upon him: he drives them away as Abraham did the birds which came down upon the sacrifice; but they will return. He mourns, as well he may, for these distractions of his mind, and is deeply convinced that a most holy God might justly condemn him for his very best devotions. He is therefore led to put them into the hands of the Mediator, that he may perfume them with much of his incense for their acceptance; and through his intercession, and through that only, he may obtain an answer of grace.

Neither can he trust in his praises any more than in his prayers. Let him praise ever so much, and ever so well, yet he can make no suitable acknowledgments for the blessing of creation. Once he was nothing: for his being at all—for such a being, rather than any other—for being made a man, and at first highly favoured with the image and friendship of God—who can express the noble acts of the Lord, or show forth all his praise for the miracle of creation? But who can conceive how great, how endless, are the blessings of the new creation? For they are all gifts of God's grace—distinguishing and sovereign—given to sinners as sinners—to the chief of sinners—continued to the unworthy—increased to the unthankful—how great in their nature!—how invaluable the sum of them! The believer, deeply impressed with these sentiments, acknowledges that he is less than the least of all God's mercies; yea, he is sensible that he deserves the heaviest of the divine vengeance: so that his prayer, God be merciful to me a sinner! lays the foundation of his very best praises. He who has most forgiven will love most. He who feels what he really is among the chief of sinners, will be among the chief of those worshippers who ascribe all their salvation to God and the Lamb. The humblest amongst them will feel that they have most reason to be thankful: but still their praises are no payment. They must receive fresh grace to praise with, and more grace to praise better. The debt increases by the addition of fresh gifts of grace, and leaves the believer nothing to glory in but the Lord—to be saved—to feel it—to enjoy it by faith—to be made and to be kept thankful, giving all the glory where it is due: these are among the mercies which endure for ever.

In this school of self-abasement he is taught to be humbled for his short attainments in the scriptures, read, or preached, or meditated on. How seldom does he attend the word, as that congregation did!—"Behold we are all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God." This preparation of heart was from the Lord. He disposed Cornelius and his family to receive the word aright, and his blessing came upon them in hearing it: for while Peter was speaking, the Holy Ghost fell on all them that heard the word. And it would be so still, if there were the same dependence on his grace, and the prayer of faith for his teaching along with the word. How little is this depended upon under hearing, although the profit be entirely from him! how seldom is the mixing faith with it received and acknowledged! therefore the memory keeps little impression of the word, and in heart it is not fruitful as it ought to be. On all these accounts the believer mourns and is humbled before God. He feels it to be true, "I know that in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good, I find not." He is sensible of these failings and distractions, even when he labours to be most free from them. He is going to the Lord's table to be fed and feasted, hoping that he is one with Christ, and Christ is one with him. He would gladly partake of the fruits and blessings of this union by communion with Christ, by receiving the bread of life, and the cup of salvation, according to Christ's holy institution. He comes in faith to eat the flesh of Christ, and to drink his blood, in grateful remembrance of him—according as he hath been taught: the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for me, preserve my body and soul unto eternal life.—I take and I eat this bread, and I take and I drink this cup, in remembrance that Christ died for me; and I desire to feed on him in my heart by faith with thanksgiving. In this service he would have his whole soul engaged, that nothing might interrupt his communion with his Beloved. But vain thoughts, which lodge within him, will break out. They intrude, although most unwelcome guests, into this banquet of love: so that he is constrained to cry out, Lord Jesus, pardon the failings of my holy things! I come to the throne of thy grace, that I may obtain mercy, and may find more grace to help me in every time of need.

When he is led to consider what is the cause of all these failings, oh what an abiding lesson of humility has he to learn! He sees that they all spring from the bitter root of unbelief, and are the fruits of remaining corruption, which can only be kept down and conquered as the strength of Christ, apprehended by faith, prevails over them. Self, pride, legality, nurse them: they have their being, their activity, their power, from those fleshly lusts which war against the soul, and render the whole life of the believer one continued act of self-denial. He has still a body of sin, with all its members, mixing with every duty, so that he cannot ground his faith and hope upon the best of them. The work of Jesus upon earth, the intercession of Jesus in heaven, are the sole ground of his confidence towards God. His motive is good; he aims at pleasing God in all things; he would do his will, and suffer his will, as it is his bounden duty, with faith and patience. His end is good: he would gladly keep the glory of God in his eye, and direct all he does to it, as his elder brethren do in heaven; but he cannot. When the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak. Yet he is not so discouraged as to give over and cease his approaches to God, because of his infirmities. Having obtained help of God, he fights on the good fight of faith. He does not leave off praying because he is not so spiritual as he desires to be; but he is rather more earnest and fervent. The Spirit, helping his infirmities, keeps him in a humble dependence upon Jesus, waiting on him for a due sense of his wants, for the acceptance of his prayers, for a supply of them, for pardoning the failings of them, for more faith in them, and for enabling him to continue instant in prayer, according to the divine command, that men ought always to pray and not to faint; which supposes them to be kept in a praying frame, and to use the means which Saint Jude recommends for the obtaining of these blessings: "But, ye beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

As he is not weary of his prayers, because they are not so spiritual as he could wish, so neither is he weary of his praises, although they fall far short of what such a Saviour deserves, and of what he would acknowledge with all possible gratitude: because he falls short, he aims higher. He feels himself under infinite obligations to the Father for his love, to the Son for his salvation, and by the supply of the Spirit's grace he is made sensible that he is not only less than the least of divine mercies, but, if he had his just deserts, he should have judgment without mercy. This lays the foundation for his highest praises. The faithful witness for Jesus makes the believer willing to be beholden to him for every mercy; yea, to glory in being a pensioner upon his fulness: from which he receives grace for grace, that in all things he may be giving of thanks; according to the Lord's favour to his people, informing them to take with them words, and turn to the Lord, and say unto him, "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously, so will we render the calves of our lips," which is the sacrifice of the New Testament worshippers, who through Jesus the Mediator offer the sacrifice of praise continually; that is, the fruit of their lips, giving thanks to his name, wishing, praying to do it with some of the praises of heaven, as one said, "I will hope continually, and I will yet praise thee more and more."

As these prayers and praises are grounded upon faith in the divine promises, this makes the believer a diligent reader of the scriptures. He does not neglect his Bible, because he has not yet attained the perfect knowledge of every part of it. For that very reason he studies it more; he prays more over it, grows more thankful for the divine power which still accompanies it, and studies and prays that he may experience more of this power: it has been the means of making him wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. He finds it also to be the food of this faith—it nourishes him, and he grows thereby. He hears, reads, meditates, and keeps on praying to the Holy Ghost to write the scriptures upon his heart, and to make his life a fair copy of them. And what he thus learns preserves him in a settled dependence upon the faithfulness of God to his word and promise. And he is not disappointed: he finds all the scripture which was given by the inspiration of God is still profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. This blessing he has in his Bible. The more he can mix faith with it, the more precious it becomes. His Bible is his library. The study therein makes him wise for eternity; which is the superlative excellency of Bible knowledge, of which Jesus thus speaks: "Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors; for whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord."

Thus in the use of means he is kept humble and dependent, exercising the true gospel poverty of spirit in self-abasement; and so far from being stopped, he rather glories and triumphs in his infirmities. The opposition which they give helps him forward; they are always driving him out of self to Christ, teaching him the necessity of the supplies of the Spirit, making him more diligent, and keeping him more humble in the use of the means; and thus he learns to live more by faith upon Christ, and to seek more close communion with him and his fulness, especially at his table. He does not absent himself from it, because he has not the fellowship there, so close, intimate, and abiding, as he could wish, or because, the last time he was there, he was not so lively as he used to be, or because he was unworthy, and full of complaints. He has tasted that the Lord is gracious: and this taste has increased his hunger and thirst; the food which he wants he does not carry with him, but he goes to receive it. When he hears his Lord's command—Take, eat this bread—drink this cup—Do ye this in remembrance of me—he obeys, believing the promise: This is my body given for you: this is my blood shed for you. The more faith in the promise, there will be the more appetite and the more nourishment received from the spiritual food; for then the Holy Spirit puts his influence into the elements, and the communicant eats the flesh of Christ indeed, and drinks his blood indeed, having by faith communion with him in the bread and wine. At this table the believer is fed, nourished, and feasted with the bread that cometh down from heaven, even angel's food; for he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever; according to the Lord's own promise, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." The believer has this in his eye, both in what the banquet is now, and in what it is the pledge and earnest of, when it shall be realized. Faith gives a substance to the things promised and hoped for. It has the earnest and the pledge of them: as certainly as we have the one, so certainly shall we have the other. A faithful God gives us this security—Whoso is one by faith with Jesus shall sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb: whoso eateth and drinketh at his table here in faith, shall infallibly eat and drink with him at his table in his kingdom of glory. The sure and certain hope of this makes our present feast at the Lord's supper a happy foretaste of that eternal banquet, when he will vouchsafe to admit us to the honours of his table, and of his kingdom. Oh, blessed, most blessed time! The prospect is animating; it brightens the darkest day of affliction, refreshes the spirits under the heaviest trials, and is a rich cordial under the deepest feeling of indwelling sin. Where Christ is, all is blessed. Union with him is heaven begun; and this the believer is called to enjoy; even to enjoy communion with him in all he is and has: Christ is one with him: Christ will not leave him nor forsake him: nothing is able to separate the members from the Head. He who has begun the good work has given the fullest security that he will not leave it unfinished. He will carry it on unto the end; for he is faithful who hath promised. And the apostle applies the words spoken to Joshua, and says that they were spoken also to us, that we might trust and not be afraid: "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage: be not afraid: neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest." And he went out strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. He fought the Lord's battles, and prospered until the whole land was subdued before him. There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken to the house of Israel. All came to pass. Even so shall it be to the whole Israel of God. Every good soldier of Christ Jesus shall be kept safe by his almighty power, and under his banner shall fight the good fight of faith, until he attain the promised inheritance, which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for them. He has taken possession of it in their name, as their surety; and not one of them can perish; for he keeps the inheritance for them, and them for it; yea, the day is hastening on, when he will present all his redeemed unto the Father: "Of those whom thou hast given me have I lost none. Behold, I and the children whom thou hast given me."

On all these accounts it is evident that a believer every day, and in every thing, finds matter for the deepest humiliation. He has still a body of sin, remaining corruptions, daily infirmities, and short comings. All that he has of his own abases him in his own eyes; so that his triumph is never in himself. His salvation, with all its graces and blessings, depends entirely upon what he is in Christ. On this foundation he may rest safely always, notwithstanding he has nothing of his own to glory in. Most of his mistakes and miseries come from his seeking to be independent of Christ—hoping to find that in himself, or in the world, which is only in Christ. Self-love is unwilling to be beholden to Christ for every good thing: it is always trying to put some confidence in the flesh: but the believer is commanded, and is taught to deny self—to put it upon the cross—and to crucify it daily with its affections and lusts. As Christ is exalted, self goes down. As Christ is beloved, self is not only denied, but is also abhorred. The prophet Ezekiel, in the thirty-sixth chapter, describes the very height of the experience of a great believer, who is blest with the abundant graces of the Holy Spirit: the result of which is—"Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and your doings that were not good; and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for your iniquities, and for your abominations: not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord God, be it known unto you; be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel." Such is the genuine working of true grace—it lays the sinner low at the Saviour's feet, abased and humbled to the dust—Behold I am vile—I abhor myself, and I repent in dust and ashes. The sense of God's distinguishing and sovereign mercy brings all high thoughts of self into subjection to Christ Jesus, and teaches the believer to walk humbly with his God, ascribing all his salvation to the praise of the glory of the exceeding riches of God's grace in his kindness towards us, through Christ Jesus; that, according as it is written, "He that glorieth let him glory in the Lord."

Thus it is evident that when the believer looks back upon what he was by nature, or considers what he is now by grace, he has nothing of his own to boast of; yet even in this continual warfare between the flesh and the spirit, in Christ Jesus he may rejoice even to a triumph, a jubilee of joy. But the grand triumph is yet to come. The best glorying in the Lord here is only a prelude to it. Now we have the espousals with our heavenly bridegroom; but then the marriage will be consummated. Now we are kept waiting in hope for the crown of righteousness; but that will be our coronation day. What a day will it be! What wonders and miracles! The promises, exceeding great and exceeding precious, will then have their full and everlasting accomplishment by a faithful God, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them who have believed—when they shall see him face to face—shall be with him where he is—shall be like him, and made capable of enjoying the honours, and riches, and pleasures of his kingdom, in their fulness of blessedness for evermore.

CHAPTER XI.

The eternal triumph.

This is the great lesson which the believer is learning, till he comes to the end of his faith—what is promised him, and what he hopes to be at the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is the centre to which all his experience tends: and, while he keeps it in view, it so enlivens and animates his prospect, that, come what may, he goes on his way rejoicing in hope of the glory of God. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." And by his holy inspiration he opens the eyes of the understanding, both to understand what is revealed, and also to know the things that are freely given to us of God: for, great as they are, endless as they are, the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned: but he that is spiritual has spiritual senses given him to exercise upon spiritual things—he is made certain of their reality—his faith gives a substance to the things hoped for, and evidence to the things not seen—a hope that never maketh ashamed—an evidence very clear and satisfying. Sometimes he can triumph in hope of the glory of God, when the Holy Spirit sheds abroad in his heart the Father's love, and bestows great joy and peace in believing. But he who is thus taught of God knows only in part. An apostle knew no more. The best of our present enjoyment is only a foretaste of the heavenly banquet. But even this little is of such a nature, and has such efficacy, that, when it is truly believed, it influences the whole man, while he looks not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. They are not seen by the eye of the body, but are visible by the eye of faith; so we read, "Come, taste and see how gracious the Lord is." By this eye of faith Moses saw him that is invisible: and this sight so affected him, and had such an influence upon his heart and life, that he lived above the world with all its temptations. This is the victory that overcame the world; even his faith. The same sight still works the same effect —producing a real value for spiritual and eternal things, and forming the heart to love and to practise the apostle's rule—My conversation is in heaven, from whence also I look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

In the scripture view of our victory in Christ there are two great points, which will take in all that is revealed of our eternal triumph; namely, the complete conquest of all our enemies—and the full and eternal enjoyment of all possible good. These two truths come now under our consideration; and if we can meditate upon them under the influence of the Holy Spirit, and mix faith with his revelation, we shall have a good warrant to begin those praises, which will never end, and to sing in harmony with all the redeemed our everlasting jubilee.

When we come to the end of our faith, even the eternal salvation of our souls, our victory is described to be a perfect deliverance from all evil—from sin, from suffering. Sin has brought all pain into the world—miseries upon the body—miseries upon the soul—spiritual wickedness—numerous hosts of foes—mighty principalities and powers: it has armed thousands, yea millions of them for our destruction—made us our own enemies by enslaving us to divers lusts and passions, making us the prey to earthly, sensual, devilish tempers—and, as if there was not suffering enough in the world, filling us with many imaginary fears, which occasion real suffering. At last comes the wages of sin—death with its terrors—hell with its torments. Oh what a deliverer! what a deliverance! Not one enemy left. They are all brought under, and subdued, to rise no more. The Captain of our salvation has vanquished them for us. His victory is the earnest of ours. His was complete; so is ours. No sin, no suffering can come near the habitation of his holiness. Indeed, he suffered once for sin; but he put it away by that sacrifice of himself. By faith we have the benefit of his suffering—a conscience purged from guilt—no condemnation left—no charge from any enemy. God himself justifies, God himself sees us, accepts us, glorifies us, in and with his Son; for in that day he will present us to his Father without spot of sin unto eternal salvation.

Of this blessed and complete victory over all sin, and all suffering, the prophet Isaiah had a delightful prospect; speaking of it in these words: "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and shall come to Sion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Oh give thanks unto the Lord Jehovah; for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever: let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy: they have as much to thank their Redeemer for as any creature possibly can have: his ransomed were under sin, helpless, miserable, dying sinners: from this slavery he bought them with an inestimable price, and they are become his property, his peculiar people, who have through him liberty to return to God, and to serve him without fear on earth, and to bless him for giving them freedom to come to Zion, to the city of the living God, with songs of gratitude and praise: they have everlasting joy upon their heads—crowned conquerors; they have the joys of heaven, and the gladness of eternity in their hearts, which exclude all pain, and all sorrow: no fear can enter there—not one sigh. The Lord himself is their portion; and they shall reign with him for ever and ever.

The beloved John was favoured with a view of the same eternal conquest which the ransomed of the Lord shall have over all thei renemies, and he speaks of it thus: "And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more curse, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away; and he that sat upon the throne said, Behold I make all things new." This is Jesus, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords, who reigneth the Lord God omnipotent for this very purpose, that this scripture may be fulfilled to the uttermost, and to eternity. He was the word made flesh, who tabernacled amongst us, being that most holy temple which God pitched, and not man: out of whose fulness believers receive all grace, and all glory: the compassions of Jesus are like himself, infinite and endless. He loves his redeemed too well to let either sin or sorrow come near them. They might have been holy mourners in their pilgrimage, when they went through the valley of Baca; but now he has wiped away their tears, all tears from their eyes. The curse that caused them he has removed. That death, the wages of which they deserved, he has changed into life. The pillars in his house, which are to get out no more, are thereby delivered from sorrow and crying, and from every pain: all the former things are passed away—sin is no more—pain is no more. Into the kingdom of Jesus nothing of the old man is suffered to enter; for he creates all things new. The Lord from heaven makes all his people like himself, conformed to his own image in righteousness and true holiness. A more perfect victory cannot be imagined than to have enemies so vanquished,—all enemies,—that they shall never have entrance into the kingdom of God, and his Christ. When believers shall come to the end of their faith, they shall not only be thus saved from all possible evil, but who can conceive what their actual enjoyments will then be? To be saved from all sin, from all the effects of sin, is a great mercy; yet it is only a part of our salvation. But, looking at the world lying in wickedness, beholding the variety of pains and miseries in it, from which no one is exempt—no state of life free from them—the palace as full of them as the cottage—kingdoms convulsed—infidelity spreading its poisonous influence, and attempting to destroy all good order and government—old age bringing its infirmities, and death hastening—it is certainly a great deliverance that none of those evils can approach us any more. Blessed be God the Saviour for this great mercy. It is through his grace that his kingdom of glory will be kept in perfect peace: no evil, no fear of evil, shall for one moment interrupt the happiness of his subjects. But what is this compared to the actual enjoyment of all possible good? Who is able to declare fully what this will be at the appearing of Jesus the great God? We must wait for the full manifestation of the sons of God: but yet there is a great deal revealed, which belongs to us and to our children: and if we can read it in faith, with prayer, and with a continual dependence upon the teaching and application of the Holy Spirit, he will give us to form our hearts and lives upon the certainty of what he has revealed: for our conversation will then be in heaven, and we shall have both the knowledge and also the experience of heavenly things, growing according to our faith. The word revelation signifies taking off the veil or covering from any thing, that it may be seen clearly: in the scripture sense, it is removing the veil from heavenly things, which is the work of the Holy Spirit, creating spiritual senses to exercise upon those heavenly things; of which the natural man can have no just ideas; for he cannot understand nor receive the things that are freely given to us of God: but he that is taught of God has evidence given him of the reality and of the blessedness of those things which are revealed, and by faith enjoyed. When such a one reads what God said to Abraham: "After these things, the word of the Lord came to Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward." He reads it for himself; he makes the promise his own, and trusts in it as steadfastly as if God had spoken it to him by a voice from heaven; for so is he warranted to apply it by the apostle. Now, it was not written for his sake alone, but for us also; no scripture being of any private interpretation. The gift of grace to Abraham was nothing short of an infinite good; for it was God himself: I will be thy God. What is meant by this relation has been largely treated of in the former volumes. It is only needful to add, that it denotes the relation in which the Holy Trinity stand to believers, and the covenant engagements to them. God is theirs—He is their Father; the Son is their Saviour; the Spirit of life has enabled them to receive the Son: and they are one with him. He dwelling in their hearts by faith, and through him they are one with his Father: as the Lord said in his prayer—"Neither pray I for these alone—the apostles—but for them also who shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." This prayer was for all the chosen of the Father, given to the Son, redeemed by him, and in due time quickened by the Spirit, and brought into the same covenant relation, and partakers of the same covenant blessings, as Abraham was. What was promised to him, was promised to all that walk in the steps of his faith,—the whole family and household of faith. It is as if God had said, Fear not, believer: I myself, Jehovah in Trinity, will be your present salvation to shield you from all sins and enemies, and I myself will be your exceeding great reward. Who can tell what the believer shall then be, when this promise shall be fulfilled, when he shall be brought as near to the Godhead as a creature can possibly be, joined to the Lord Jesus by the Holy Spirit, an habitation of God through the Spirit, and through Jesus unto the Father, and in this holy and blessed communion, finding an eternal heaven of happiness, an exceeding great reward? when it is received in this its fulness, it is a reward, but of grace—a gift of sovereign mercy—great—something worthy of the great God—like himself—exceeding great, eternally great. O Holy Ghost, keep the hope of it lively: Oh make it every day more lively, till, through thy blessing, I come to know it as it is.

The Psalmist, speaking of this happiness, suits his description to our present method of understanding spiritual things as they are imagined to us by material. The pleasures of our senses are made use of to give us ideas of that happiness which is to be found in God: for it is all in him; he is heaven. The enjoyment of him in glory is the heaven of heavens. "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I wake with thy likeness; for thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is the fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore." All this, great and endless as it is, belongs to them who have God for their God: for when they are admitted into his presence, they shall be made like him—Oh marvellous change!—capable of enjoying him, so as to be quite satisfied—finding in him a fulness of joy—pleasures divinely great, abundant,—a river of pleasures—yea, a fountain of pleasures springing up into everlasting life. Every sense shall be gratified to the uttermost, and that for evermore. Blessed be God for this unspeakable gift! and has he not herein vouchsafed us matter of triumph? May not the believer, ought he not, to rejoice with exceeding great joy, who has this prospect before him? Who that is out of heaven can have more reason than he has? Survey it, O my soul! take a narrow review of it. Examine over and over again the Psalmist's description of it, and see what can be added to make it absolutely perfect. If nothing can, if it be as full as God can make it, may my heart grow in holy desires after the glory that is to be revealed, and triumph in the God of my salvation.

Our Lord gives us the same description in these words, speaking to his apostles: "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me (in the surest, fullest manner that it can be conveyed), that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit upon thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." The king of this holy land is Immanuel—God Jesus: he is the King of kings, the Lord creator of all worlds, and the government of them all is upon his shoulders, and the names of his redeemed are written upon his heart. For them he has made abundant provision, that they may feast with him at his table, and may be receiving out of his fulness every grace that can make them completely and eternally blessed: for they shall sit down with him upon his throne, and shall share with him in all his royalties, blessing and adoring him in their everlasting songs of triumph. "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever Amen." The apostle John calls upon us NOW to begin the heavenly song: and he would have us to do it with the sweetest melody in our hearts, praising our sovereign Lord, who has taken our nature into union with himself, in order that by his Spirit we might be joined to him our glorified Head, and might by faith partake of his holy and heavenly nature. No words can describe more fully the dignity to which, by virtue of this union, we shall be exalted: nay, it is not to be conceived at present how great it will be. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, NOW are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is: and every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure." Oh what a dignity is this! what upon earth is to be compared for one moment to it?—Sons of God—Sons of Adam, who have borne the image of the earthly, advanced to bear the image of the heavenly! This is a glory which surpasseth all understanding. It did not yet appear as it is to the beloved John; he knew as much of it as perhaps ever man did; but it was far greater than his knowledge. He knew it but in part: he was indeed sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, who is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession; but the earnest is not the inheritance itself. It is only a pledge and a security, that, at the appearing of Jesus Christ, the great God and our Saviour, we shall be put into full possession. At present we have it in the promise of the God of truth: and faith in its promise begets a hope that will never make us ashamed; because it will keep us patiently waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God, when we shall come to the eternal enjoyment of all the riches, and pleasures, and honours of our sonship with Christ our glorified Head.

The apostle would lead us also to consider the fountain from whence all this blessedness springs—from the Father—what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us. The love expressed by this name, Father, has no parallel. It had no beginning, and it will have no ending. It is from everlasting to everlasting—bringing with it out of its infinite ocean all the streams of grace which make glad the city of God, and never stopping till it return with all the happy objects of his love to the same great ocean again. The apostle would have us to behold and to admire the miracles of the Father's love, which he purposed and wrought out, and bestowed upon us, who are sinners even as others, and yet to the everlasting praise and glory of his grace—chosen—called—effectually brought into the family and household of faith by the Spirit of adoption, and ennobled—sons of God. What an exaltation! What a blessedness! Made the children of God, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ—with him who is Lord of all—admitted to share with him in his kingdom, his crown, his glories; according to his own prayer—"Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me, where I am, that they may behold my glory, may be with me, may be like me." Oh what an animating view is here for the highest rejoicing of faith and hope! Christ, by taking our nature into union with himself, has advanced it into the greatest dignity of which it is capable; for it is heaven to be with him, where he is in his glory; like him, conformed to that standard of all perfection in body and soul, perfectly and eternally. What a hope should this beget and cherish! even a hope full of glory and immortality; especially as all this honour is according to the Father's covenant purposes; for whom he did foreknow, them he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren: moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified. What shall we say to these things? Can there be greater grace shown from the God of all grace? Can there be higher honour conferred, than to be so exalted from the depth of sin and misery, as to be raised to the honours of sonship, even to a conformity to the Son of God? Oh what sentiments had that blessed man of it, when he said, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake after thy likeness; for thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is the fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore!" Conformity to Jesus brings with it this fulness of joy; and the hope of it is an active and a lively grace: for every one that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as Christ is pure. This is the mark at which the believer aims: he wishes to be like Christ, and to be more like him: he would feel more of the power of the cross of Christ to crucify in him the body of sin, and more of the power of the risen Jesus, that there may be a real growth into him; and that in all things: thus he purifies his heart and life by that faith in Jesus, of which the apostle thus speaks: "Brethren, I have not yet attained what I am striving for; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

These are some of the scripture authorities, from which this conclusion may be fairly drawn, that a believer, whatever view he may take of himself, either from what he was, when dead in trespasses and sins, or from what he now is, quickened by the Spirit of Christ, and living by faith, yet crying out under a sense of his corruptions, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? yet he may thank God through Jesus Christ his Lord; for he is warranted, he is commanded, to rejoice in the Lord always, and to triumph in the God of his salvation. And he has enough given him in hand to exercise that strong faith, which will administer strong consolation, even great, very great joy and peace in believing: for the word of God cannot be broken; his promises cannot fail; his covenant engagements are immutable, given as infallible security to the believer, that his faith may not stagger at any difficulty, but, looking to a faithful God, he may go on his way rejoicing in hope of the glory of God.

These are some of the blessed effects of looking to Jesus, and living by faith upon him and his fulness. In this way there is continual matter of triumph. Let the believer look back on what he was by nature, or on what he is now in his renewed state by grace, or looking forward to the glory that is to be revealed at the appearing of his Saviour, when he shall be with him in the kingdom which cannot be moved, and shall be like him, all his members conformed to their most glorious Head, and partaking of his divine riches, and honours, and pleasures. What upon earth can exceed such a prospect! What can administer greater happiness than to have the evidence of it kept clear and open? What can make life more comfortable, and the end of our faith more desirable, than such great and blessed things, promised and given most freely in time, yea, in the fullest manner that almighty love can bestow them in eternity?

For such mercies, bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name.

O thou beginning and ending, the first and the last, the author and the finisher of the faith, Jehovah Jesus! I have been looking up to thee for thy divine teaching, and I am still looking up to thee for thy divine blessing on this my offering. It is a poor mite, which I would cast into thy treasury, as my dying testimony for the truth and for the power of thy gospel. Be pleased to accept it out of thine infinite condescension. Thou knowest the heart of thy servant: whatever is right in it is thine own, the work of thine own grace. Failings there are, and they are mine: of thy mercy pardon them; and make use of this little treatise, as it shall seem best to thy godly wisdom, for the increase of faith in thy church, and for the advancement of thine own fame and glory; that more honour may be put upon thy word, more dependence exercised upon thy faithfulness, and there may be a growing conformity to it in the hearts and lives of thy people. Be pleased, merciful Saviour, to accompany the reading of it with thy Spirit for these purposes, and I shall be amply rewarded. May thy grace, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with us all. Amen.

A PRACTICAL COMMENT

PREFACE.

The following comment was not drawn up with any view to its publication. It was only intended for the pulpit, at the Thursday's lecture in St. Dunstan's, and after it had been preached would have been thrown aside; for the author is obliged to make a sermon every week, besides the lecture; and he had no thoughts of sending such hasty compositions to the press. He knows that they want every qualification necessary to make them admired in this polite age: their manner is unfashionably plain and simple; they have nothing studied or brilliant in their style, nor delicately nice in the method; no pretty turns of wit, nor striking antitheses to entertain the reader. And the matter is as opposite to the established taste as the manner of them. They are not in the least indebted to the boasted light of nature; they borrow no ornaments from the celebrated religion of nature; nor do they receive any aids from the moral scheme; but they are the plain honest truths of scripture, of the Christian church, and of the church of England. And yet these great authorities are not sufficient to protect them from contempt, nor excuse the author from the charge of novelty. He is very sensible of it. He has been long enough acquainted with the received opinions of the age; and he cannot expect any kind of applause (and he thanks God he does not desire it) from the present set of great and learned men. If you are doing right, you will certainly be censured; and if you resolve to do right, you must learn to neglect censure. I have been prevailed on to neglect it by the earnest and daily repeated importunity of the hearers of these lectures, by whom I was determined to make them public. They are here laid before the world, as they were preached, without any alteration; and if it please God to make them the instruments of doing some service to the souls of mankind, my loss of reputation as an author will be fully repaid. If but one single person should find reason to bless God for these lectures, I shall not lose my end; although I hope they will be useful to many. And I pray the almighty God and Saviour of the world to send them out in his grace and strength, and to accompany them abundantly with his divine power, and then his glory will be the more displayed, if any mighty effects should be produced by such weak instruments.

Every minister of the gospel who has any zeal for his master's honour, or love for the souls of men, ought to exert himself in these days of reproach and blasphemy; for we are sunk into the very dregs of the latter times, in which it was foretold that iniquity should abound. And does it not now abound? has not his majesty (King George the Second) complained more than once from the throne of its abounding? Has not the convocation, at last (in the year 1755), seen it, and publicly confessed the abounding of iniquity? and is it not obvious to every unprejudiced spectator that our people, high and low, are totally corrupt, not only in morals, but also in principles? For it is too evident a truth to be denied, that we are departed from the doctrines of the reformation, and yet we keep up our subscriptions to the articles and homilies then established, which are entirely founded upon the certainty of the fall of mankind in Adam, and of their recovery in Jesus Christ. We were wholly ruined by the one, and we are wholly saved by the other. The sin of the one was imputed to us, as the righteousness of the other is imputed to us. All the scripture is built upon these two truths, as well as the church of England. But no sooner does a clergyman venture to speak out upon these points, than he is immediately branded with the name of enthusiast, although he has declared, in the most solemn manner before God, his assent and consent to every thing contained in the articles and homilies upon the fall and redemption of mankind, and although the very persons who abuse him have done the same. Urge the plainest passages of scripture, appeal to your subscription, call upon reason, and summon matter of fact to bear testimony to the soberness of your faith, yet you cannot avoid a hard name. If you think of avoiding it because you do not deserve it, you will find yourself mistaken. I made the same mistake, and fancied myself quite safe, while I had the scripture, and the church on my side, until I found that a strong suspicion had gone out among some ministerial clergy, as if I was leaning a little matter, and inclining, as it were, something towards enthusiasm. And they suspected this because I did not lean and incline towards them or their doctrines and practices; which most certainly I did not. Instead of defending the Jew-bill, and the marriage-bill, I rather insisted upon the total corruption of mankind by the fall, and the freeness and fulness of redemption through Jesus Christ, and the necessity of the grace of the Holy Spirit, to change and renew our corrupt hearts, in order to dispose them to receive the benefits of Christ's redemption, and to enable them to live a holy and a Christian life. These doctrines are now dressed up by our great men in a bear-skin, and baited under the odious nick-name of enthusiasm; and our people begin to join the cry, and to fancy that a man must be a little tinctured with enthusiasm, before he will make himself so ridiculous as to defend these exploded doctrines. But if others fear a nick-name from this quarter, I do not. The ministerial clergy are welcome to call me what they please. I honour their reproach; for I find myself in the best of company by leaving theirs. The whole church of God, in the Old Testament and the New, believed and acted upon the truth of the doctrines before mentioned. All the primitive fathers embraced them. The martyrs died, and sealed the belief of them with their blood. The protestant church has with one voice maintained them. And the church of England has made the acknowledgment of them absolutely necessary for every one of her ministers, and therefore, if it be enthusiasm to acknowledge what she has made necessary, then the church of England is turned enthusiast, and her best sons are the strongest enthusiasts. And what then are we to think of those court divines who expose their brethren and ridicule them under the disgraceful name of Enthusiasts, for no other reason but because we make a conscience of our oaths and subscriptions, and dare not risk our eternal salvation for any present honour or preferment.

The generality of readers may not, perhaps, be acquainted with the true state of the case, and therefore it may be useful to them to show upon what footing these doctrines stand, which are now exploded under the odious name of enthusiasm. I will carry my inquiry no higher up than the reformation of the church of England, and will endeavour to convince the reader that if we are enthusiasts for abiding by the doctrines of the reformation, then these persons must be something much worse, who have subscribed to those doctrines, and yet have departed from them.

The fall of mankind in Adam, their corruption, their forfeiture through and in him, are now openly denied. But hear what our church says upon these points. In the office for public baptism, we have these words, "Forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin, and that our Saviour Christ saith, none can enter into the kingdom of God, except he be regenerate and born anew of water and of the Holy Ghost." Mind, we are conceived in sin, and then born in sin, and it is necessary to be born anew of the Holy Spirit. The ninth article explains the matter thus:—

"Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to spirit."

The homilies are full of the same doctrine. The second part of the sermon on the misery of man has these words: "Thus we have heard, how evil we be of ourselves, who of ourselves, and by ourselves, we have no goodness, help, or salvation, but contrariwise, sin, damnation, and death everlasting; which, if we deeply weigh and consider, we shall the better understand the great mercy of God, and how our salvation cometh only by Christ: for in ourselves (as of ourselves) we find nothing whereby we may be delivered from this miserable captivity into the which we are cast through the envy of the devil, by breaking God's commandment in our first parent Adam. We are all become unclean; but we all are not able to cleanse ourselves, nor make one another of us clean. We are by nature the children of God's wrath; but we are not able to make ourselves the children and inheritors of God's glory. We are sheep that run astray; but we cannot of our own power come again to the sheepfold, so great s our imperfection and weakness."

These words want no comment: they describe our natural corruption by the fall in such clear and express terms, that all the art of sophistry cannot explain them away. I will confirm their testimony by two bishops of our church, that by the mouth of two witnesses the truth may be established. Bishop Wilkins, on Prayer, has these words:—

"All the pravity and baseness which fills up every part and power about us, are but diffusions of our original corruptions. What a world of mischief is there in our several parts—our wills, affections, our tongues, eyes! and yet all these are but as little rivulets; the fountain, or rather the sea, that feeds them, is our corrupt nature."

Bishop Beveridge shall be my other authority. The title of the fourth article of his Private Thoughts is this:—

"I believe that I was conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity; and that, ever since, I have been continually conceiving mischief and bringing forth vanity."

"This article of my faith I must of necessity believe, whether I will or no; for if I could not believe it to be true, I should therefore have the more cause to believe it to be so; because, unless my heart was naturally very sinful and corrupt, it would be impossible for me not to believe that which I have so much cause continually to bewail; or, if I do not bewail it, I have still the more cause to believe it, and therefore am so much the more persuaded of it by how much the less I find myself affected with it: for, certainly, I must be a hard-hearted wretch indeed, steeped in sin, and fraught with corruption to the highest, if I know myself so oft to have incensed the wrath of the most high God against me, as I do, and yet not be sensible of my natural corruption, nor acknowledge myself to be by nature a child of wrath, as well as others. For I verily believe that the want of such a due sense of myself argues as much original corruption as murder and whoredom do actual pollution: and I shall ever suspect those to be the most under the power of that corruption that labour most, by arguments, to divest it of its power.

"And therefore, for my own part, I am resolved, by the grace of God, never to go about to confute that, by wilful arguments, which I find so true by woful experience. If there be not a bitter root in my heart, whence proceeds so much bitter fruit in my life and conversation? Alas! I can neither set my head nor heart about any thing, but I still show myself to be the sinful offspring of sinful parents, by being the sinful parent of a sinful offspring; nay, I do not only betray the inbred venom of my heart, by poisoning my common actions, but even my most religious performances also with sin. I cannot pray, but I sin; I cannot hear, or preach a sermon, but I sin; I cannot give an alms, or receive the sacrament, but I sin; nay, I cannot so much as confess my sins, but my very confessions are still aggravations of them; my repentance needs to be repented of, my tears want washing, and the very washing of my tears needs still to be washed over again with the blood of my Redeemer. Thus, not only the worst of my sins, but even the best of my duties, speak me a child of Adam. Insomuch, that whensoever I reflect upon my past actions, methinks I cannot but look upon my whole life, from the time of my conception to this very moment, to be but as one continued act of sin.

"And whence can such a continued stream of corruption flow from, but from the corrupt cistern of my heart? And whence can that corrupt cistern of my heart be filled, but from the corrupt fountain of my nature? Cease, therefore, O my soul, to gainsay the power of original sin within thee, and labour now to subdue it under thee. But why do I speak of my subduing this sin myself? Surely this would be both an argument of it and an addition to it. It is to thee, O my God, who art both the searcher and cleanser of hearts, that I desire to make my moan: it is to thee I cry out in the bitterness of my soul. Oh, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Who shall? Oh! who can do it but thyself? Arise thou, therefore, O my God, and show thyself as infinitely merciful in the pardoning, as thou art infinitely powerful in the purging away my sins."

These words so clearly describe the great truth which I have endeavoured to establish in the following lectures, that I could not avoid citing them at full length. And now, if the reader will sum up the evidence, and impartially review what our articles, and homilies, and our bishops have taught concerning the corrupt fallen state of mankind, he will certainly acquit us of the charge of enthusiasm, who say nothing more than they have said, and who are obliged by our subscriptions to say all that they have said.

The second doctrine of Christianity, which is now ridiculed under the name of enthusiasm, is the free and full redemption of mankind through Jesus Christ, by whom we are justified from all the sinfulness and miseries of the fall.

The thirteenth article absolutely excludes every work of ours from having any hand in justifying us, and states the case thus: "Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive, or, as the school authors say, deserve grace of congruity; yea, rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin."

The title of the second homily is this: "A sermon on the salvation of mankind by ONLY Christ our Saviour from sin and death everlasting." This homily is divided into three parts: the last begins with these words: "It hath been manifestly declared unto you, that no man can fulfil the law of God; and therefore by the law all men are condemned; whereupon it followeth necessarily that some other thing should be required for our salvation than the law; and that is a true and lively faith in Christ bringing forth good works, and a life according to God's commandments. And also you heard the ancient fathers' minds of this saying—faith in Christ only justifieth man—so plainly declared, that you see that the very true meaning of this proposition or saying—we be justified by faith in Christ only—(according to the meaning of the old ancient authors) is this: we put our faith in Christ, that we be justified by him only, that we be justified by God's free mercy, and the merits of our Saviour Christ only, and by no virtue or good works of our own, that is in us, or that we can be able to have, or to do, for to deserve the same. Christ himself only being the cause meritorious thereof."

"Justification that is by faith is of mere grace and favour; no way of work or merit: for the act whereby faith justifies is an act of humility, and self-dereliction, and holy despair of any thing in ourselves, and a going to Christ, a receiving, a looking towards him, and his all-sufficiency; so that, as Mary said of herself, so we may say of faith—the Lord hath respect unto the lowliness of his grace—which is so far from looking inward for matter of justification, that itself, as it is a work of the heart, το credere, doth not justify, but only as it is an apprehension or taking hold of Christ. For as the hand in the very receiving of a thing must needs first make itself empty, (if it be full before, it must let all that go ere it can take hold on any other thing,) so faith, being a receiving of Christ, John i. 12, must needs suppose an emptiness in the soul before."

My good Bishop Beveridge is of the same opinion. In the eighth article of his Private Thoughts he has these words:—

"It is a matter of admiration to me, how any one that pretends to the use of his reason can imagine that he shall be accepted before God for what comes from himself: for how is it possible that I should be justified by good works when I can do no good works at all before I be justified? My works cannot be accepted as good until my person be so; nor can my person be accepted by God till first engrafted into Christ; before which engrafting into the true vine it is impossible I should bring forth good fruit; for the plowing of the wicked is sin, says Solomon, Prov. xxi. 4. Yea, the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord, chap. xv. 8, and if both the civil and spiritual actions of the wicked be sin, which of all their actions shall have the honour to justify them before God? I know not how it is with others: but, for my own part, I do not remember, neither do I believe, that I ever prayed in all my lifetime with that reverence, or heard with that attention, or received the sacrament with that faith, or did any other work whatsoever with that pure heart and single eye, as I ought to have done. Insomuch, that I look upon all my righteousnesses but as filthy rags; and it is in the robes only of the righteousness of the Son of God that I dare appear before the majesty of heaven."

I leave the reader to make his own remarks upon these authorities; for if he should deny the truth of the doctrine which they maintain, yet he cannot possibly deny that they do maintain it; and therefore, if we are enthusiasts for insisting upon the free and full redemption of mankind through Jesus Christ, by whom we are justified from all the miseries of the fall, then our articles and homilies, and the most pious and learned of our bishops, have not only led the way into this enthusiasm, but have also compelled us to walk in it; and therefore the hard name should fall upon them, and not upon us.

There is another doctrine which is mightily ridiculed at present; and that is, the necessity of the grace of the Holy Spirit to change and renew our corrupt nature in order to dispose us to receive the benefits of Christ's redemption, and to enable us to live a holy and a Christian life. This is at present the very touchstone of enthusiasm. If you seem but to favour this opinion, you are immediately suspected of being a little brainsick; and the moment you speak out, you are supposed to be fit for Bedlam. And grave, sober moralists, nay, large, solemn divines, give you over for a ruined man; and your very friends begin to be afraid that you will lose your usefulness. This treatment is unaccountable, and I believe will appear so to the candid reader, if he will but impartially consider the tenth article of our church:—

"The condition of man after the fall is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith, and calling upon God without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will and working with us when we have that good will."

The first part of the homily for Whitsunday has these words:—

"It is the Holy Ghost, and no other thing, that doth quicken the minds of men, stirring up good and godly motions in their hearts, which are agreeable to the will and commandment of God, such as otherwise, of their own crooked and perverse nature, they should never have. That which is born of the Spirit is Spirit; as who should say, Man of his own nature is fleshly and carnal, corrupt and naught, sinful and disobedient to God, without any spark of goodness in him, without any virtuous or godly motion, only given to evil thoughts and wicked deeds. As for the works of the Spirit, the fruits of faith, charitable and godly motions, if he have any at all in him, they proceed only of the Holy Ghost, who is the ONLY worker of our sanctification, and maketh us new men in Christ Jesus."

To the same effect, Bishop Reynolds, in his Sinfulness of Sin, p. 140:—

"Look into your hearts, and you shall find a very hell of uncleanness, full of deep and unsearchable deceit and wickedness, full of hardness: no sins, no judgments, no mercies, no allurements, no hopes, no fears, no promises, no instructions, able to startle, to awaken, to melt or shape it to a better image, without the immediate omnipotency of that God which melts the mountains, and turns stones into sons of Abraham."

In the same strain, Bishop Beveridge, whom I admire so much, because he was as great an enthusiast as myself, says :—

Resolution III.

" I am resolved, that as I am not able to think or do any thing that is good, without the influence of the divine grace; so I will not pretend to merit any favour from God, upon account of any thing I do for his glory and service.

" And indeed I may very well put this resolution among the rest; for should I resolve to perform my resolutions by mine own strength, I might as well resolve never to perform them at all: for truth itself, and mine own woful experience, hath convinced me that I am not able of myself so much as to think a good thought: and how then shall I be able, of myself, to resolve upon rules of holiness, according to the word of God, or to order my conversation according to these resolutions, without the concurrence of the divine grace."

If the reader will weigh these authorities carefully and impartially, I am very certain that he will acquit me of the charge of enthusiasm; for upon their evidence every minister of the church of England is bound to believe that all men fell in Adam, and that free and full redemption is offered to all men in Jesus Christ, by whose good Spirit our fallen nature is to be restored, and we may have grace and power to live a holy and a Christian life. This is my faith. In this I hope to live and die. And if our court brethren reckon me an enthusiast for embracing it, are they not dissenters for rejecting it? For do they not dissent from the articles and homilies of their own church, and from their own subscriptions? And an enthusiast, dress him up in ever so ridiculous a light, is a more amiable character than a dissenter of this stamp, who sets his hand to one thing and his heart to another, who subscribes to what he does not believe, and who has most solemnly engaged before God to build up those very doctrines which he is trying to preach down. An enthusiast, with all his mistakes, may be an honest man; but such persons are—what shall I call them? Surely not honest men. Reader, give them their proper name. Suppose the church of England had forced us to subscribe to enthusiastic doctrines, and we were enthusiasts enough to believe them; certainly we are less blameable than these persons who do not believe them, and yet do subscribe to them, rather than not be candidates for the high honours and revenues of the church. If they despise me, I shall not envy them. Let me be poor with a good conscience, and let them be rich. Let me be a despised enthusiast, and let them be highly honoured. May God make me thankful for what I hope for in the other world, and let them enjoy as much as they can get in this!

And now, reader, let me ask thee one plain question; and I beg of thee to answer it impartially. After what has been said, dost thou really take me to be an enthusiast? If thou dost, only consider that what thou callest enthusiasm in me is the doctrine of scripture, and of the articles and homilies of the church of England, and of her soundest bishops and ministers in her better days. But if thou givest me this hard name, because my brethren do not preach up the same doctrines which I do, how is that my fault? If they pay no regard to their subscriptions, why shouldst thou load me with reproach for their crime? If they dissent from the church, is that any reason why thou shouldst dissent from it, or why thou shouldst think the worse of me for not dissenting? But if thou wilt, nevertheless, call me an enthusiast, without any reason, nay against all reason, then I will learn to bear it. And may God forgive thee, as I do, from my heart; but I pray thee read no farther; stop here; throw the book into the fire; and it will save thee a good deal of vexation; and when thou art more open to conviction, perhaps I may lay something before thee that may be of service. In the mean time farewell!

But, reader, if thou dost not take me to be an enthusiast, I thank thee for thy good opinion. Peruse the following lectures, and compare them with the doctrines of scripture and of the reformation, and I doubt not but thou wilt be fully convinced of the antiquity and soundness of what is here advanced. Only let me give thee a friendly caution against being misled by a set of infidel writers, who pretend to give characters of books which they never read, in a thing called The Monthly Review, in which I have seen every sound doctrine of Christianity ridiculed and blasphemed, and every damnable heresy openly defended and maintained. I expect no favour from these men. I desire none. To be spoken of well by them would be indeed reproach; their abuses will do me service: and they may load me with enthusiasm; I will carry it patiently, and would suffer any infamy or torment upon earth rather than be answerable for their horrid blasphemies against Jehovah and his Christ. And I hope, reader, that the evidence which I have laid before thee will prevail against the scandal of these monthly reviewers. If thou art as indifferent about what they say of me as I am, it will not move thee at all; but thou wilt think the better of me, the more I am abused by them. And whenever thou seest an author degraded and vilified by them, if thou wilt take my advice, buy the book; depend upon it there is something very excellent in it; and I dare promise thou wilt never be disappointed.

I have nothing more, kind reader, to offer thee at present, but to commend thee to the grace and blessing of almighty God, who will, I hope, accompany thee in the reading of these lectures, and render them the means of making thee more thankful to Jesus Christ. And if thou dost indeed receive any benefit from them, give him all the glory. I expect no reward but to be remembered in thy prayers. And if thou wilt always mention me in thy addresses to the throne of grace, then I shall be bound to pray for thee. And may God hear us both, and enrich thee and me with all his graces and blessings in heavenly things, through Jesus Christ.

ON THE

SERMON I.

PSALM cvii. 1, 2, 3.

O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy, and gathered them out of the lands, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south.

THE book of Psalms is a treasury of divine knowledge. It contains a complete collection of sacred hymns, which were composed in praise of the blessed Jesus, whose miraculous birth, whose life and actions, sufferings and death, resurrection and ascension, and investiture and supreme power on the throne of glory—his gathering the church out of all lands, and protecting it to the end of the world against its enemies, and then putting it in possession of eternal glory—are the subjects here treated of: and they are the most noble and elevated subjects in themselves, and, besides, they are the most interesting to every believer: every part of them is full of wonder and miracle, which deserve his greater attention and esteem, because each of them was done for his salvation. And the author, who undertook to write upon these subjects has not fallen below their dignity: he has recommended them to us by all the graces of language and the sublimity of sentiment. His poetry is worthy of himself, and rises up to the merits of that adorable person whom it celebrates: for it came from heaven. The Psalms were not the composition of King David, or the flights of his poetical imagination; he was only the scribe, who copied them from the dictates of the all-wise Spirit: they are indeed the inspiration of the Almighty, whose the matter is, and from whom the words themselves proceeded. And if any persons doubt of it, let them take any one description of nature out of the Psalms and compare it with what the best heathen authors have said on the same subject, and they will see reason enough to be abashed and confounded at the abject poverty of the human genius, when put in competition with the infinite perfection of the inspired volume. And how should it be otherwise? The heathens had no such subject, nor no such inspirer. They were ignorant of the person and excellencies of the great Deliverer of mankind; and how then could they sing his praises? Or if they had known of him, yet they had no infinitely wise author, no eternal Spirit, to dictate to them: their highest poetry was but the work of men, and of very ignorant men too: but this collection of hymns was indeed the work of God: and, coming from him, it is as much superior to any human composition, as the infinite Author is superior to his creatures. On this account it deserves our greatest esteem and veneration; and we cannot value it too much, since we have here a richer treasury of heavenly knowledge than is any where else to be met with. And may we look upon it in this light, and treat it accordingly. May it be our continual study and delight until we enter into the spirit of these divine hymns, and reap all the instruction and profit from them, which God intended they should be the means of administering to his church!

And I hope the same Spirit who recorded this particular hymn which I purpose to explain in the course of these lectures will be graciously pleased to accompany us in the explanation of it, and to give us his blessing. He left it upon record, as a lesson of gratitude, to inspire us with thanksgiving and praise to our blessed Saviour; and we always want to be stirred up to the practice of this duty. Our hearts are strangely averse to it; they are by nature unholy and unthankful; and, whatever we may talk of our fancied moral rectitude, and how pleasing a thing it is to be grateful to one another, yet, with respect to God, we are not, nor is it pleasing to us to endeavour to be, grateful: for we are always, every moment of our lives, receiving mercies from God; but how few moments do we spend in making proper acknowledgments for them! And they who endeavour the most to be sincerely thankful, yet often find their affections cold and languid, and want fresh motives to warm and inflame them: and even they, who have the greatest knowledge of the abundant mercies of God their Creator and Redeemer, and have a grateful sense of them, yet freely confess that they are not so grateful as they could wish; and it grieves them to find that they do not love God in so perfect a degree as they ought to love him: and therefore the subject of this Psalm will be useful to us all: we all stand in need of every assistance which can help us to render proper thanksgiving and praise to our sovereign Lord and Saviour. And the Holy Spirit here offers us his assistance: he left us this hymn to be the means of inspiring us with grateful hearts, and he will doubtless accompany his own means with his own grace. May he help us to meditate upon it with devout and humble tempers, that He, who is now in the midst of us, and from whom no secrets are hid, may dispose us to make a right use of his sacred word, and may pour down his grace plentifully upon us, filling our souls with praise and gratitude to the God of our salvation.

Before I enter upon the distinct consideration of the several parts of the Psalm, I judge it will be useful to lay before you a general plan of the whole, that you may afterwards more readily follow me when I come to particulars. And this shall be my present subject. Upon the first reading of the Psalm, every believer will observe the principal scope and design of it, which are contained under these four points:—

First, We are called upon to be thankful for redemption, in the three first verses.

Secondly, From the 4th verse to the 33rd, the reasons for our thankfulness are assigned, which are taken from God's redeeming us from the lowest state of sin and misery. And,

Thirdly, From his manner of protecting us after we are redeemed and brought into his church, from the 34th to the 42nd verse. And,

Fourthly, In the two last verses, we have the application, exhorting us to study and to understand those mercies of redemption, that we may be full of thanksgiving and praise for them.

This is the general plan. The Author is the Holy Spirit. The subject is thanksgiving to Christ the Redeemer. The motives here urged, to incite us to practise this duty, are taken from the many great and inestimable blessings of redemption. In order to give us clear and just ideas of this redemption, the Holy Spirit has selected four images from nature to represent the exquisite distress and misery of man in his natural state: they are the most striking images which he who knows our hearts could set before us, and they are so highly finished that they want no grace or ornament which infinite wisdom itself was able to give them. He compares us, while we lay in our natural fallen state, first, to men who have lost their way in a desolate wilderness and are ready to perish with hunger; secondly, to men, who are fallen into the pit of darkness and the shadow of death, where they lay bound in misery and iron; thirdly, to men who have such a weak and vitiated appetite, that they loathe even the smell of wholesome meat; and fourthly, to men who in the utmost distress at sea in a violent storm. These four images, put together, make a complete picture of our miserable fallen condition; and the persons who are in this condition are supposed in the Psalm to be brought to a deep sense of its misery; they feel their own guilt, and dread its punishment; conscience is awakened and alarmed; and the smart and anguish of it grow insupportable. This seems very afflicting; but it is the work of God. He makes them feel their misery, that the sense of it may force them to seek relief where only it is to be found; for no sooner do they send up their petitions to the throne of grace, than the almighty Saviour instantly sends them deliverance, as it is remarked in each of these four instances, that when they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, then he delivered them out of their distress. He was disposed to grant them help long before they were willing to receive it. And such was his redeeming love, so abundant were the riches of his mercy to those distressed objects, that he not only delivered them, but also bestowed upon them every manner of thing that is good. Although he had freely lifted them up from the lowest state of sin and misery, yet he never once upbraided them with their former wretchedness, never withheld his loving-kindness, nor stopped the current of his favours; but pardoned them, and justified them, and still went on sanctifying them, until he placed the crown of eternal glory upon their heads. Oh! what a love was this! What infinite mercy was it to take these miserable sinners from the vilest sink of corruption, and to exalt them to be the most glorious saints in heaven! Does not this call aloud for your gratitude? Is not this the highest instance of God's redeeming mercy—of that very mercy which is said to be over all his works? for it is to us sinners, above them all in degree, and beyond them all in duration. And how then can we refrain from that just tribute of praise which the Holy Spirit calls upon us, under each of these four instances, to pay to our great Deliverer. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and declare the wonders that he doth for the children of men! After these four instances of man's exquisite distress and misery by nature, and of his full and perfect recovery by grace, the Psalmist goes on to describe the flourishing state of the Gentile church, when the Jewish should be cast off and rejected. And this part of the Psalm is like the preceding, elevated and sublime. From the 32nd to the 39th verse, the Christian church is represented under the image of a well-watered country, where the face of nature is all verdant and blooming; where the earth produces its grain, the trees their fruit in great abundance; where you see plenty smiling around you, and peace securing the possession, and grace giving a relish to the enjoyment of this happy scene. God thus turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and the dry ground into water-springs; and there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may sow the field, and plant vineyards, which may yield them fruits of increase: he blesseth them also, &c. Such is the Gentile church; but the Jewish, now cast off and rejected, is compared to a desolate wilderness, where there is neither standing water nor water-springs, where you see nothing growing, not the least verdure appears; there is not one single field sown with grain; not one flourishing tree lifts up its fruitful head; neither the olive nor the vine take root in this barren soil: so that there is neither wine to make glad the heart of man, nor oil to make him of a cheerful countenance. The whole prospect is one dry desolate wilderness.

And this part of the Psalm is fulfilled. The Christian church has been in this flourishing condition, and the Jewish church is now like a sandy wilderness—neither refreshed with the dew of heaven, nor made fertile by the streams of divine grace: and for want of their genial influence it is so parched and burnt up, that nothing grows either for use or ornament.

And the same gracious Governor and Saviour of the world, who rejected the Jews, and cast them into this barren wilderness, because they rejected him, and cast him off from being Lord over them, can and will also humble us in the same manner, if we be guilty of the same crime. The present wretched state of the Jews is a standing lesson to those persons who will not receive Jesus for their God: and may his grace dispose them to make a right use of this lesson, lest it should soon be exemplified in their own destruction! for we of this church and kingdom have much to fear from our national infidelity. Several churches and kingdoms have been destroyed for this crime; and the Holy Spirit, in the 39th and 40th verses of this Psalm, declares that this is the common method of our Lord's providence. Whenever a people, after various calls and admonitions from heaven (and we have had many such lately), still remain incorrigible in their deistical opinions about Christ's divinity, and their treasonable practices against him, then his good spirit no longer strives with them, but gives them over to a reprobate mind. And again, they are diminished and brought low, through oppression, affliction, and sorrow. The Christians are certainly diminished and brought low; they are diminished in number, and brought low in circumstances, insomuch that we have great reason to apprehend our candlestick may be soon removed, and the light of the pure gospel may shine no more among us. Were it not that our God is good, we might expect to be finally cut off: but the mercies of Jesus are infinite: he has borne with us long. Oh that his long-suffering may not be wearied out, but may have the desired effect, and lead us to repentance: so iniquity shall not be our ruin. Blessed Jesus! spare us a little; and let our people have one more offer of thy grace and mercy before the destroying angel be sent to visit us and cut us off.

After this striking account of the various states and revolutions of the church, there follows, in the 41st verse, a most sweet promise to the few poor followers of the Redeemer:—Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction—the poor in spirit he removes out of the reach of affliction—the God, in whom they trust, will protect and keep them safe amidst public calamities. No evil shall come nigh to hurt them. When a nation is visited for their infidelity, and is scourged with the sharp rod of war or pestilence, then the destroying angel shall have no power over them. Their almighty God and Saviour will encamp around them; and then, says the prophet, "Though a host of men were set against me, yet would not my heart be afraid; and though there rose up war against me, yet will I put my trust in him." He trusted in God's promises; and he had good reason; for he has engaged to be an impregnable wall of brass around his faithful people when they are threatened with persecution or distress: and must not these persons be quite out of the reach of evil, who are surrounded with a brazen wall, and the Almighty himself guards and defends it? And this was his promise to Jeremiah, and, through him, to every believer in the same circumstances, Jer. xv. 20: "And I," says God, "will make thee unto this people a fenced brazen wall: and they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee: for I am with thee to save thee, and to deliver thee, saith the Lord." He will save and deliver his people, and they shall be at peace, while the rest of the world is at war: for he setteth the poor on high, out of the reach of affliction; and then it follows, he maketh him households, like a flock of sheep. No shepherd can watch over his flock with a more tender care, or provide better for their welfare, than the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls provides for his flock: under his most affectionate and almighty protection, each of them is so completely happy, that he can truly declare, "The Lord is my shepherd, therefore can I lack nothing." And having thus experienced the love and care of the chief Shepherd, how can they withhold from him that just tribute of praise and gratitude which he demands?

These are such great and weighty points, and we are so nearly concerned in them, that we ought not to pass them by unnoticed; for our present and eternal salvation depend on our interest in them, and therefore they should be constantly in our thoughts, that, by meditating upon them properly, they may be the means of inspiring us with continual gratitude. And the Holy Spirit recorded them in this Psalm for this very purpose, and every believer applies them to the same end. His redemption—the guilt and misery from which he was redeemed—the free grace of the Redeemer—the great and endless blessings which he purchased for us freely, and which he bestows without money and without price—blessings truly inestimable—in this world the greatest we are capable of receiving—in the next world the highest he has to give, and of the same duration with himself, even infinite and eternal blessings. Who can think on these blessings without thanksgiving? For what must your hearts be if there be any little dirty groveling object upon this earth which engages your thoughts, and fixes your affections, in preference to these infinite and eternal blessings? Oh! what low creatures are we, notwithstanding our boasted dignity, and fancied rectitude! How abjectly base are we, to prefer shadows to substance, and time to eternity! to spend our lives in the concerns of this perishing world, and to have no thought or care about the business of the eternal world! This is so irrational and absurd, and so monstrously wicked, that it is indeed sinking ourselves below the beasts that perish. And although never did more men act this low part than at present, yet was there never more boasting of the dignity of human nature. And, what is the worst of all, our moral rectitude and our other high metaphysical notions are so far from setting us right, that they indispose us to receive the only remedy which can cure us. Where nature fails, what can come in to our aid, but grace?—and the grace of God is now an exploded opinion. To talk of it is mere enthusiasm, and to urge the scriptures, which speak of it, and which maintain its necessity, this is called religious rant and madness: for the metaphysician wants none of the aids of grace to lead him into all truth, nor does the moralist want any assistance from grace to enable him to practise the whole duty of man. And it can be to little purpose to persuade persons under these strong delusions to think seriously about their redemption, and to take a view of their misery without it; for they are prejudiced. They love and cherish the opposite opinions: and to work upon men of these tempers requires some power superior to human. God alone is equal to it. And may he open the eyes of this deluded generation, that they may be disposed to hear the comfortable doctrines delivered in this Psalm, and to receive them in such a manner, that they may see the wonderful mercies of God in redemption, and may, together with the righteous, rejoice and give thanks. And when this great and happy event shall be brought about (may our almighty God and Saviour effect it soon), then it follows, in the 42nd verse, All iniquity shall stop her mouth. The adversary shall be silenced. The enemies of our Lord, seeing his tender care and watchful providence over his people, and finding all their attempts against them unsuccessful, shall hold their peace. They shall be silenced, if not convinced. They shall be confounded at the wonders, which the Lord shall work for the salvation of men, and shall have no power to object, either to the Redeemer or to his redeemed people—all iniquity shall stop her mouth.

Oh! that will be a happy day. When shall we see it? When shall iniquity be struck dumb? We hear it daily in our streets uttering hard speeches against the Lord and against his Christ—against them, although our Lord's divinity be secured by the fundamental laws of this land, yet we have volumes upon volumes published; against them the more polite part of the world retail the daring blasphemies of these volumes; and against them the common people begin to suck in greedily the blasphemies of their superiors. When shall we see an end of these impieties? O God, let it be soon. Let iniquity soon stop her mouth, and let it never be opened again, to object to those wise and gracious methods by which thou hast decreed to bring many sons unto glory through Jesus Christ.

I am now come to the 43rd verse, where the Holy Spirit calls upon every reader to meditate upon the great subjects treated of in this Psalm, "Whoso is wise will observe these things"—whoever has a true taste and relish for spiritual matters, and is blessed with the true wisdom that is from above, he will observe these things: he will make his remarks upon them with judgment: he will meditate upon them often, study them much, and delight himself in them greatly: and therefore, having this Psalm and the other scriptures for his direction, whereby he may investigate and trace out the ways of providence, it will be the whole bent of his soul to attain this wisdom. And there is no part of the subject which affords more curious, and at the same time more interesting, meditations than the view of the wonders which God hath done for the redemption of man. Every time they are judiciously reviewed, we see fresh matter for adoration and praise. Our hearts grow warm with the sense of them, our affections kindle, and our love to our most blessed Redeemer is inflamed. Whoso is wise will meditate thus to his profit, and he will so observe, so remark, what he hears and reads, as to grow the wiser for hearing, and the better for reading. And would to God every one of us were wise to observe the great points of our redemption! The Holy Spirit calls upon us to remark them; and he declares that we are not wise unless we observe them. Whoso is wise, will observe these things. If this be the only wisdom, oh how few of us are wise indeed!—how very few are wise in the judgment of the Holy Spirit! Most of us are wise enough in other matters, and are deeply read in what does not concern us; but in this great point we are very babes: we have not learned our first rudiments. And certainly we have been too long children in understanding: it is now high time to seek for wisdom; and there is no wisdom worth seeking but that which is here mentioned; viz. such wisdom as enables us to understand the wonderful works of God in our redemption, and then disposes us to practise what we understand, and further gives us the power, as well as the will, to live up to it. And does wisdom, true and perfect wisdom like this, grow upon our earth? Hear what a venerable patriarch thought of this matter: "But where shall wisdom be found? And where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof; neither is it found in the land of the living," Job xxviii. 12. This was Job's opinion. If you refuse to subscribe to it, tell us where the true wisdom is to be found. Is it taught in any of the schools of modern philosophy? Can the metaphysician soar high enough to the regions of this wisdom, and bring it down to mortal view? Or can the professors of ethics teach it us among the rules of their morality? Alas! alas! it is far above the reach of their highest attainments even to discover it, and much more to practise it; for the subjects on which it is exercised are the high and deep things of God, of which philosophy can know nothing. The great apostle gives this reason, 1 Cor. ii. 14: "But the natural man (and would to God philosophers were not such!) receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." And this spiritual discernment is the wisdom that is from above. It is not a learned attainment, but it is the gift of the Holy Spirit; and the proud philosopher so much disdains to seek it from his grace, that he calls it extravagant enthusiasm even to suppose that the Holy Spirit will give it. But if this be enthusiasm, the scripture is full of it. "The Lord," says Solomon, "giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding," Prov. ii. 6; and it is written in the prophets, "And they shall be all taught of God." And again, in the New Testament: "If any of you lack wisdom"—what shall we do?—go and study systems of ethics, and read volumes of morality? No. We must take a method that is now reckoned the highest madness of enthusiasm. "If any of you lack wisdom," says St. James, "let him ask it of God." How strangely this sounds! Ask it of God! What! is he the only giver of this wisdom? He is: for he giveth to all men, who ask it in faith, liberally, and upbraideth not. Let these men, who are wise above what is written, call it what they please, to ask wisdom of God: yet these promises are clear and full, and the humble Christian rests upon them, and knows them to be infallible; for he has experienced their truth. And may the almighty Spirit so bring down and humble our natural pride, that we may all have this happy experience, and may find the last words of the Psalm verified in ourselves—Whoso is wise will observe these things, and they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord, i. e. they shall know it clearly and fully, and they shall have a lively sense of it upon their hearts: for they had before made their remarks upon it, and had laid together their observations, and had applied them to use, and then the knowledge became experimental. And the original word, as well as the meaning of the passage, justifies this construction; for the verb which we render, and they shall understand, is in the conjugation hithpael, which is peculiar to the sacred tongue, and which is used here to denote that they should build themselves up by this understanding; it should produce its proper effects upon themselves, and the end of knowing it should be fully answered. By which means it could not be a matter of mere science or dry speculation, but would produce many great and blessed consequences, enabling them to taste and see that the Lord was merciful, and filling their hearts with thanksgiving and praise for all his mercies.

I have now laid before you the general plan of the whole Psalm. You see, the great subject here treated of is redemption; and the proper disposition of mind with which we are to consider it, is a thankful heart: and the Holy Spirit recorded this sacred hymn to be the means of exciting in us thankfulness. And may his grace and blessing go along with these lectures upon it, and bring them home with such power and evidence to your hearts, that his gracious intentions in recording it may be fully answered! And if it be the sincere desire of your souls—if you indeed wish to find profit from these lectures—then I will only detain you while I give you two or three short exhortations relating to the general plan which I have laid before you.

The first is an exhortation to the reading of the Psalm, which I hope you will frequently do in private. It is an abstract of the whole Bible: for the two great subjects of the Old Testament and the New are man's sin and misery by nature, and his recovery by grace; and these are here clearly, though briefly, discussed. You will therefore greatly profit from reading it, if you remember the four chief parts of what it consists; viz.

First, An exhortation to thanksgiving, in the three first verses, for redemption.

Secondly, The reasons for our thanksgiving, from the 4th to the 33rd verse, relating to man's misery before redemption. And,

Thirdly, Reasons relating to Christ's manner of governing the church after it is redeemed, from the 34th to the 42nd verse. And,

Fourthly, The application, exhorting us to study and to understand these mercies of redemption, that our thanksgiving may flow from a grateful heart. The more you read the Psalm in this view, the better you will understand it, and the more reason you will find to admire its excellencies. And,

Secondly, I would not only exhort you to read it much, but also to pray for that humble, teachable temper, which alone can render the reading of it profitable to your souls. It is the word of God; it is the instruction which the all-wise Spirit has provided in order to inspire you with love and thankfulness to your most adorable Saviour. And when he vouchsafes to instruct you, hear with all humility, and learn of him the words of eternal life. Let his will be yours—his commandments your delight. But

Thirdly, Let it be chiefly remembered from whence the blessing of all is to come: for neither can the humble frame of mind, nor the benefit arising from it, be attained by our own abilities. They must both come from one and the same Spirit. God must first teach us the grace of humility, and then enable us to reap profit from it: for he is the giver of every good and spiritual gift. So that whenever you begin to read this or any other portion of scripture, if you desire it should be profitable to your souls, always look up to the Holy Spirit, and desire his gracious assistance. This was the prophet's method: "Lord, open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." And these wondrous things we may also behold if we read the law of God, as he did, with humility and prayer. And if you desire to see the wonderful wisdom of God in the plan of your redemption, you must use the prophet's words—Lord, open thou mine eyes to see it: for you could no more see this wisdom unless the day-star was arisen and shone bright in your hearts, than you could see those outward objects unless the light of the sun shone in your eyes. And therefore, convinced of this, let so many of us as lack wisdom now ask it of God: and I know of no words more significant and expressive, nor yet more devout and pious, than these of our own church, which I shall apply to the present occasion.

O almighty and eternal Spirit, who hast caused this sacred hymn to be written for our learning, send down thy blessing upon our studies in it; and grant that we may in such wise hear it, read it, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it, that, by patience and comfort of thy holy word, we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

SERMON II.

PSALM cvii. 1, 2, 3.

O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy; and gathered them out of the lands, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south.

IN the last lecture I laid before you the general plan of this sacred hymn. The great subject of it is thanksgiving. The motives to induce us to be thankful are taken from the mercies of God. We are bound to bless and praise his holy name for every instance of his goodness, but above all for that inestimable instance of his love, in redeeming us from the lowest state of sin and misery, and then freely bestowing upon us pardon and peace in this world, and eternal life and glory in the next. The Holy Spirit insists chiefly upon this instance, trying to awaken in us some sense of gratitude for these blessings of redemption. His arguments are the most likely to work upon our hearts; and therefore I will endeavour to open and explain them, trusting to his guidance, and hoping for his blessing.

And may he now take all our hearts into his protection, and drive away every vain intruding thought which would either dissipate our attention or distract our affections; and give us, O Holy Spirit, the hearing ear, to know what it is to be thankful, and the understanding heart, to be able to practise it, that, when we finish our present meditations, we may be the better for them, and may be the more disposed to join in praise and thanksgiving to Jesus Christ, our most adorable God and Saviour.

The Holy Spirit has set the blessings of redemption before us in so clear and striking a light, that they who are not affected with the view of them in this Psalm, must be dead to all sense of gratitude. But I would hope there are not many such among you. Every one of you may not, perhaps, be actuated by the most lively and warm sentiments of thanks to your blessed Redeemer; but you have no objection against having your hearts more inflamed with his love: rather, you wish your hearts were more his than they are, and that your affections were placed and fixed upon him with more delight. Come, then, ye who are thus disposed, and hear how many powerful motives the Holy Spirit has used to inspire you with sincere gratitude to the God of your salvation. "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever." Thus he begins the Psalm, calling upon you to practise the sweet duty of thanksgiving, which arises from our experience of the Redeemer's mercies; and therefore we cannot but receive great delight whenever we so remember his mercies as to find still stronger motives to bless and praise him for them. And this is what we are called upon to practise in the first words—O give thanks—and the duty may be thus defined: Thanksgiving is a grateful expression of praise, arising from a heart sensible of the mercies of redemption. Because I shall always use the word in this sense, I must desire you to remember that by thanksgiving I mean a grateful expression of praise, &c. It is such a grateful expression of praise as comes from the heart: for no man will praise God until he has some sense and perception of God's mercy; and praise is not a lip-service; it does not consist in uttering a set of thankful words; it is not the praise of the mouth, but of the heart. Religious praise is the service of the affections, and flows from true and hearty love to that object which we praise; for we are always ready enough to praise the thing that we delight in. Whatever is the dear object of our affections, on it we are lavish enough of our praises. The heart will command all the faculties to be where its treasure is—attending upon it with their tribute of praise. And if Jesus the Redeemer be our treasure, then we shall constantly attend upon him with the praises of a grateful heart: but he cannot be our treasure until we desire to have some interest in him; and therefore I add, in the last words of the definition, that the heart must be sensible of the mercies of redemption; for it is certain we cannot be disposed to thank God for mercies of which we have no desire to taste, neither indeed will we thank him, unless we have a lively perception, and are perfectly sensible of his mercies: consequently, our thanksgiving will be according to our sense of them. If we find him bestowing upon us great and numerous and unmerited favours, then our thanks will rise in proportion to what we experience. But still, he who has no sense of God's mercies, can have no motive to offer him any thanks; because thanksgiving is only expressing with the mouth, and the other faculties, what the heart feels; and therefore, if the heart, which is the spring, be not moved, it is impossible the other faculties should have any motion. The Psalmist says, "O praise the Lord: for it is a good thing to sing praises unto our God; yea, a joyful and pleasant thing it is to be thankful." Here he supposes that we must first rejoice in the mercies of God before we can find it a joyful and pleasant thing to be thankful for them; because we cannot return him praises with joy for that in which we have found no joy. It is as impossible for us to rejoice in that thing, of which we have not an affectionate sense and perception, as it would be for a dead man to rejoice: and therefore thanksgiving can arise only from a grateful heart, which is sensible of the blessings of redemption.

This is the nature of the duty: the reasons for practising it follow—O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good. He is essential goodness, being the origin and fountain from whence all created goodness flowed. Goodness in the Deity denotes that disposition whereby he is inclined to communicate happiness. It was owing to this beneficent attribute that he created the beautiful system of the world out of nothing, and made all the living creatures in it to share and partake of his goodness: and therefore, after he had finished the works of creation and formation, he pronounced them all to be very good. And they were good, and they continued so, until sin corrupted them: for sin brought in all evil which is the opposite to goodness, and then the remembrance of God's former goodness only aggravated our guilt, and made our evil more inexcusable: and before our guilty consciences could be set at rest, we must have a firm reliance upon some more amiable attribute than goodness, which we sinners had offended against, and which does not imply any disposition to forgive the offence. God had been good to the innocent; but he must be just to sinners. If he had freely exercised his goodness to us while innocent, yet, when we offended, we put ourselves out of the reach of his goodness, and then justice took place: and when justice was extreme, to mark what we had done amiss, what could sinful wretched man hope for? Nothing from goodness; because its former favours had been abused and repaid with ingratitude: therefore guilt and misery must have been our portion for ever, unless some more gracious attribute than goodness should be revealed to us; and therefore the Holy Spirit makes mercy, even eternal mercy, wait upon goodness, that it may become a proper subject of thanksgiving: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever." Goodness was shown to the innocent—mercy is for the guilty: and we can thank God for the goodness of creation when we have experienced the mercies of redemption. Mercy is that disposition in the Deity, whereby he is inclinable to relieve the miserable: it is the attribute of pity and compassion, which can be exercised only upon those who are in distress. Mercy has for its object sin, with all its miserable consequences; and it is exercised in removing them; and the person by whom it is exercised is our most compassionate high priest, Christ Jesus, to whose mercy it is owing that we were not consumed: for when goodness could no longer employ its kind offices for us, then our merciful God was pleased to bring into execution that gracious plan of redemption which had been contrived before all worlds, and by which many sons were to be brought into glory. The holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, out of infinite love and compassion, were pleased to agree upon this plan, and to sustain distinct offices in the economy of it; and as their persons are equally infinite, their economical actions must consequently be equally infinite. God the Father covenanted to demand perfect satisfaction for sin, and to accept the perfect satisfaction made by the obedience and sufferings of God the Son, which he covenanted to make in our stead, and as our representative in the human nature: and God the Holy Spirit covenanted to render the obedience and sufferings of Christ effectual to believers, and by his grace to carry on the whole work of redemption in their hearts. St. Paul assures us that the covenant of grace, which is the fountain of all mercy, was made before the foundation of the world; and this he repeats in several of his Epistles. The Psalmist teaches the same doctrine, and frequently calls upon us to thank God, because his mercy is for ever and ever—because his mercy is everlasting—and, in the next text, because his mercy endureth for ever. The word endureth is inserted by the translators; for there is no verb in the original; neither, in strictness of speech, could there be any: because there was no time wherein this mercy was not exercised, neither will there be any time when the exercise of it will fail. It was begun before all worlds, when the covenant of grace was made; and it will continue to the ages of eternity, after this world is destroyed. So that mercy was, and is, and will be, for ever; and sinful, miserable man, may always find relief from this eternal mercy, whenever the sense of his misery disposes him to seek for it. And does not this motive loudly call upon us to give thanks, because there is mercy with God—mercy to pity the miserable—and even to relieve them—although they do not deserve it; for mercy is all free grace and unmerited love. Oh! how adorable then and gracious is this attribute! How sweet is it, and full of consolation to the guilty! May God bring all the comforts of it to your hearts; and if you desire, if you would know, what these comforts are, ask the redeemed of the Lord, and they will tell you, that his mercies are great beyond description. They can say, upon their own experience, that they have found the mercies of redemption to be in number, in value, and in duration, more and greater than they can express: and to their experience the Holy Spirit refers you in the 2nd verse: The redeemed of the Lord shall say so—they shall say that he is good, and that his mercies are eternal. What, then, is this redemption of which they speak in such high terms? And why do they make it the chief subject of their thanksgiving? The reason follows—because he redeemed them from the hand of the enemy. Moses has given us, in the law, a clear and full idea of what we are to understand by the word gal, here rendered redeemed. If any person was either sold for a slave, or carried away for a captive, then his kinsman who was nearest to him in blood had the right and equity of redemption. But no other person was suffered to redeem. And such a kinsman is called the redeemer, when he paid down the price for which his relation was sold to be a slave, or paid the ransom for which he was led captive. And there is another remarkable instance in the law, wherein it was provided, that, in case any person was found murdered, then the nearest to him in blood was to prosecute the murderer, and to bring him to justice; and this nearest relation, thus avenging the murder, is called by the same name—a redeemer. And how beautifully is the office of our great Redeemer represented under these three instances! He was to us such a redeemer in spirituals, as these were in temporals: for sin had brought all mankind into slavery and captivity, and had murdered us. We are slaves to sin, and captives to Satan. St. Paul confesses both: sold under sin, says he, and led away captive under the law of sin. And in this state of bondage and captivity we had a most cruel tyrant to reign over us; even he who was a murderer from the beginning, and who employed us in those slavish services, where we could find no peace in time, nor any rest to eternity: for he gave us no wages but death—death of the body in this world, and death of the soul from God in the next world for ever. O miserable man! who shall deliver thee? who shall redeem thee from the body of this death? Thou art entirely, eternally miserable in thyself; but thou mayst thank God, through Christ our Lord, that there is a Redeemer who is able to save thee. He has every qualification which the law required in a redeemer; and he is besides almighty; for he is true and very God, equal in all things with the Father and the Holy Spirit: and as soon as sin was in the world, he entered upon his gracious office of redeemer; for he was the Lamb slain in type and figure from the foundation of the world. And when he had a body prepared for him, wherein he was to be slain indeed, and was made flesh of our flesh, then he completed the legal character of a redeemer. When he was pleased to unite our human nature to his divine, then he was nearest of kin to us. By this wonderful union he became our brother, and next to us in blood: and thus he was perfectly able to fulfil the law of our redemption, which suffered none to have the right and equity of redeeming, except the nearest kinsman. And to this our God condescended. Oh, amazing instance of his divine love! that God should be united to man, and partake of our human nature, that we might partake of his divine! this is the great mystery of godliness. We can never adore, never praise him enough for it, because by it we receive full redemption. This most high God, who was also man, united in one Christ, came into the world to redeem us. And the same person, being both God and man, must merit for us, as God, in what he did for us as man. Accordingly, by the merits of his obedience and sufferings, he paid the price of our redemption, and we were no longer the servants of sin; and by his most precious blood shed upon the cross, by his death and resurrection, he overcame both death and him who had the power of death: and by delivering us in this manner from slavery and captivity, he fulfilled the third part of the Redeemer's office: for Satan was the murderer from the beginning, who had given both body and soul a mortal wound of sin, which was certain death and eternal misery. And the Redeemer came to avenge the murder. He took our cause in hand, as being our nearest kinsman; and it cost him his own life to avenge ours. He shed his own blood upon the cross to avenge our blood; and he died, that we might be brought back to life; and then he rose again, to demonstrate his victory over the infernal murderer. And he has now all power in heaven and earth, that he may effectually redeem every one who desires to be freed from the slavery of sin, from the captivity of Satan, and the power of death. Such is our all-sufficient Redeemer! and when we know and taste of his redeeming love, how can we then forbear to be thankful? Since he has redeemed us from the hand of the enemy, we cannot be silent in his praises: we must speak of them. He has been so good and gracious to us, that it would be acting against our own sense and feeling if we did not praise his holy name: for we were in vile slavery to sin, and he redeemed us: we were in cruel captivity to Satan, and he redeemed us: we were under the power of death, temporal and eternal, and he redeemed us. And can we possibly forget how miserable we were in ourselves, and yet how happy we are become in the Redeemer? And while we remember this, what must we be, if ever we cease to give him thanks and praises? He was to us a most blessed and most loving Redeemer: for that he, whom all the heavenly host adore, would vouchsafe to look down with pity upon our wretched state, and would descend from the throne of his eternal glory to visit us vile sinners—slaves—and captives—nay, would become our brother, our nearest kinsman, that he might be our lawful Redeemer—nay more, would come to suffer and to die for his own rebellious creatures!—this was the most wonderful condescension of our Lord Jesus. And ought it not to endear him to us exceedingly? Should not our hearts overflow with gratitude, and our tongues incessantly break forth into praise, for such unmerited love? Oh may he raise our hearts, and exalt our affections from every lower object to the contemplation of his infinite love! There never was, nor is to be, any love like our Redeemer's to us. Happy are we; if there be no love in our breasts like what we bear to him! The love of our God coming from heaven, taking our nature, obeying and suffering in it, bleeding and dying upon the cross to redeem us—us miserable vile sinners—here is all that we can admire; here is all that we can adore. Jesus, our Lord, claims our highest admiration, our lowest adoration; so that his praises are a subject which can never be exhausted: for they are to be our employment and happiness for ever, and we become fitted for them, indeed we begin them, by our present thankfulness. O thou almighty Saviour! make us daily more and more thankful, that, by the continual exercise of thanksgiving upon earth, we may be prepared to sing the praises of our redeeming God for ever and ever.

The next motive, mentioned in the third verse, is peculiar to us heathen nations; viz. that Christ "hath redeemed us and gathered us out of all lands, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south." If any thing can inspire us with gratitude, this motive should prevail, because we cannot but feel the force of it, as it reminds us of that misery from which we in particular were redeemed. The Gentiles had wandered from God, and were so lost and bewildered in the mazes of error and superstition, that nothing but the almighty love of our Lord Jesus could have gathered them together into one church. All the heathen world lay in darkness and in the shadow of death, until the Sun of righteousness arose upon them with the bright beams of the gospel: they were ignorant, immoral, idolatrous; and because they had no desire to retain God in their memory, he therefore gave them over to a reprobate mind; and then, being utterly forsaken of him, they ran greedily into every kind of impurity and abominable uncleanness. St. Paul has given us a melancholy account of the Roman morals, at a time when we have been taught that polite learning flourished among them in its highest perfection. Read his first chapter to the Romans, and you will find that they were monsters of impiety, although they could write with all the elegance and beauty of classical learning. And the rest of the heathen nations were not indeed so corrupt, but they were sunk as low in ignorance and superstition as the Romans, and particularly our ancestors in this island, who were poor blind idolaters; they used to worship stocks and stones, and to fall down before trees and groves. And when the face of the whole earth was thus covered with the dark night of idolatry and immorality, then it pleased God to send the day-spring from on high to visit us. Our blessed Redeemer came to call us out of darkness into his marvellous light, and to gather us into the mystical body of his church, out of all lands, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south. His church is the mystical body, of which he is the head; and whoever partakes of his redemption must be gathered from the world into this mystical body, and must be so united as to become a true living member of it. It was foretold by Moses, that unto Christ should the gathering of the people be; he was to gather the dispersed into one body. And the prophet Isaiah declares—"The Lord God which gathereth the outcasts of Israel saith, Yet will I gather others to him: for I will gather all nations and tongues, and they shall come and see my glory." Happy for us, these prophecies are now fulfilled. The love of our gracious Redeemer hath gathered some out of all nations and tongues; and blessed be his holy name for that he is daily gathering more, who come to Christ, and see his glory, and are thankful. Oh that more of the people were daily gathered unto him! We ought to pray earnestly for it, because there is no salvation for them who are not gathered into his mystical body, and united as closely to it as the branches of a vine are to the stock upon which they grow: for I am the vine, says the Redeemer himself; ye are the branches: abide in me, and I in you; as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

From hence it is evident that our blessed Redeemer has a mystical body, into which all the redeemed are gathered, and in which they are living members, united to their sovereign head, enlivened by his grace; and actuated and influenced by his good Spirit; and where the Spirit of Christ is, there is liberty —a liberty from error—a liberty from sin and Satan—a liberty from death and the grave; so that in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, there is full and plenteous redemption. And can persons who partake of this redemption forbear to be thankful? It is impossible. While they have a lively sense of the Redeemer's love, they must be speaking his praises; and they will retain this lively sense so long as they remember from whence he redeemed them. When they lay dispersed, he gathered them. When they lay in ignorance, he enlightened them. When they were in the grossest idolatry, he converted them to the worship of the true God. When they were in the sink of sin and immorality, he brought them into the ways of righteousness, pardoning their past offences by his merits, and enabling them by his grace to proceed in the work of sanctification. And having thus gathered them together, he united them to himself, and made them living members of his mystical body; and in this happy union, how many spiritual comforts and blessings must they find! Their hearts will certainly overflow with love and gratitude to their most adorable Redeemer: and it will be to them indeed a joyful and pleasant thing to be thankful: for he claims all their affections—they would live only to him—and therefore it would be really offering them violence to hinder them from speaking of him with the mouth, what the heart feels. He is so much the delight of their souls, that they had rather cease to breathe than cease to be thankful to their dearest Lord and Saviour. Daily will they be telling the wonders of his redemption, and giving thanks and honour unto him, so long as they have any being. And

May God enable every one of us to join our hearts and voices with theirs in giving praise and honour to our redeeming Lord! And having finished the paraphrase upon the three verses of the text, I come now to call upon you to join your thanksgiving with all the other members of Christ's mystical body. You have heard what the duty is: it consists in the service of a grateful heart, which is perfectly sensible of the divine love—having not only experienced God's goodness, but also his mercy, even the eternal mercy of the covenant of grace—being redeemed from the slavery of sin, from the captivity of Satan, and from the power of death: and these redeemed of the Lord cannot but speak with gratitude of what he has done for their souls, especially such of the redeemed who were gathered out of all lands, who were scattered and alienated from God by sin, were in heathen idolatrous countries, out of the covenant of promise, and without hope in the world. When such persons are made to partake of the blessings of redemption, how will their hearts burn within them! How will their affections be fired! and with what a pure flame will the sweet incense of their thanksgiving ascend up before God! Certainly, their sense of this redemption will fill their souls with love and praise: for they will find themselves so happy in giving thanks to the God of all mercies, that the bent of their minds will always turn to this duty. It will become their perfect delight and joy to be employed in this part of devotion, which is by far the sweetest: for when a heart full of praise and gratitude pours out its adoration and thanks to its God and Saviour, oh how delightful must this devotion be! And when grace heightens it, and fires and inflames our hearts with the ardour of divine love, oh how heavenly must this devotion be! It is indeed the highest to which we can arise while we are in the body; and it must certainly be the most pleasing and grateful, because it is the devotion of heaven itself. It is the very service of that innumerable company of saints and angels who stand around the Redeemer's throne, and join their hearts and voices in heavenly harmony, giving thanks and honour and praise unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. And must not this be a most sweet and delightful duty, which makes up a great part of the enjoyment and happiness of the blessed in heaven? Doubtless it must, even here, be exceedingly sweet to those persons who hope to find themselves happy for ever in the practice of it. So that whoever has the true Christian temper will be always giving thanks to his redeeming Lord, and will always, in so doing, find something of that pure delight and joy which the glorified spirits in heaven find while they sing the praises of their redeeming God.

Oh let us then lift up our hearts, and join our voices with theirs! May we catch some of those heavenly strains with which they incessantly celebrate Jesus their most adorable Redeemer! And if we can catch some of their fire, we shall then feel what kind of joy it is to be truly and sincerely thankful to our blessed Lord. Oh may the Spirit of grace elevate and exalt our affections, and raise them to that high pitch of thanksgiving which may endear the duty to us, and make us in love with it, so long as we live. God grant he may! that my application may come with more power to your hearts: and I shall address it to two different sorts of persons. And,

First, There may perhaps be some among you who allow thanksgiving to be a pleasant duty; but yet you find in yourselves no disposition to practise it. After what has been said of the Redeemer's love to men, oh, it is a cutting reflection to hear that any of you should be in this cold, dead state. Would to God there were not one man upon earth, much less any one in this place, so insensible of our Lord's mercy! But if such there be, the Holy Spirit calls upon them, in the text, attentively to view what Christ has done for his people. The blessings of his redemption are sufficient, not only to awake them that are asleep, but also to raise up the dead in sin: for consider; he redeemed them from those enemies who had them in vile subjection and bondage. They were sold in sin, in slavery to their own natural lusts and appetites—captives to Satan, who treated them cruelly, putting them upon those miserable labours wherein they could work out nothing but their own damnation—and sin and Satan had delivered them over to it, putting them in the power of death, temporal and eternal. Such was their wretched condition. And do you believe it, or not? If you do not, you oppose God and his holy word, and every day's experience. If you do believe it, why are you not thankful for redemption? There can be but one reason; and that is, you have as yet no share in the mercies of the Redeemer. You know not your interest in him: for if you did, it would be as natural to offer him thanksgiving as it is to breathe: and so long as you withhold it from him, you are indeed in slavery and captivity, although you may not feel enough of your misery to make you wish for redemption. Sin and Satan have so deluded you, that you choose to continue slaves and captives to them rather than to be set at liberty by Jesus Christ. And having no desire to find an interest in his redemption, you have therefore no disposition to be thankful to him for it. This is a most dangerous state: and may the eternal Spirit open your eyes, and show you the danger of it, that you may flee for your life to the God of all mercy and forgiveness, and may find abundant reason to be thankful for his redeeming love!

But I would hope there are very few of you thus indisposed to the practice of thanksgiving, and therefore I turn myself with joy to those who are disposed and willing to be thankful. You have heard, my Christian brethren, of the infinite love and mercy of our blessed Saviour, and how by his free grace he redeemed you from the hand of the enemy, and gathered you out of all lands into his mystical body. When you were sold slaves to sin, captives to Satan, and given over to the power of death, then your God vouchsafed to become man to redeem you: he took your flesh; for the law required that the next relation, and he only, should be the redeemer: he was made nearest to you in blood, that he might fulfil the character of a lawful redeemer. The almighty God, the Creator of all things, became your brother. Oh astonishing condescension! and he paid down the full price for your redemption, and he paid it with joy, although he bled and laid down his life for payment. But such was the infinite value and merit of his most precious blood, that it redeemed us from slavery, redeemed us from captivity, redeemed us from the power of death. It obtained for us the most full and plenteous redemption—redemption from all the evils of sin in this world, and redemption to all the joys of the next world, for ever and ever. And finding yourselves thus redeemed from the present evils of sin, and entitled to the future joys of heaven, how can you forbear to give thanks to this most blessed Redeemer? While you find his graces and comforts in your souls, you cannot cease praising him. I hope your praises will never cease; but it will be your joy and delight in time, as it is to be your happiness to eternity, to give honour and glory to the Lamb who was slain, and has redeemed you unto God by his blood. It has been the subject and design of this discourse to bring you into this thankful frame and temper of mind. And if you are thankful, if you do but desire to be thankful, you will readily join your hearts with mine in our requests to God, to make us more thankful, saying,

O most adorable God and Saviour, we beseech thee to send thy blessing upon what we have heard this day out of thy holy word. Endue it with thy power and efficacy, that it may reach our hearts, and may be the means of making us more thankful to thee. And give us grace, blessed Lord, to grow and improve in thankfulness; and let thy praises become more and more our delight. And to that end, be pleased to let us know our interest in thy great redemption, that we all may now praise thee with joyful lips, and may join our thanksgiving with angels and archangels, and with all the company of heaven, to laud and magnify thy glorious name, evermore praising thee and saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the glory of thy redemption. Glory be to thee for it, O Jesus Christ, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, to whom be equal honour, worship, and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

SERMON III.

PSALM cvii. 4—10.

They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way; they found no city to dwell in. Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses. And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men; for he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.

THE general subject of this sacred hymn is thanksgiving: the motives to induce us to be thankful are taken from the mercies of redemption. And this redemption is here considered in several views, according to the several distresses from which we are redeemed; and each of these is used as a fresh motive to heighten our gratitude, and to inspire us with more praise to Jesus, our most adorable God and Redeemer.

In the last lecture I considered the three first verses; from which it appeared that the redeemed of the Lord were the persons here called upon to be thankful: they were redeemed from the hand of the enemy, and gathered out of the lands from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south; and while they had any sense of these great blessings, they would never be silent in his praises who had been to them an almighty Deliverer. The Holy Spirit, speaking of the same persons in the same circumstances, offers them another motive for thankfulness in the words which I have read. It is a clear and convincing argument; and I hope the inspirer of it will carry it with conviction to your hearts. He knew what was the most proper method to affect us; and he will certainly accompany his own methods with his own grace: and therefore every one of you may expect to reap that profit from this scripture, which the Holy Spirit intended it should be the means of conveying to the faithful, if you put yourselves under his guidance and seek his blessing, while I am,

First, Going through a paraphrase upon the words, and then,

Secondly, Applying them as a motive to inspire you with thankfulness.

And first, The words relate to the redeemed, and describe the state which they were in before they partook of the blessings of redemption. Before they were gathered together out of all lands, and admitted into the flock of the great shepherd and bishop of souls, they wandered in the wilderness, where they were neither fed in green pastures nor led forth beside the waters of comfort. Their spiritual state was so much like the natural condition of a dry barren wilderness, that the scriptures commonly describe it by this name. Ezekiel calls it, the wilderness of the people—the desolate state of the heathen people—and not of the country: and the prophet Isaiah foretels the happy change of this desolated state of the heathen people, when the Holy Spirit should be poured upon them, xxxii. 15: "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field." When the abundant streams of his grace should descend upon the heathen world, then the wilderness and the solitary place should be glad, and the desert should rejoice and blossom as the rose—it should blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing. But before this blessed change was made, we were all in a waste howling wilderness, where, the Psalmist says, we wandered in a solitary way; for by sin we had lost the way to heaven. All flesh—the whole human nature—says Moses, had corrupted his way upon earth: and this corruption soon discovers itself, and breaks out very early in life; for the prophet declares, that as soon as they are born, they go astray; and when they grow up, they have no power to return into the right way, but are like lost sheep, which can never of themselves find the way back again into the fold after they have once strayed from it. And therefore, in the 53rd of Isaiah, our wretched condition is represented by this image: All we—not one of us excepted—all we, like sheep, have gone astray: we had wandered from the fold of the church, had strayed from the true shepherd, and got out of his pleasant and fruitful pastures into the desolate wilderness, where we had lost ourselves, and could find no way out of it, and no food in it: for, while all the heathen world wandered in this solitary wilderness, they were hungry and thirsty, even to such a degree, that their soul fainted in them: for want of food, their strength began to fail them, and they were even hard at death's door.

Now, if you consider the propriety of this image only in its natural light, it is very striking, though it be very familiar. Suppose a person to be travelling through some desolate uninhabited country, like the deserts of Arabia, and unhappily lose his way, and after wandering for some days, all his provision being gone, his spirits and his strength fail him, hunger and thirst begin to prey upon his vitals, and, no hope of deliverance from any human means appearing, his soul really faints in him, and he gives himself up to despair. Is not this a scene of exquisite distress, and such as a person of the least tenderness cannot behold without being greatly moved with pity? for this miserable traveller cannot support himself much longer; his dissolution is drawing nigh; he already sinks under the fatigues of mind and body; and famine will soon put an end to his wretched life. And if you should happen to be passing by this way, soon after the breath was gone out of his body, and should see his ghastly appearance, how pale and emaciated and frightful his dead corpse looked, then your heart would melt over him, and you could not avoid shedding one compassionate tear. But how much more sensibly would his death affect you, if you began to be apprehensive of this same danger, if you had also lost your way, were without food, your spirits and strength failing, and scarce any hopes left of your finding the right way again? When you thus made his case your own, your concern would be double, and you would be in the utmost distress for your own safety, seeing before your eyes an unhappy fellow-creature, who perished in the same circumstances.

Now if this case, which is only a temporal calamity, and to which death will put an end, would naturally move our pity, and excite our compassion, how much more should the same case in spirituals affect us, because here the calamity is endless, and death does not finish, but rather is an entrance and opening into eternal distress? So that if the case in common life moved you greatly, then this, in spiritual life, should move you infinitely more. Call up, then, the softest emotions of your tenderness and compassion, and mourn over that unhappy person whose spiritual misery is painted out and represented by the lost, starving, and dying traveller in the wilderness. You may see, from what his body suffers, how much the soul of the poor helpless sinner is to suffer, who has lost his way to heaven, and who wanders in search of it without any guide or direction, and, after all his labour and pains to find it out, wearied and hungry, and fainting for thirst, he is forced to give over the search: his soul is ready to perish, for want of the divine support, and of the streams of divine grace, which Christ and the Holy Spirit only can give, and which are as necessary to the life of the soul as meat and drink are to the life of the body. And if none be soon sent to this lost sinner, he dies, not only to this world, but he also dies from God, and from all the glories of the heavenly kingdom—he is eternally ruined and undone. Here then is an object a thousand times more miserable than the poor traveller who perished in the wilderness. And can you behold; how is it possible for you, my brethren, to think of this infinitely more miserable object, and not to be infinitely more affected with it? Doubtless, every one among you who can feel for others, and has any bowels of compassion in him, must mourn over this unhappy man, who is just falling into torments, which know no intermission—no end. Oh! it is a dreadful case—beyond description distressful. God grant you may never know what it is to be tormented for ever and ever in the flames of hell! And if you can thus pity another person in this distress, oh, shut not up the bowels of your compassion against your own selves; for this is indeed your own case. You are this very lost ruined sinner. Every one of you is, every son of Adam is, in this wilderness: in it you have lost your way to heaven, and with the best of your natural abilities and reasoning powers, you cannot find it again; or if you could find it, yet you are not able to walk in it, because you are dying of hunger and thirst, whether you feel it or not: for you have no food from Christ, who says, I am the bread of life, to support your sinful souls, and therefore you must perish with hunger; and you have no grace from the Holy Spirit, which is the water of life, and therefore you must perish with thirst. This is, by nature, the condition of every man who cometh into the world: and whoever thou art, who hast not seen thyself in this condition, thou art still in the waste and howling wilderness. Although the body may lodge in a palace, yet thy poor soul is in a desert: for if thou hast not yet found thy lost estate, thou hast not yet taken one step toward thy recovery. If thou hast not seen and felt thy misery—that thou hast lost thy way to heaven, and hast no merit to support thee, no grace to sanctify thee—if thou hast not seen this, O miserable man! thou art blind indeed: thou art under the strongest delusion of sin, which shows its power over thee, by thus obscuring and darkening all the faculties of the soul. But if it should please God to open thine eyes, thou wouldst, to thy amazement, see nothing around thee but a waste barren wilderness, where thou now fanciest nature to be flourishing and fruitful. And may his good Spirit indeed enlighten your understandings, and show you evidently your miserable state, that there may be raised in your hearts a strong cry for deliverance. And if you find any prayer, if it be but a desire, rising in your minds, to accept of full and free redemption through Jesus Christ, hear how comfortably the Holy Spirit exhorts you to apply to him in your distress, as it follows in the sixth verse: "Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses." They were in the wilderness, had lost their way, had no food, were perishing, they could only cry unto the Lord; they had no help or hope left but throwing themselves upon his mercy to pray him to interpose in their behalf. When misery brings us thus to know and feel our wretchedness, then our deliverance draweth nigh; for God is always more ready to help than we are to pray to him for help. And we cannot have a happier proof of his readiness to help than in his sending us those troubles which send us to him, and which thereby bring us deliverance. And we have great reason to be thankful unto him, and to kiss the rod, whenever its chastisements dispose us to seek his face. "I will go and return to my place," says the God of all mercy, in the prophet Hosea, v. 15, "till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early." How full is this passage of the most tender love and affection! You see our God sends afflictions, even to his enemies, with a design to do them good: he suffers them to fall into distresses, from which the arm of flesh cannot deliver them, that they may be brought to acknowledge their offence, and to seek his face who is almighty to deliver. And whenever outward sufferings produce this inward humiliation, then the design of them is answered; for then the mind is rightly disposed to look up to heaven, from whence only cometh help in time of need. And they cried unto the Lord in their trouble; they saw the misery of their fallen state; they felt their guilt and wretchedness; they found no help in the wilderness of this world; and, deeply abased, and thoroughly humbled with the sense of their sinfulness, they cried unto the Lord for help: and Jesus heard them. The God of love heard the first sigh of their broken hearts, and, before they cried unto him, he was at hand to save. He is an almighty Saviour, whose love is as infinite as his power; he is always ready to save unto the uttermost. Whoever seeks, shall find his grace, either to show him his guilt and misery, or effectually to remove them. And if any of you are now sensible of guilt and misery, make a trial of his redeeming love. Go to him with the sincere desires of your hearts to be pardoned and saved, and he will as soon cease to be God as he will reject you. He will not cast you out. He shed his blood for you on the cross; he loved you more than his own life! he even died to save you; and he cannot cast you out. If you desire him to save you, you are saved: for they cried unto the Lord Jesus, and he delivered them out of their distresses; they had nothing to offer him but prayers and entreaties; they could only cry for pardon and mercy. This is all that they could do, and all that he wants; for, so soon as they cried for salvation, he saved them: his free grace led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation. They could not help themselves: they could only cry for help; and, so soon as they cried to him, his free grace brought them a complete deliverance; for, whereas they had lost their way, he brought them forth by the right way: his good Spirit led them out of the wilderness unto him who calls himself the way, the truth, and the life; and in him they found an abiding city, whose builder and maker is God. This city is the church, which Christ hath purchased with his own blood; and whoever is admitted into it, and is a true living member of it, can want no manner of thing that is good: for Jesus Christ the Redeemer, the Head of the church, has provided every thing that can make his members happy in time and to eternity. In time, they have his good Spirit to enlighten them, and to show them the way out of the wilderness, his merits to justify them, his grace to sanctify them: they are holy and happy, and in eternity they will enjoy these heavenly blessings to which they have already a sure right and title by the merits and free grace of Jesus Christ. And

When such persons remember what they formerly were in themselves, and what they are now made in him, how can they forbear to be thankful? How can the redeemed of the Lord be silent in the praises of the Redeemer, when they consider out of what a desolate wilderness he brought them when they were lost and bewildered in it, were so hungry and thirsty that their soul fainted in them? Must not the very remembrance of these blessings inspire them with thankfulness? When nothing but death and endless ruin lay before them, he was pleased of his own free grace to hear the very first cry which they sent up to him for deliverance; and he came with all the tender mercies of our God to save them. He turned the wilderness into a paradise; he put his revealed directions into their hands, and sent his good Spirit into their hearts to enlighten them, and to lead them into the right way; he gave them the bread of life to allay their hunger, and the waters of grace and comfort to quench their thirst; and, having thus blessed them with all spiritual blessings, how can they—how is it possible they should—be silent in his praises? While their hearts are full of gratitude to him, shall they not be telling with their mouths of the wonders which he hath done for their salvation? Doubtless, they will be speaking of their most adorable Redeemer all the day long; for this is so just a tribute of praise, it is so easy and pleasant a return; and besides, it is the only return we can make for his inestimable blessings, that this will and must make him. And this is the grateful return which the Holy Spirit calls upon us, in the next words, to make to our redeeming God—"Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men." He has done wonders indeed—he never failed in the miraculous blessings of his free grace. Oh that we may never fail in thankfulness for them! But certain it is, that we have all failed; and the best of us lament our failing the most; for thankful, as he deserves, none of us are. It is a rule of common life, that thankfulness should be proportioned to the benefits received; and whoever does not act up to this rule, is reckoned basely ungrateful among men. In religion, the same rule is just and equitable. But because Christ has been so infinitely merciful, that our thankfulness cannot be proportioned to the merits received, yet we are therefore more inexcusable if we are not as grateful as it is possible for us to be: for to whom men give much, of them they always require the more; and to whom Christ has forgiven much, of them he requires the more love and praise. The more we receive, the greater is our debt; and to consider that we can never repay it, should most effectually stir us up to be thankful. Oh how earnestly should we pray for, how incessantly should we be seeking, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, to enable us to rise to higher degrees of gratitude. His merits will be still above our praises, let us rise ever so high: but let us not stop until the heart be full of thankfulness, and every faculty of the mind and body be ready to give honour and glory to their redeeming God. "Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord Jesus for his mercies, and declare the wonders which he hath done for the salvation of men: for he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness." In these last words you see how the prophet exalts the free grace of God, in order to raise and exalt your gratitude: for these sinful lost travellers in the wilderness could do nothing to deliver themselves: they had tried every thing in their power, and could not succeed: they were helpless, faint, and miserable: they have only spirits enow left to cry unto God. And what haste does mercy make! for the moment they cry, Jesus was at hand to save. The God of love came with all the blessings of his redeeming grace, and poured them plentifully upon these poor sinners, when he had made them sensible of their want of them, and they applied to him for relief. For he satisfieth the longing soul—the longing soul is that which finds itself empty—which is convinced of its nothingness and wretchedness, and, so soon as it can confess itself to be quite destitute of every saving grace—does indeed hunger and thirst after the graces of Jesus Christ—then he never fails to satisfy this empty soul, and to fill this hungry soul with goodness. Such is Jesus, the God of our salvation; and thus wonderful is he in his mercies to the children of men. Oh that they would therefore praise him for his infinite, his eternal mercies! and grant, O blessed Jesus, that many persons who hear me this day may have reason to praise thee. Bring them by thy grace, O almighty Redeemer, out of the wilderness of sin and error, and let this scripture be fulfilled in every one of us, that we may join in giving thanks to thy holy name, now and for ever.

Thus much for the paraphrase upon the words: they contain a brief history of man's fall and misery, and of his restoration through Jesus Christ; which are described under these particulars:—

Secondly, They are brought to a right sense of it, and cry to the Lord Jesus for deliverance.

Thirdly, He hears them, and delivers them out of all their distresses. And Fourthly, The tribute of thanks due to him for this great deliverance.

To each of these points I will speak, as briefly as I can, by way of spiritual use and application. And first, The lost state of men by nature is here represented under the striking images of persons who have lost their way in a barren wilderness, where they are ready to perish with fatigue and famine. Now, my brethren, let me put this plain question to you; and may God put it to your hearts! Have you ever seen yourselves in this lost state? If you have, give glory and thanks to Jesus your almighty Redeemer. If you have not, you are in the utmost danger; and yet you live secure: you are still in your sins, with all the guilt of them about you, and destruction lies before you: you are on the very precipice: in one moment you may fall into eternity, where nothing but endless torments can be your portion. And what a strong delusion of sin is it, that you, who fear and dread a little bodily pain in this life, should not be under the least apprehension about the endless pains of body and soul in the next life? What is able thus to infatuate you against your own reason and your senses? You have not, surely, persuaded yourselves that the account which the Psalmist gives of your sinful miserable state is not matter of fact! If you have fallen into this delusion, hear what the word of God, and the voice of reason, and the sad experience of every day, loudly bear witness. The scripture is clear, that all we—every son of Adam—all we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have strayed from the paradise of God into the wilderness of this sinful world; and further, the scripture teaches that they are all gone out of the way—all—not one excepted; "they are all gone out of the way; they are altogether become abominable; there is also none that doeth good, no not one." And the consequence of our wandering is thus described:—"Destruction and misery are in their ways, and the way of peace have they not known." The sense and meaning of these passages you will not dispute; their authority you do not deny: and how, then, can you resist their evidence, since the reason of mankind, Jews, Heathens, and Christians, confirms it, and every day's melancholy experience renders it more clear and self-evident? If you will not believe this cloud of witnesses, you must believe nothing: for you may as well doubt whether there are any such beings as men, as whether they be fallen sinful beings. The one is an object of sense as much as the other: and therefore, unless you have taken your rest in absolute scepticism, and are quite settled upon the lees and dregs of infidelity, you must allow that mankind are sinful and miserable. Sin is the parent of all their misery; for it separates them from God, who is the parent of all good. It separates them in this world from his grace, and it will separate them in the next world from his glory for ever and ever. And now, my brethren, being convinced of your lost state and sinful condition, what do you resolve to do in consequence of this conviction? Will you go away from hence with this conviction upon your minds, and sin on as securely as you did before? God forbid. Your guilt would then be increased; your case would grow more desperate; you would then choose misery—even eternal misery—with your eyes open. Oh what a dreadful infatuation would this be! May the Lord Jesus keep you from it; and may his heavenly grace second my entreaties that you may now—this very moment, see your lost state by nature, and cry out unto him in the anguish of your souls for his grace! And if it be but a deep sigh from the heart, or a short prayer, Lord Jesus save, or else we perish! This the God of love will hear and answer. For it follows, in the next words of the text, "When they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, then he delivered them out of their distresses." They could do no more to deliver themselves than you can do: they could only cry to him in prayer to save them, and according to the greatness of his mercies he freely gave them full redemption. This is the established method of his proceeding. So soon as he sent his grace to show them their wretchedness, and to dispose them to cry to him for deliverance, he was ready and able to save them to the uttermost; and he is now as ready and as able to deal thus graciously with you. If you cry unto him for help, he will save. How sweetly does he invite, how powerfully does he persuade you now to cry aloud for his redeeming grace! "Call upon me," says he, "in the day of trouble, so will I hear thee, and thou shalt praise me." Therefore now call upon him: let the sense of your guilt and misery now make you earnest and importunate in your requests: call upon him in the day of trouble: and what an encouragement does he give you to persevere! So I will hear thee; I shed my blood for thy guilt, and my grace is almighty to remove thy misery: only seek them in prayer, and I will hear and answer, and thou shalt praise me; thou shalt have reason to praise me for the abundant mercies of my free and full redemption. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord Jesus! &c.

I have been very short upon the three last particulars in the text; viz. the sense which these sinners had of their misery, their crying for deliverance, and the tribute of thanks due to Christ for delivering them, because I shall have frequent occasion to speak upon them in the following parts of the Psalm. But enough, I hope, has been said to lay open this most sweet and comfortable portion of scripture, and to warm your hearts with the consideration of it. You see that the mercies of our God are above our misery. Though by nature we wander like sheep in the barren wilderness of this world, yet we have a most tender shepherd, who is always seeking to bring us back into the fruitful pastures of his church. Though in this wilderness we can find no abiding city, yet within the fold and pale of his church we may find rest unto our souls. Though we have no spiritual support in ourselves, yet his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed; and when his good Spirit applies the merits of them to our hearts, then we have true spiritual life abiding in us. Though our souls fainted within us while we wandered in the wilderness, yet Jesus, the God of all consolation, will refresh the fainting soul with his reviving grace, and will supply it with every manner of thing that is good, through the ages of eternity. So that he is more merciful than we are miserable; and in this respect his mercies are over all his works; for that he only waits until we have seen our misery, and are humbled enough to cry to him for relief, and then he shows he is at hand, a God to save. Oh that you may all this day experience his almighty power, and have fresh proof of his redeeming love! and every one of you who desires it will readily join with me in requesting his blessing on what you have now heard.

O most mighty God and Saviour! we acknowledge and confess our lost estate by nature: for all men have wandered in the wilderness out of the way, and have found no abiding city: they could find no way out of the wilderness, no place to rest, and no food to support them in it; hungry and thirsty, their souls fainted in them; but so soon as the sense of their misery disposed them to cry to thee, blessed Jesus, thou wast ready to deliver them out of all their distresses. Now, almighty Lord, deliver us, and extend the same mercies to this whole congregation; and let not one person among them leave this place without being first convinced of his own misery, and then of thy all-sufficiency to redeem him from it. Bring what has been said upon these truths home to all our hearts, and carry it with thy divine power and efficacy to our consciences, that we may now cry to thee with one voice—Lord Jesus save, or else we perish. Hear us, thou God of love, and be unto us an almighty Saviour, that we may bless thee with grateful hearts for having brought us up this day out of the wilderness of the world, here to the house of the Lord, where we have found reason to be thankful as long as we live, and to declare the wonders which thou hast done for our salvation. Grant this, O most adorable Jesus, to the glory of God the Father, and by the influence of the Holy Spirit upon all our hearts, now and for ever. Amen and Amen.

SERMON IV.

Psalm cvii. 10—17.

Such as sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron; because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High: therefore he brought down their heart with labour; they fell down and there was none to help. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses: he brought them out of darkness and out of the shadow of death, and brake their bands in sunder. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! for he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder.

The Holy Spirit sets before us in these words a second image of our misery by nature. He has called upon the redeemed of the Lord to be thankful to Jesus, the God of their redemption; and, in order to exalt and raise their thankfulness the more, he gives them four images, in which the misery of fallen man is placed in different views. In the first, he is represented as lost in a wilderness, where, after much wandering and weariness, fainting with hunger and thirst, he is just ready to perish: but finding no help upon earth, and being brought to a deep sense of his distress, he cries unto the Lord in his trouble, and Jesus was at hand to save: for so soon as the sinner was disposed to accept, the Saviour was willing to bestow free and full redemption. This was the subject of the last lecture. We have in the words before us a second image of man's fallen condition, in which the distresses of it are greatly heightened, and if I were able to paint the exquisite misery of it, so that you might see it in a strong light, it could not fail of having a great influence upon every unconverted person. I will therefore endeavour to set it before your eyes, in as striking colours as I am able; and I hope the same good Spirit who inspired this passage will be pleased to accompany us this day in the consideration of it, and to supply the imperfections of my discourse by his divine grace in your hearts. O eternal Spirit, now preside over us, and show thyself to be a God, by applying the doctrine with power and energy to every one of our consciences, while I am,

First, Laying open the sense and meaning of the words; and

It must be remembered that the words belong to the redeemed of the Lord; they are the persons called upon to be thankful; and the motives to excite their thankfulness are taken from a review of their miseries and distresses before they obtained redemption: and these miseries and distresses were of so many various kinds, and so very numerous, that they could not be represented to the life in one picture. In order to set them before our eyes in full proportion, it was necessary to draw them in different scenes; and therefore the Holy Spirit has given us, in these four paintings, a perfect description of man's sinful and miserable condition by nature. In the first he is represented as having lost the way to heaven, and wandering in a wilderness, weary with fatigue, faint with famine, ready to perish: in the second, his distress is heightened; for he falls into a pit of darkness and the shadow of death, where the enemy finds him, and puts him into close confinement, binding him with the heavy chains of affliction and iron. The scripture and every day's experience confirm this description; for the first words, "such as sit in darkness," are true of every son of Adam in his natural state. Sin cut off all communication between God and us, and thereby rendered us quite ignorant and blind in all spiritual knowledge: for if the eye of the mind have no light from the eternal Sun of righteousness, it is in the same state with the eye of the body, if it have no light from the created sun in the heavens: so that all the spiritual world was covered with gross darkness and blindness until the light of life arose; for thus saith the Lord God, speaking of Christ: "I have given thee for a light to the Gentiles, to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house." Now it is certain that the Gentiles, to whom Christ was given for a light, were not literally blind: they had good eyes, and could see outward objects clear enough; but the eye of the soul was entirely blind, insomuch that Christ came down from heaven miraculously to open it. And he sent out his apostles for the same purpose; and when he called Paul to the apostleship, he gave him his commission in these words: "I send thee now unto the Gentiles, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light." You cannot suppose that all the Gentiles were blind, to whom St. Paul was sent; and yet they had eyes which were not open until the gospel enlightened them; and these were the eyes of the mind: for when the Gentiles were turned from darkness to light, then was fulfilled that which is written by the prophet Isaiah: "The eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity, and out of darkness:"—the Sun of righteousness arose upon their obscurity and darkness, and so enlightened the eyes of the spiritually blind, that they clearly discovered the right way to heaven. And the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, were by nature in this blind state: Zacharias, in the gospel, confesses it, "The day-spring (i. e. Christ) from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death:"—all mankind, without Christ—Jews and Gentiles—not only sit in darkness, but also in the shadow of death. Such is the blind and miserable condition of sinners! Sin has subjected them to temporal and to eternal death; but because the death of the soul, when it perishes eternally from God, is not an object of sense, the Holy Spirit was therefore pleased to give us a shadow of it, by the death of the body; when it perishes to this world. And both these kinds of death entered into the world by sin; and what the body suffers by dying to this world, is indeed but a shadow of what the soul suffers when it dies from God in the next world. And yet, it is a very just and expressive shadow; for as the body, when it dies, has no longer any sense of perception of the outward objects of this life, but totally perishes from the light and spirit of the animal world, and from all the joys and comforts which they administer, so the soul, when it dies from God, has no longer any sense or perception of the inward objects of its life, but totally perishes from the eternal light and spirit of the heavenly world, and from all the joys and comforts which they administer. Thus bodily death is a shadow of spiritual—and temporal of eternal. I might trace the likeness in more particulars: but this may suffice to explain what the Psalmist means by the shadow of death. He supposes the mortality of the body to be a shadow of the sad estate into which sin brought the soul. All mankind is subject to this mortality, which is but the shadow of death; for in the death of the body we have a mournful picture of the more miserable death of the soul, which is the substance of death: this is the reality and substance of what the other is but a shadow. Oh what a distressful scene then is this! Here is nothing but darkness and the shadow of death—a body mortal and perishing, and, while it lives, is in bondage and the fear of death, terrified at the very approach of the shadow—and how much more in dread of the substance! And yet this distress is still heightened: for these poor sufferers are so chained down, that they cannot escape from the power of their enemies; they cannot stir one step out of this darkness and shadow of death; because they are fast bound in affliction and iron. Sin brought us into this darkness and shadow of death, and then chained us down to these miseries. The scripture frequently speaks of the bonds of sin, and describes man, in his fallen state, to be as much a slave to sin as if he were really chained down. And indeed a chain of the hardest iron, or of the toughest steel, is more easily broken than a long habit of sin; for the soul is then fettered, and bound as much as if the man were chained to the galleys; and yet he endures it willingly, although no galley slave is put to harder service, or has a more cruel and inexorable tyrant over him. Ought not this woman, says Christ, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, to be loosed from this bond? And Satan hath bound the whole human race, as well as this woman: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought into bondage; and he overcame us all by sin, and then bound us with the strong chains of it, which no human power can loose. He only, who overcame Satan, is able to release his prisoners. And the Psalmist, in the 68th Psalm, enumerating some of our Lord's great deliverances, says, in the 6th verse, "He bringeth out those which are bound with chains;" and the prophet Isaiah declares, "that he should open the prison to them that are bound." The scriptures are to be spiritually applied: for Christ never released any prisoners by breaking open the prison-doors and snapping their bands asunder. We meet with nothing of this kind in his life: but we read frequently of his delivering men from the bonds of their sins, and freeing them from Satan and death. From whence it follows, that unless our great Redeemer had come to break off our chains, we must have lain bound in affliction and iron for this life; and then have been reserved in everlasting chains under darkness in the next.

This is the true image and portraiture of every son of Adam. While he remains in his natural fallen state, he is in darkness and the shadow of death, fast bound in misery and iron. And how terrible is this situation!—to live in darkness, without one ray of divine light and comfort!—to be under the dismal gloom and shadow of death, and to be bound down to this misery by Satan, with his strongest fetters and chains! Certainly this is a scene of deep distress: and the view of it should lead us to inquire how the gracious Author of our being should suffer mankind to become subject to it; for he cannot be the cause of our misery: so that it must have been some great and heinous offence, by which we brought ourselves into these distresses. And let the Psalmist relate the reason: "They sat in darkness and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron; because they rebelled against the words of God." "Because they rebelled." This was the grand rebellion for which the head of the family was attainted; and his attainder corrupted the blood of all his children. Our first parents took up arms against the supreme majesty of heaven, and vainly imagined that they could find knowledge and happiness contrary to his declared will, and in opposition to his almighty power; and they carried this vain imagination into act: they listed themselves under the devil's banner, and set themselves in battle array against God, defying his threatenings and his vengeance. In comparison of this great rebellion, all others have been only weak plots and conspiracies: for this was the highest crime man could commit; because, to whom much is given, it is just and equitable of them to require the more. And God had given to Adam greater gifts and abilities, with innocence to enable him to use them aright, than to any of his descendants, and had with the most tender affection counselled him against that very temptation, by which he was most liable to be seduced: therefore, when he rebelled against God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High, it was the most horrid rebellion that a creature could commit against its Creator. And it was far from cruelty in God: it was an act of justice, without severity, to suffer him to fall into the pit which he had dug for himself, and there to be taken by the enemy, and committed a prisoner to darkness and the shadow of death, and to be fast bound with misery and iron. But it may be inquired, Why are we subject to his misery? Because we could not but be involved in his guilt. His treason corrupted his blood; and being corrupt in the fountain, it could not but be corrupt in the streams which issue from it. We see a standing instance of this in the book of nature: a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit. And we have a clear evidence of it in the book of God, which declares, that coming from a corrupt stock, we are altogether corrupt and abominable, being by nature children of wrath. And we have incontestible proof from the equity of our own laws, which not only punish treason with the loss of life in the traitor himself, but also with the loss of honours and estate in his descendants, to the latest posterity. Now, to deny that we are corrupt by nature against these evident proofs, is a full demonstration of our corruption. And he is fallen the lowest who thinks he is not fallen at all; for he who lives and acts as if he were not a fallen creature, must be farthest from recovery, and consequently must be most miserable. It is still rebellion to think to be happy in opposition to the revealed will of God; and every infidel, because he attempts this, is a rebel; he is a traitor convict; and every infidel society is an army of rebels united under the banner of their chief, who tempts, deludes, infatuates them, and hurries them on, sometimes even against conviction, until the long-suffering of God be wearied out with their rebellions, and he suffers them to fall into the hands of the enemy, who binds them with everlasting chains under darkness. Oh may the God of mercy open their eyes before they perish! Blessed Jesus, show them their guilt, and humble them under the sense of it; that, finding their misery, they may fly to thee for succour: for this is the usual method by which our Lord reclaims the unconverted and the infidel; as it follows in the Psalm: "Therefore he brought down their hearts with labour: they fell down, and there was none to help." He brought down their rebellious hearts by labour; he visited them with outward afflictions, under the weight of which they fell down, and there was none to help; they could not find any help upon earth; all worldly comforters failed them: and then they began to see their wretched condition. Their outward misery made them feel their inward. They found themselves in darkness, which no ray of science, nor the brightest beams of human learning, were able to dispel. They found themselves in the shadow of death; from the terrors of which all the moral and civil virtues put together could not deliver them. They found themselves fast bound in misery and iron; and all the powers in the earth could not break their chains. Finding their distress, and seeing no creature able to help, they were thereby disposed to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God. And indeed, their proud hearts were so thoroughly brought down and abased, that they were led to cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses. The Psalmist, in the 13th verse, makes this the happy effect of their affliction: it disposed them to seek God's favour; and he is always found of them who seek him. So soon as they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, he was at hand to save them from their distresses. The almighty Saviour came and brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bonds in sunder. And thus he gave them complete redemption. Darkness fled at the approach of the eternal light, and the shadow of death was turned into the light of life at the appearance of the living God: and the bonds brake in sunder when Christ came and proclaimed liberty to them that were bound; and being thus enlightened and set free from the bonds of sin and Satan, and delivered from the shadow of death, after they have obtained so free and full a redemption, how can they be silent in the Redeemer's praise? They then have a lively sense of his redeeming love in their hearts; and it would be acting against their own sense and feeling if they made him no return of gratitude. It would be unnatural. Nay, it is indeed impossible for men to partake of the blessings of redemption, and not to be thankful to their Redeemer. "Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and declare the wonders which he hath done for the salvation of men!" Wonders indeed! for he brought them from darkness to light, from the shadow of death to the life eternal, and from the bonds of misery to a crown of immortality. And shall they not praise him for these wonders? Shall they not speak with their tongues what their hearts feel? Doubtless they will be telling of his salvation all the day long; and, lest they should ever forget it, the Psalmist once more reminds them of their great deliverance: for he hath broken the gates of brass, says he, and cut the bars of iron in sunder. Remember from whence ye were redeemed, and be thankful. Were ye not in prison that was fortified with gates of brass and bars of iron; and were ye not chained down in the most dark and loathsome dungeon of this prison? Do you not recollect what horror you were in when you found yourselves in this distress, and had none upon earth to help you? And yet, you no sooner cried to Jesus for help, than he heard your cries, and came: he brake open the gates of brass, and snapped the bars of iron in sunder; your chains fell off; and he brought you out of the prison-house, and set you at liberty. And, certainly, you do not want to be persuaded to be thankful for such a deliverance, or to be grateful to such a deliverer! Your praises should flow with as much ease, and as naturally, as your breath. God grant the one may endure as long as the other, so that of his praises there may be no end.

I have now finished the paraphrase upon the words; and I come, 2ndly, to the spiritual use and application of them. The doctrine which they contain is this: Every son of Adam, in his natural state, before he is redeemed, is in darkness and the shadow of death, and is fast bound with the chains of sin and misery; and there is no help for him upon earth: the almighty God and Saviour alone is able to deliver him. This is the doctrine which I have supported from other passages of scripture, and from experience. And now, my brethren, let us examine ourselves upon it, and try to make it useful and profitable to our souls. The proper steps to this end seem to me, 1st, to believe the doctrine—2ndly, to desire to experience the truth of it—and 3rdly, to find the happy experience of it in our souls—and then we shall have reason indeed to be thankful.

And first—The belief of the doctrine is the chief point in the Christian religion: for we must be made sensible of our fallen state by nature before we can think of its being renewed by grace. The sick only want a physician: the sinner only wants a Saviour: and therefore we can have no motive to apply to him for his salvation until we find ourselves ruined and undone by sin: so that this must be first, and above all things, settled in our minds. The doctrine of our redemption stands upon our belief of the fall; and if man, in his fallen state, was not in darkness, then we want no Saviour to enlighten us: if he was not in the shadow of death, then we want no Saviour to deliver us from death: if he was not fast bound with chains by sin and Satan and death, then we want no Saviour to break our bonds asunder. We must first believe ourselves to be in these distresses, before we can seek for redemption. And therefore, my brethren, do you indeed believe that you are in your fallen state—in the distresses here described by the Psalmist—or do you not believe it? Do you see no darkness in the human mind? Do you know none who live in the fear of death?

And were you never tied to some favourite bosom-sin, which you found it harder to break off than it could be to break the strongest chains of iron? Certainly you must have remarked something of this kind. And if you have, how can you account for it otherwise than upon the Psalmist's principles? If mankind did not lose the divine light and life by sin, how came all this spiritual darkness into their minds? If they did not lose the love and favour of God by sin, how came they to be subject to death, and to live all their lives in fear of it? If they have not contracted a proneness to evil, how happens it to be so difficult to break the bonds of sin? No satisfactory account can be given of these things but what is taken from the scripture history of the fall; and therefore why should you not believe the scripture history? If you consult the infidels, they have nothing to offer upon these points; their advocates are silent. The heathens have written much, and reasoned more, upon the subject, but without success. Their best writers own that they were not able to clear it up. But upon the Christian plan, the difficulties vanish at once. The scripture account is rational and consistent. And why then, my brethren, do you not believe it? You have the word of God, and the voice of reason, and melancholy experience, attesting the depravity and corruption of mankind. You cannot deny but that they are depraved and corrupt. This is a self-evident truth. And what remedy is there for it? Can God look upon such sinful, polluted creatures with approbation? No: he cannot. The infinite purity of his nature will not suffer it. And he will not. He has declared, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord; and he who has once sinned can never make himself holy, and consequently he can never see the Lord; unless there be a Redeemer, who has holiness to give: for God's purity and sin's impurity set God and the sinner at an infinite distance. And how shall he ever approach to God unless there be a Redeemer who has infinite righteousness to impute to the sinner, and thereby enable him to draw near to God? Here is our only remedy. The Redeemer, and he alone, is able to repair all the evil effects of sin. Our souls must have remained for ever in darkness unless the divine rays of the Sun of righteousness had enlightened them. Our bodies would have lived here in the shadow of death unless the Redeemer had brought life and immortality to light. And both body and soul would have been bound with the chains of sin, here and for ever, unless our almighty Deliverer had set us at liberty. Oh let us receive him, then, for our Redeemer and our God! Finding and feeling our misery and distress without him, let there be raised in the heart a strong cry for his salvation. Let us imitate those in the text, who cried unto the Lord in their trouble. And this desire to experience his power to redeem us was the second head of application.

If you believe what has been said of your fallen state, and yet have no desire to be redeemed from it, how do you quiet your consciences as to this absurd conduct? You do believe that man is by nature sinful and miserable, and yet you have no desire to be redeemed from sin and misery. How inconsistent and contradictory is this proceeding! Do you choose, then, to be in darkness rather than light? Is death preferable to life, or bonds to liberty? O miserable deluded man, whom sin thus infatuates! whoever thou art, thou art self-condemned; because thou hast seen thyself fallen, and yet hast no desire to be raised up. By what arguments, what entreaties, shall I prevail with thee? How shall I touch thy heart, and win thy affections, to make thee desire what thou knowest already thou must desire, before thou canst be happy? Blessed Jesus! this is a work above my power. Take it, Lord, into thine own hand, and send thine almighty grace unto the hearts of all my hearers who are in this dreadful situation, that they may be disposed to seek pardon and peace of thee, with strong crying and tears, until thou save them from their distresses. Our Redeemer is a God of love: he cannot reject any person who seeks for his redemption. Seek, therefore, and ye shall find: desire, and your desires shall be granted: for they cried unto the Lord Jesus in their trouble—they only cried unto him, and he saved them out of their distresses. So will he save you, if you cry unto him for salvation. This is your encouragement: desire and pray until you happily experience his redeeming grace;—which is the third and last point I purposed to consider. The word experience, in these days of blasphemy and reproach, conveys an odd idea to some persons; and I know that they cannot separate it from enthusiasm: but I have remarked that they who ridicule the word are entire strangers to the thing: for we mean nothing more by experience than the knowledge of what God has done for our souls, which may be as certainly perceived as any external object can be: for can faith be given, and the heart be changed, and all its affections altered—is it possible this should be done—and yet the man who suffers this great and total change should not know it? Can he be brought out of darkness into light, and not be sensible of it? Can he be delivered from the fear of death, and not find that his fears are gone? Can his bonds and chains be broken off, and shall he not feel that he is at liberty? Surely he must—he must know and feel it. He must have as clear an idea of it as a poor condemned prisoner would have of liberty, if he were brought out of the dark dungeon, and his chains and fetters knocked off. If you allow him to experience his deliverance, then you cannot deny the same experience to the redeemed of the Lord, whom he has brought out of darkness, and whose chains he has broken asunder. For, doubtless the soul may have its experience as well as the body; and the knowledge will be as certain in one case as in the other. And it highly concerns all formal nominal Christians; and I call upon them to observe this. And I would inquire of them, how they know that they have been redeemed, if they have had no experience of redemption? Will they pretend that they were born in a Christian country, and were baptized, and have lived ever since in the communion of some reformed church? Be it so. But all this entitles them no more to redemption than if they had been born among the Heathens or Mahometans; for a man born in England wants conversion as much as one born in Turkey: the same change of heart is necessary for both; and it is certain, being baptized does not change the heart; because, as children grow up, we see the seeds of vice sprouting up apace; and nothing can check them but being baptized with the Holy Ghost, of which water-baptism was the instituted emblem and figure: and whoever is baptized with the Holy Ghost, must as certainly experience the change it makes in him as he can see or feel any outward object. He was before in darkness; now he is in light: before, he was afraid of death; now his fears are gone: before, he was chained down in a loathsome prison; now he is at liberty. How can this be, and the man not know it? Is it possible to open the eyes of a blind man, and he not know it? Can he be restored to sight, and not see it? Certainly you cannot believe any thing so absurd; and yet you do believe a greater absurdity, if you think yourselves to be the redeemed of the Lord, and yet have experienced nothing of his redeeming power. Without this experience you are only nominal Christians; and I beseech you, my brethren, not to rest in the mere name of Christianity. If you have no knowledge of what Christ has done in your souls, you are only Christians in profession—you are Christians without any sense or feeling of Christianity—insensible Christians. What mere nothings are these in religion! You fancy you live to Christ, and yet you have no perception of this life! What can be more absurd? Therefore be not any longer content with the mere shadow of Christianity, nor think you have redemption, because you keep some of its outward services. These are well; but something more is necessary. God is to do the great work in your souls. It is all his. You can do nothing to it. You have only to desire and pray for his redemption. And his grace, which disposes you to desire and pray, will also do all the rest; for it is he who worketh in you, both to will and to do: therefore cry unto him until he work in you both to will and to do. If you cry, he will hear and answer: he will bring you from darkness to light, from the shadow of death to life eternal, and from the bonds of sin and Satan into the perfect liberty of the sons of God. And may the blessed Jesus give you the experience of these great changes, that you may find him almighty to perfect your redemption! and then you will be thankful. Sensible of your own misery by nature, and of the blessings of his free grace, you will not be silent in your Redeemer's praise. Your grateful hearts will overflow with expressions of thankfulness, and you will live eternally to him who now liveth in you. And so many as are in this happy state, who have tasted how good and gracious our Redeemer is, will now draw near unto him, and send up their earnest request to him for his blessing upon what you have heard. And

We beseech thee, O most adorable God and Saviour! to make this discourse useful and profitable to our souls. We confess that we were by nature in darkness and in the shadow of death, and were fast bound with the chains of misery and sin. Thus low were we fallen, and there was none to help. But as soon as we cried unto thee, blessed Jesus! thou wast at hand to save, and didst deliver us from all our distresses. We praise and glorify thee for thy free and full redemption. And grant, O Lord, to this whole congregation the same happy experience. Send thy good Spirit into all their hearts, and so entirely change them from sin to righteousness, that they, finding thee to be also their Redeemer and their God, may join with us in praising thee for thy goodness, and in declaring the wonders which thou hast done for our salvation. O thou God of love! let no one leave this place without a blessing: but hear and answer according to the riches of thy mercy, to the glory of the Father and of the eternal Spirit, three persons of equal power, majesty, and dominion; to whom be ascribed equal honour and worship, now and for ever. Amen.

SERMON V.

PSALM cvii. 17—23.

Fools because of their transgression and because of their iniquities, are afflicted. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat; and they draw near unto the gates of death. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses. He sent his word and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with rejoicing.

THE subject of this Psalm is thanksgiving: the motives by which the Holy Spirit tries to stir us up to be thankful are taken from redemption; which is the greatest mercy God has bestowed upon mankind, and therefore it justly demands the greatest thankfulness. But because the all-wise Inspirer of this divine hymn knew the abominable corruption of our hearts, and that we were by nature unholy and unthankful, he has therefore used several arguments to convince us. He is earnest and importunate with us. He calls aloud to us again and again, solicits, presses us, to open our eyes, and to behold the wonders which God hath done for our redemption. And to give an edge to these repeated entreaties, and to make them pierce the deeper, he has adorned them with the ornaments of language and the graces of sentiment. The very composition has every thing beautiful and sublime that can recommend it to our esteem; and he who knows the heart, and what is most likely to make an impression upon it, has still farther heightened the subject by four paintings from nature, which he has drawn in the most lively and striking colours. The design of each of these pieces is to represent our fallen state in the most affecting point of view; that seeing and feeling the exquisite distress of it, we may be induced to cry unto the Lord Jesus for deliverance, who never shutteth out the cry of the poor destitute, but hears and comes, with all the haste that almighty love can make, to deliver and to save. The subject of the first painting is laid in a wilderness: fallen man is like a traveller, lost and bewildered in a desert, weary and faint, and ready to perish with famine. In the second piece, his distress increases; for he falls into a pit of darkness and the shadow of death, where the enemy finds him, and puts him in chains, binding him with misery and iron. In the third, which we are going to view at present, you will see him laying in a scene of still greater distress. Behold him here, quite worn down by sickness. See how pale and feeble and emaciated he looks—his strength gone—his appetite lost—his breath failing—he draws near to the gates of death. This is the affecting scene on which we are now to fix our eyes. And I hope you will attend to the Psalmist's account of the causes and symptoms of our disorders, of the proper remedy, and of the means to avoid diseases for the future. I know you all value health: nothing is dearer to you: for without it life itself is a burden; therefore hear what the Psalmist has to offer upon these points; and let this awaken your closest attention, that he does not borrow his rules from books, or from the experience of the ablest physicians, but he received them from the author of our being. The all-wise God revealed them to him, and through him to us: and may he guide our hearts, that we may receive by his grace all that profit from this scripture which he intended it should be the means of administering to the faithful. May his good Spirit sanctify our hearts while we are viewing the three chief parts of this highly-finished painting.

First, The distress of the sick.

Secondly, Their cure by the great physician. And,

As to the first particular, the cause of their sickness is thus described: "Foolish men, by a course of sin and wickedness, are afflicted and brought low." Sin was the fruitful parent of all their disorders; and though they knew it, though they saw daily sad experience of it, yet they were such fools as still to sin on, and to persevere obstinately at the expense of their own health and life. What a strong delusion was this! They found themselves weakened and enfeebled, quite worn down with labouring in the ways of sin, and yet they were so infatuated as to persist. Might not the Psalmist with good reason call such men fools? What could be greater folly than to continue in a habit of sinning until it had brought them so low "that their soul abhorred all manner of meat, and they drew nigh to the gates of death?" A course of sin was the cause of their disorder; and in these words the Psalmist gives us the dangerous symptoms of it: food is necessary to our being; the desire of it is a natural appetite; but when nature loses the desire for that which is necessary to its very being, it must be then greatly disordered. The stomach must have been much injured, and the organs dangerously impaired; indeed the whole body must be in a very bad habit, before all appetite could be lost. But how much more dangerous are the symptoms when nature does not only cease to desire, but cannot even bear the most innocent food? When the stomach is become so weak and tender, that it cannot digest the lightest meat, the case is then growing desperate, and there seems to be no hopes left when it comes to the last stage here described; viz. to loathe and abhor all manner of meat. The stomach turns at the sight of it. And the man has this loathing and abhorrence of all manner of meat. What he most loved, and had the best appetite for, is now become so very offensive, that, at the smell of it, he grows sick, and faints away. Nature cannot support itself long under this disorder. If this loss of appetite and loathing even the smell of the most simple food continue, it must wear the patient out: indeed it is not always a mortal distemper; there may be an entire loathing of food, and even fainting away at the smell of it, and the patient may sometimes recover. But in the present case, the distemper had continued so long, and was grown so inveterate, that there were no hopes, for they draw nigh, the Psalmist says, to the gates of death—these gates of brass, and bars of iron, with which death locks up his prisoners in the grave; and you may judge how great must be the strength of these gates and bars, since only one person was ever able to break through them; and if he had not been more than man, he could never have broken these gates of brass, nor cut these bars of iron in sunder.

This is the striking image in the text; and in order to see it in the most affecting point of view, you should visit a person in this distress. Go to his sick-bed, and behold him in this languishing condition; lying weak and feeble, and wearing away apace through loss of appetite: you see all the organs of the body, for want of natural supplies, begin to be unable to perform their proper offices. And as the bodily strength decays, the faculties of the mind also are impaired: his memory is short: he is scarcely able to distinguish one object from another. If you continue for some time by his bedside, and examine all the symptoms of his disorder, it must greatly move your compassion to see him in such pain and misery. You cannot but feel tenderly for him; and the more if you recollect that this case may soon be your own. And if you thus bring it home, and apply it to yourselves, it may be natural to give a vent to your pity, and to shed one compassionate tear over your distressed fellow-creature. But if the person who is in this disorder should happen to be dear to you—a relation, a friend, as near as the wife of your bosom—you could not behold them in these agonies without suffering along with them. And I ask every tender, humane person among you, whether he does not think sorrow would become him on such an occasion? You see how naturally tears flow at the sight of a painted scene in a deep tragedy; and what, then, would the world say of a husband who could see his wife languishing under the loss of appetite, and yet stand by her unconcerned, even after the physician had pronounced her case desperate? A man of the least compassion would be greatly affected; and I appeal to every one of you, whether you would not approve of his tender concern for so dear and intimate a relation. I know you would think yourselves inhuman and brutish if you felt no sentiments of pity for the sufferings of your bosom friend. And

What can be dearer to you than your own souls? Have pity therefore upon yourselves; for you are the men. This is your own picture, painted from nature, and by the eternal Spirit of God. You are these very persons labouring under this loss of appetite. Every one of you, by the fall, is in this dreadful case. Oh! therefore, turn your compassion upon yourselves, and if the sight of the bodily disease in others made you suffer, let your suffering be doubled at the sight of your own inward disease. Can you mourn over these outward maladies, and can you spare no tears for your poor distempered souls? Shall they be sick unto death, and shall not the bowels of your compassion be moved?

But you do not find them sick: you feel no pains for the loss of appetite. This is the worst symptom: for sin, which was the cause of the disorder, has now deluded you into the last stage of it. You are dying; and yet the delusion of sin is so strong, that you have no concern for your own death, your eternal death. Oh, my brethren, for the love of God, and all that is dear and valuable to you in time and eternity, rouse up your tenderness and pity. The Lord grant you may shake off this spiritual lethargy, which makes you so insensible of the distressed state of your souls. May he awaken you from the dead sleep of sin, and open your eyes to see your danger: for indeed we are all in this distress. Sin has robbed us of all appetite for our spiritual food. We have no desire, no relish for it; nay, while we continue in sin, we abhor it, we loathe it, our stomachs turn against it, and we cannot help showing our resentment against them who persuade us, and earnestly entreat us to take it, and live.

That all men are by nature in this situation, whether they see it or not, will be proved in the sequel: indeed, it is plain enough from the text; for the Psalmist teaches us that sin is the cause of this disorder; consequently, all who have sinned must be thus disordered: and are we not all sinners? and are not these sinners in the greatest danger who do not see that sin has brought them into this disorder? for, by not feeling their distress, they have no motive to cry out for help: but if it should please God to open their eyes, and to show them their spiritual malady, at the very sight of their extreme danger they would be moved to implore deliverance. And the first sigh that comes from an awakened heart pierces the ears of our gracious God: the Lord Jesus hears it, and h[illegible]es with all the haste almighty love can make to answer it: for it follows, in the 19th verse, "Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses:" as soon as they cried for salvation, the great physician was sent to save them—"Jehovah sent his word and healed them, and they were delivered from their destructions." His word, who healed them, was his essential word—even the second person in the Godhead, our Lord Jesus Christ—the word who was made flesh and dwelt among us: of this divine word it was foretold, in the Old Testament, that he should arise with the glory of the morning sun, bringing healing in his wings for all our maladies: and accordingly the New Testament relates that Jesus went about all Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing ALL manner of sickness, and ALL manner of disease among the people. He healed the bodily diseases miraculously, to prove that he was the almighty physician of the soul. And it is remarkable that he never rejected any person who applied to him for an outward cure, to demonstrate to us that he would never cast out any person who should apply to him for a spiritual cure. You hear, in the text, that so soon as they cried to him, he was at hand to save, and they had happy experience of the Psalmist's description of him —"He giveth them medicine to heal their sickness"—He gave them a medicine which presently restored to them a good appetite. He sent his divine grace into their hearts, which took off their loathing and abhorrence of food, and then raised in them a hungering and thirsting after Christ's righteousness: and this appetite for it will always be satisfied; for blessed are they, says the almighty physician himself, blessed are they that hunger now, for they shall be filled; they shall have more grace, who have a spiritual appetite, a hungering for more; they shall be even filled with grace: for he hath filled the hungry with good things, with grace to justify, and with grace to sanctify: these are good things including every thing that is good, short of glory.

And after the free love and mercy of our most adorable physician has raised us from the death of sin, and given us a new life, with new faculties and new appetites, and our spiritual food is now grown pleasant and desirable to our souls, so that we taste it and relish it with joy; how, then, can we forbear breaking out into his praises who has been so exceedingly gracious unto us? We cannot refrain. It would be offering violence in us to enjoin silence. We must be telling of what our dearest Lord has done for our recovery; and sorry we are from our hearts that we cannot honour him as we could wish. Our best oblations, our highest praises, what are they? How poor and unworthy a return for his inestimable love! But thou hast required them, blessed Jesus; and we present them before thee, knowing that we stand in need of thy merits to pardon our imperfect praises. Oh make them such as God the Father may accept: for we now praise thee for thy goodness, and we declare to all the world that thou hast done wonders of mercy for our salvation. And when the prophet inquired, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits done unto me?" he was led by the Holy Spirit to make this resolution: "I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord:" he went to the blessed sacrament, there to offer his sacrifice of thanksgiving; and there the Holy Spirit directs the redeemed of the Lord to go, in the last verse of the text: "And they sacrificed the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declared his works with rejoicing." This was the sacrifice of the Eucharist, to which the persons who have been healed of their spiritual maladies go, in grateful remembrance of the numerous and endless blessings derived to them from the body and blood of Jesus Christ; of which the sacrifices of thanksgiving under the law were expressive memorials: for at every such sacrifice the blood of some pure, clean animal was shed, and there were offered with it unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil, and the flesh of the sacrifice was to be eaten the same day it was offered. In like manner, at our sacrifice of thanksgiving, where these figures are realized, we have the sacramental blood of the most clean and unspotted Lamb of God, with which we have bread that is verily and indeed the flesh of Christ to the faithful, when it is, like these wafers and cakes, anointed with the holy unction of the blessed Spirit. When he accompanies the outward elements with his divine grace and blessing, than we partake of the body and blood of Christ: and his body is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed —the only meat and drink which can support the soul: for without them we have no life, no spiritual divine life, abiding in us. And after Christ has healed our infirmities, and restored our lost appetite, where should we go for food but to our Lord's table? Where can we receive, but from his body and blood, support to our souls, and growth in grace? He has instituted these outward signs to signify his inward grace, and has assured us that he will do the same thing to the soul which the elements do to the body. Upon this promise the redeemed rest. They go to the holy sacrament, both to offer their sacrifices of thanksgiving for what their Saviour hath done for their souls, and also to receive fresh pledges of his love and bounty. And whoever approaches the Lord's table with this faith, will always find occasion, when he comes from it, to declare the works of Christ with rejoicing. God grant this whole scripture may be fulfilled in every one who hears me, that, seeing your natural sickness by sin, you may be disposed to fly to the great physician, and may receive such a perfect cure, that his praises may be your delight and joy for ever and ever.

I have now gone through the paraphrase upon the words. You have heard the sense and meaning of them laid open. They contain a most affecting image of the misery and distress of our fallen nature, which we will briefly review by way of spiritual application in these three particulars, under which it was before considered in the paraphrase.

First, The distress of the sick.

Secondly, Their cure by the great physician. And,

Thirdly, Their grateful behaviour to him.

And first, As to the distress of the sick, you have seen it drawn by the Holy Spirit in the strongest colours: and his painting has a universal likeness. It does not represent this or that man, but every man; every son of fallen Adam is here painted to the life: for before he is redeemed, he lies languishing and pining away in a course of sin: his soul is in such a bad habit as his body is in when it has lost all appetite for food; and not only does not desire it, but even loathes it, and continues in this weak feeble condition until it draws near to the gates of death. Now, Christ is the only support and food of the sinful soul; and yet it has no appetite for him; not only does not desire him, but even loathes and abhors him, while it is drawing near to the gates of death; and it will be the Lord's mercy if the gates be not soon shut upon it.

And now, my brethren, let me bring this point home to you. Do you indeed believe that this is a true picture of human nature, and of every one of you in your sinful state, before you have redemption through faith in the blood of Jesus? The Holy Spirit who drew it, declares it is. And why should you not believe him? for it is founded upon a plain matter of fact, which you cannot deny; and that is, the universal corruption of mankind. If they be all sinners by nature, which is as certain as that they are men by nature, then they are all sick, and this picture is a true likeness of them all: for sin brings the soul low, and weakens its faculties, as sickness does the body and its faculties: and as sickness takes away the appetite of the body, and creates an aversion to food, so does sin take away the appetite of the soul, and creates an aversion to its food. This is plain matter of fact; and it is scripture too: for sin is the cause of this spiritual malady, and, since all men have sinned, all men therefore are spiritually diseased with the pains and miseries of sin. And there is no remedy upon earth, no human means, either by simple repentance or by morality, to heal this dangerous sickness. The divine and almighty physician is the only healer of the nations; but the moralist and the infidel want him not—the whole want no physician, but they that are sick: but they who see and feel the evil effects of sin earnestly seek and implore his help; and for them he has healing in his wings, as the Evangelist has remarked—"Jesus healed all that were sick, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." And when took he our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses? Was it not when he bare our sins in his own body upon the tree? For by his stripes we are healed. When he took away our sins, he then had power to heal us, and consequently, if he had not taken our sins away, we could not have been healed; but we must have remained in the foul leprosy of our transgressions, and in such a like condition as the prophet Isaiah has described: "Ah! sinful nation! a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children of corrupters—the whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint—from the sole of the foot, even unto the head; there is no soundness in it, but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores." This is a true description of all sinful people, and of every sinner in particular. And the image is just and expressive, if you apply to the soul what is here said of the body? for sin makes the whole head sick, and the whole heart faint. Sin disorders all the faculties of the soul, so that, from the sole of the foot even unto the head, there is no soundness: they are all corrupt: and the corruption will as certainly end in the destruction of the soul as a like total corruption in the body would end in its destruction.

But I have heard persons inquiring how can this be? Can I be thus sick, even unto death, and not know it, and not feel it? Most undoubtedly you may. Your case may be dangerous, even desperate, and yet you may have no sense of it: for this is a spiritual disease, and the cause of it is sin, and every sin obscures and blinds the eyes of the soul, and makes its other senses gross and thick, and a habit of sin deadens them entirely—what St. Paul, speaking of the unregenerate, calls being past all feeling. So that you may be sick unto death, and yet be past all feeling. The body in the meanwhile may be in health, and the soul may be dying. The body may be as strong as Samson, and yet the poor soul may be languishing and fainting, and drawing near to the gates of death; and it is the nearer the less apprehensive you are of it. If sin has so blinded and deluded you, that you neither see your guilt nor feel your danger, your case I pronounce to be at present desperate. You stand on the precipice. You are on the very brink of ruin: one step more, and behold, the pit is open. You fall. You are lost for ever. Eternal destruction is your portion. Men and brethren, take warning. I entreat you by the tender mercies of our Lord Jesus Christ to stop and to consider your case. Unless you are in love with pain and misery, be persuaded to request of our God to open your eyes. Let me beg of you (for I see your extreme danger), and out of love to your souls I importune you, to desire God to show your true state. And will you not vouchsafe to send up one desire to him for yourselves? But are you fully determined to keep your eyes shut against your danger, and to go on in your sins? Would to God I knew the proper motives to awaken your consciences, and to make you sensible that your sickness is unto death! If I did, you should not sleep a moment longer upon the brink of eternal destruction: for there indeed you lie, whether you see your danger or not. And can none of my exhortations, none of my friendly entreaties, prevail with you to rouse up and to look into your own hearts, and to examine your state and condition? Cannot I prevail? If you still turn a deaf ear to me, O blessed Jesus, I will then turn to thee. Thou God of love, send thy good Spirit upon every person here present, on whom my arguments have made no impression, and show them the dangerous malady of sin; that, feeling the pain and misery of it, there may be raised in their hearts a strong cry for thy salvation. And may our most adorable God now work in you this happy change, that you may be disposed to apply for your cure to the great physician of souls;—

Which is the second remark. You have heard how he treated the sick persons in the text. So soon as they cried to him for help, he came, and, by a remedy which never failed, restored them to perfect health: and he treats all his patients with the same love and mercy: he only waits till they be made to see their misery and to cry unto him for deliverance: and if it be but one deep sigh, but one short prayer—"Lord Jesus, be merciful unto me a sinner!"—if it come from the heart, he will be merciful: for his readiness to relieve the distressed is the second part of this beautiful painting—"Then they cried unto the Lord," says the Psalmist, "in their trouble, and he delivered them from their distresses—he sent his word and healed them." The Lord Jesus himself came. The great healer of the nations heard their cries; the bowels of his compassion were moved at the sight of their misery, and that tender heart, which bled for them on the cross, now melted into pity; for he desireth not the death of sinners, but rather that they should repent and live. He died to give them life; and, now they are asking for it, how can he refuse it? Can he who came down from heaven, and left his eternal throne, and laid aside his divine glory for a time—can he who went through the world poor and despised, hungry and thirsty, and weary—can he be without love? Did not he submit to this low abasement, and to these miseries, in order that he might be the sovereign physician of sinners? And now he has laid them prostrate at his feet, humbly imploring his free grace to raise them up, is it not impossible that he should deny to heal them? The crucified Saviour cannot want love; the almighty God cannot want power; and therefore, whosoever cometh unto him for cure he will in nowise cast out.

Such is Jesus, our most adorable physician: and are you not in love with his amiable character? How should it endear him to us that he is always disposed freely to heal, and that there is no spiritual disease so dangerous and inveterate but he has skill to heal it, nor any so offensive or odious in his sight but he has mercy to heal it? He neither wants will nor power. And can you believe this? Are you verily persuaded that the God of love is ready to heal you of all your maladies? And will you not come to him for a cure? When the blessed Jesus invites, when he presses you to accept health and salvation at his hands, what can tempt you to reject his gracious offer? I now stand up in his name, and by his authority now proclaim these tidings of great joy—"I will heal their backslidings; I will love them freely." These are our Lord's own words in the prophet Hosea, xiv. 4. And because he loves sinners freely, therefore he heals them freely. He requires no previous condition, but that they see and feel their sickness; and this he makes them sensible of, and then his free grace restores them to perfect health. And to such a physician who would not apply? To a physician who is almighty to heal, and whose love refuses none that apply to him, be they ever so sick and sinful—and who does all this freely. Free grace is his only motive. And upon hearing of such a physician, and knowing that you are sinners and want his help, will any of you think of leaving the church, without applying to him for relief? God forbid. I hope none of you will be such enemies to yourselves. What! will you prefer sickness to health, and pain to pleasure? Can you be thus infatuated by sin? Is there any of you still under this strong delusion? If you are, may the almighty physician take your case into his own hands, and out of his infinite love and compassion first dispose you to seek health from him, and then freely bestow it upon you. Blessed Jesus! let thy divine power be now present to heal every one of us, that we may all join in giving thanks and glory to thy name; which is the Psalmist's third remark in the text.

I shall speak very briefly to this particular, because it concerns only those persons who have experienced the skill of the great physician. They alone are here called upon to offer their sacrifice of thanksgiving. None can be thankful to Christ but they who have tasted of his redeeming love; because thankfulness arises from our sense of his mercy. We must first cry unto him to save us from the mortal disease of sin, and afterwards have received salvation, before our minds are rightly disposed to be thankful. And when the almighty healer has thus graciously restored us, we can no more, with this experience of his love, refrain from his praises than we can refrain from breathing: the redeemed of the Lord praise him as freely as they breathe: for praise is as much the breath of a redeemed soul, as air is of his body. The redeemed cannot be silent. It is their delight and joy; and they are never more happy than when they are praising the Lord Jesus for his goodness, and declaring the wonders which he hath done for their salvation. Oh may the number of the redeemed of the Lord increase daily! May the honour and praise of our almighty physician spread and be celebrated with more tongues and with more grateful hearts! O thou sovereign healer of every sinful malady, let thy fame be more known in the earth, and thy saving health among all nations. Manifest thy power to heal all the diseases of sin; but more especially manifest it to this congregation. O thou God of love, let thy power now be present to heal. We call upon thee, blessed Jesus, we earnestly entreat thee, to hear us, and grant that no one person may leave this place until they either desire to find, or do indeed find, that thou art a most loving God, almighty to heal the greatest of sinners: and for these our prayers we desire acceptance through thine infinite merits, that thou mayst answer them to the glory of God the Father, and to the honour of the Holy Spirit, the Trinity in unity, whom we worship and adore, now and for ever. Amen.

SERMON VI.

PSALM cvii. 23—33.

They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof. They mount up to the heaven: they go down again to the depths: their soul is melted, because of trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits' end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad, because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! Let them exalt him also in the congregation of the people, and praise him in the assembly of the elders.

THE Psalmist, in this divine hymn, calls upon us to be thankful for the blessings of redemption; and in order to inspire us with the greater thankfulness, he sets before us a perfect representation of man's misery before he is redeemed. The three first parts of this sacred painting have been already considered. We have seen that man, in his natural fallen state, is as much at a loss to find out the way to heaven as a traveller would be in some vast desert, where he is quite lost and ready to perish. He is as much unable to walk in the way, even if he were directed aright; being fast bound with the chains of sin, as a prisoner would be, who is shut up in a dungeon, and there bound with misery and iron. And if his chains were knocked off, and the prison-doors thrown open, yet he is in such a weak, languishing condition, that he cannot stir one step. He has so weakened and impaired his faculties by a course of sin, which has brought on him a total loss of appetite, and has so worn him away, that he is now near to the gates of death. These are the three beautiful images, under which the Holy Spirit has drawn the picture of our fallen nature. The fourth, which puts a finishing hand to the performance, is contained in the words now read; wherein our distress is still heightened, and our danger is painted in more strong colouring. The subject of this last piece is a storm at sea: and I believe there is not in the universe an object more great and striking; nor is it possible to represent it in words more clear, or in descriptions more affecting, than what the Holy Spirit has here used. May he dispose your hearts to receive the instruction which they hold out to you, that every one of you may reap the profit from them, for which he inspired them and left them upon record. And to this end you will look up to him for his grace and blessing, while I am,

First, Laying before you a paraphrase upon the words; and then,

Secondly, Applying the doctrine contained in them to your spiritual benefit and improvement. And,

First, The Holy Spirit has here given us the representation of a storm at sea; which is so expressive and sublime, that the bare reading of it is sufficient to humble the pride of human genius. If one of the best heathen poets had undertaken to write upon the subject, he would probably have given us a volume upon it: whereas this sacred drawing, though it be short, is nevertheless absolutely complete. The description rises up to the greatness of the subject, and every circumstance, in the order it is mentioned, heightens what went before, and makes the whole so full and perfect, that they who have been in a storm at sea, and in danger of being cast away, cannot but tremble at this relation of it. "They who go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in great waters; these men see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep." We see his wonders everywhere: the creation is full of them. In every place, in every condition of life, we may behold evident marks of almighty power and infinite wisdom; but they who live a seafaring life have more evident marks than any other persons; for they see the most wonderful display of the divine attributes. Upon the land, we can scarce form an idea of what they feel and endure at sea, when, at the word of God, "the stormy wind ariseth, which lifteth up the waves thereof." The accidents of the storm, and the causes on which they depend, are here so justly represented, that it is not possible to see a more affecting picture. You may here behold distinctly, and in beautiful order, the command of God—the action of the wind—the rage of the waves—and the distress of the mariners. God commands the wind to arise—the wind raises and lifts up the waves of the sea—the waves beat furiously against the vessel—put her in danger—and this danger raises another tempest in the souls of the poor mariners. In this chain of causes and effects God holds the first place; for he commandeth the stormy wind, and then the wind lifteth the waves of the deep. Although the wind be nothing but air in motion, yet there is no agent in nature capable of acting with greater force and violence. The sea, in a perfect calm, appears to be one beautiful and even plain, smooth as the polished marble; but the wind no sooner begins to blow, than it is ruffled and agitated. And when it blows with might and fury, it tosses up the waves, and beats them one against another with such impetuosity, that the noise is incessant, and as loud as thunder. And then, heaping wave upon wave, they here swell into lofty mountains, and there sink down into deep and horrible valleys. The natural weight of the water carries it down, and the violence of the storm raises it up; and by the opposition of these two jarring elements there is formed the most dreadful conflict which is to be seen in the universe; even on the shore, where you are safe, yet you cannot behold it without horror. But what must be their situation who are in the midst of the storm, and over whose heads the raging billows are breaking every moment! How great must be their distress when they find their vessel become the sport of the winds and waves, and sometimes carried up to heaven, up high into the air, and presently down again into the deep! And to give us a strong image of the confusion of the mariners, the Holy Spirit adds, that they reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, tossed from one side to the other, thrown up and down, and reeling about, as unable to walk upright in the ship, as a drunken man is upon the land. In this distress they find the rudder, and the sails, and the oars, of no use. The fury of the wind and storm carry the vessel where they please, and the waves, beating against her with all their might, in different parts, and in different directions, shake her strongest timbers, and make such wide leaks, into which the sea comes pouring in, that the affrighted mariners are at their wits' end. All their wisdom is swallowed up. The light of reason cannot suggest to them any expedient, or if it could, yet the strength and arm of flesh are not able to carry it into execution. All hope of being saved is now taken away, and their souls are in the utmost fear and dread, and melt away because of the trouble, as it is here expressed—no stability is left, no courage remains. Their minds are agitated like the ocean, and in as much confusion: for besides the loss of the vessel, and of the goods, on which they set but too great a value, they can turn their eyes no way, but they see the waves ready to swallow them up, and death awaiting them on every side. No desired shore, no favourable haven appears. On earth there is no prospect of deliverance.

This is a short sketch of the Holy Spirit's description, which, how briefly soever I may have represented it, is nevertheless perfectly expressive and sublime in itself, and will appear more so to them who have seen a storm in its highest rage and fury: for if you have never seen one, you can form but very faint ideas of it. I judge thus from my own experience: for I have seen many storms from the shore, and thought I could have given a good description of them; but when I was afterwards really in one, and in danger, I then found that my former knowledge was very imperfect. To be in a storm at sea is as different from seeing it from the shore, as a painted storm differs from a real one. It felt very differently to me from what it had ever done before, when I was in the midst of the waves, and was tossed up to heaven, and then down again to the deep. The sea ran so high that I well remember, when our ship was down in the deep, between two waves, I could not see the top of the mast of a large vessel which came very near us during the storm. You may judge what a situation we were then in. I believe the stoutest heart among you would have trembled upon this occasion. If you would know how you should have behaved, put yourselves in the same situation we were in. Suppose yourselves to have been several days in a troubled sea, tossed with winds and tempests, and at last all hopes of being saved began to fail. What do you think would be your sentiments, if the storm should still continue, the vessel should grow leaky and ready to sink, and instant death was before your eyes? If you could really suppose yourselves to be in this situation, you would want none of my arguments to persuade you to seek help from God in such a time of need. Would not you pray, and entreat him with strong crying and tears to come to your assistance? Oh with what earnestness would your souls implore and beg him to stretch out his merciful hand, and save you from perishing! Let there, then, be raised in your hearts the same strong crying and tears that you may be delivered from a more dreadful storm than what we have been considering. This tempest in the natural world is but a faint image of a much greater which sin has occasioned in the spiritual world. The one is but a painted storm compared to the other. And to this more terrible storm you are all subject. Every son of Adam, being a sinner, is embarked on a troubled sea, where the winds and waves are contrary: for it must be remembered, that this description cannot be peculiar to sailors, because the whole Psalm is spiritual; it belongs to the redeemed of the Lord; and all his redeemed people do not literally go down to the sea in ships, nor do they meet with storms from the rage of winds and waves; and yet they are all called upon to be thankful for being delivered from some storm; consequently they were all in this storm before they were redeemed, and they were thrown into it by the same cause which made them lose themselves in the wilderness—fall into the pit—sicken and pine away for want of appetite. Sin was the fruitful parent of all these miseries. And the storm which sin raises in the soul is a spiritual tempest, of which the natural is a picture. The Holy Spirit intended the one should be a natural representation of the other. He gave us the outward image, that we might in it see the likeness of an inward storm. And he himself, in his own word, has applied the outward image to represent these inward objects, and therefore we have his own infallible application of the text, wherein he supposes us all to be embarked upon a voyage to the haven of eternal rest. And we sailed thither on a smooth unruffled sea until sin entered into the world, and raised the winds, and made the waves beat against us, and a furious storm darkened the face of the sky, and hid the desired haven from our sight. And here the Holy Spirit begins his description: "They who go down to the sea," into the ever moving, busy, agitated world, which sin has made like the troubled sea, "in ships," in worldly societies, opposed to the ark of the church, which is but one, "and do business in great waters," and are occupied in worldly business among the crowd, and in the bustle of worldly men; "these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep:"—they see a full display of his wonderful works in his manner of bringing these worldly people into distress: for he commandeth; all afflictions come by his order and appointment; this especially, which raiseth the stormy wind, which moveth the spirit of the world to oppose its own people, and lifteth up the waves thereof to distress them. Worldly men meet with a sea of troubles; for the wicked are like the troubled sea when it cannot rest: waves after waves beat against them, and swell and lift up themselves still higher and higher, until the raging billows break over their heads. And when these afflictions come, they are so distressed, their minds are so tossed and agitated, that they can find no rest. Sometimes they mount up to heaven, carried up and swoln with spiritual pride; then again they go down to the depths, sunk with distrust and despair—their soul melteth away, and has no stability or courage left, because of the trouble. The trouble is so great, that the light of reason is put out. The boasted moral sense refuses to take the helm, and the rectitude and dignity of human nature dare not direct. The religion of nature, and the fitness of things, aided with all the graces and ornaments of the arts and sciences, and set off with the lustre of classical learning, cannot hinder them from reeling to and fro, and staggering like a drunken man. Nay, with all these learned and polite accomplishments, they are at their wits' end, quite unable to find out any expedient to extricate them from their distress.

This is a true picture of man in his natural state. It is drawn by the Spirit of God, and is the likeness of every son of Adam; for sin has thrown them upon this boisterous sea, and raised this furious storm against them, and the spirit of the world and the devil keep it up in all its fury, and drive its mighty billows over their heads. And they can do nothing to escape perishing in the deep waters. Nothing but death is before them. Oh may the God of mercy open your eyes to see your danger, that finding no help upon earth, you may be disposed to look up to him, from whom alone can your salvation come! And being thus disposed, then you will follow them in the text—"who cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses."

This is the second part of the beautiful painting in the text. Happy was the affliction which made them seek help from God: for while the world smiled on them, they were apt to forget heaven. But when affliction pressed sore upon them, and no human relief offered, the most stupid and hardened sinners were then ready to ask relief from God, and to seek him in their distress, although they had forgotten and despised him in their prosperity. But no affliction works this happy effect more certainly than the dangers of the sea, which are so great, and in a storm so far out of the reach of any succour, that there are very few, in such a case, who do not cry unto God for help. And hence comes the common saying—"that they who know not how to pray should go to sea to learn." A storm is an excellent teacher: it forces men to pray; it makes the most profane and irreligious look up to heaven; and if they once look up with the prayer of the heart, our God, out of his infinite love, immediately hears and answers. "Call upon me," says he, "in the day of trouble; so will I hear thee. And it shall come to pass, that before they call I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear." Thus prayer engages the Almighty on their side, and then nothing is impossible to it. Prayer commands the elements—changes the seasons—stops the sun in its course—quenches the violence of fire—and calms the most tempestuous sea. You saw these poor mariners in distress: they had exerted all their skill, and toiled so long as their strength lasted, but to no purpose; the storm still raged, and grew more violent; so that, all efforts being in vain, they give up their vessel to the fury of the winds and waves, and then, at last, betake themselves to their prayers: and the prayer of faith did for them what the united skill and strength of all the men in the world could never have effected. It calmed the wind, it quieted the waves, it smoothed the sea, and carried the shattered vessel safe to the desired haven: for upon their crying to him, "he maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still: then are they glad, because they be quiet; and so he bringeth them unto their desired haven." And this deliverance is to them a matter of great gladness: the past danger enhances the present safety; the storm which they have escaped now increases their enjoyment of the desired haven: for, it is certain, we relish prosperity better after adversity, peace after war, and health after sickness. A calm is never so pleasant as after a storm. And while we are tasting the pleasures of it, how can we avoid acknowledging our deliverance with gratitude?

This is the third part of the painting in the text. So soon as these mariners are delivered, they instantly offer up their sacrifice of thanksgiving: "Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men!" The wonders which he had wrought deserved their best thanks, not only in private, but also in public; not only in the closet, but also in the great congregation. And the Holy Spirit, in the last words, calls upon them to exalt their deliverer in the congregation of the people, and to praise him in the assembly of the elders, (that is, openly, in the face of the church,) and if they should neglect this, I appeal unto you all, whether such ungrateful wretches did not deserve to have perished unregarded in the storm.

I have now considered the paraphrase upon the words, and have set before you the lively painting of our natural state, which they contain: and I come, secondly, to the spiritual use and application of them.

The image is this. Mankind, before they are redeemed, are like a ship in a stormy sea, agitated with passions, tossed up and down with cares, and so blown about with various temptations, that they are never at rest. This is their calmest state in the smiling day of smooth prosperity: but afflictions will come, the afflictions of sin, and Satan, and the world, will raise a violent storm, which all the wit and strength of man cannot escape. He will soon be swallowed up of the devouring waves unless that same God who created the sea, speak to it—"Peace; be still." We are all in the same situation the apostles were when they were alone, in the evening, in the midst of the sea, and the wind and the waves were contrary; against which they toiled, rowing in vain, until Christ came to them, walking upon the sea, and commanded the winds to cease, and the waves to be still. Upon which, there was a great calm: for they knew his voice who had spoken them into being, and they obeyed. His word is almighty to compose and still the raging war of the most furious elements. And he is as almighty in the spiritual world as he is in the natural. Into whatever soul he enters, he commands all the jarring passions to be still, and there is indeed a blessed calm. Oh may the almighty Saviour speak thus unto you all, that you may sail on a smooth unruffled sea until you arrive safe at the desired haven of eternal rest!

And now, my brethren, after what has been said in this and the preceding lectures of man's fallen state, let me ask what opinion you entertain of it? Do you really think that the image which the Holy Spirit has set before you this day is true, and drawn from nature? Do you indeed believe that sin has thrown you upon the wide and furious ocean, that the spirit of the world and the devil have raised a tempest against you, that you are every moment in danger of being swallowed up by the merciless waves, and that there is no deliverer, in heaven or earth, but the Lord Jesus? If you do not believe this truth, upon what principles do you deny it? Not upon scripture principles; for it is very common in scripture to describe the sinful state of man under this image. The book of Psalms is full of it. In the 18th, Christ, complaining of his enemies, says, "The floods of ungodly men made me afraid; but God took me: he drew me out of many waters; he delivered me from my strong enemies." Here the many waters and the strong enemies stand for the same persons. The 69th Psalm begins thus: "Save me, O God! for the waters are come in unto my soul. I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me;" and then, in the 14th verse, Christ prays for deliverance in these words: "Let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters." The same ungodly men who hated him are also called deep waters. He prays again, in the 144th Psalm, verse 7: "Send thine hand from above; rid me and deliver me out of the great waters, and from the hand of strange children." And these strange children are compared to troubled waters throughout the prophets, and even to the end of the New Testament. St. James likens the inconstant wavering man to a wave of the sea, driven with the wind, and tossed; and St. Jude calls the ungodly infidels, raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame. And St. John, in the 17th chapter of the Revelation, has given us a key to open all these scriptures: he was shown, in a vision, the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters: and in the 15th verse, the angel explains the vision, and says, "The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues:"—all the unconverted race of mankind, of every nation and tongue.

These scriptures are plain and express; and the meaning of them cannot be mistaken. If you deny the evidence which they give, you must deny the plainest matter of fact in the world: for if you look upon the troubled face of the sea, and then look into the working of your own souls, you must observe the most striking likeness. The mind is as seldom serene and calm, as the face of the ocean is: various passions, succeeding one another in perpetual fluctuation, forbid it to rest—they are always agitating and tossing it—opinions are continually changing, tempers ever fluctuating, as wave follows wave—fashions are never at a stand, not only in dress, but also in learning—one system still pushing out another, ebbing and flowing, like the tide—and even the moral relations, and the moral fitness of things, notwithstanding their metaphysical eternity, are always fluctuating and changing, and yet always restless. And it cannot be otherwise; because the mind of fallen man is the very picture of the troubled sea when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt, troubled like the sea, like it cannot rest, like it casting up the mire of corruption and the dirt of sensuality; consequently there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. And is not this altogether the perfect likeness of the changeable inconstant world, whose tempers, passions, pursuits, and vices, are like the waves of the sea, succeeding one another in perpetual fluctuation and disorder?

Thus experience confirms the testimony of scripture, and by the mouth of these two witnesses the truth ought to be established. And what farther objection will you make to it? You will not say that you do not find it to be a matter of fact by your own experience. Would to God none of you made this objection! for it does not prove that you are not in a storm, but only that you are seized with a sinful lethargy; and you doze and sleep on while the vessel is sinking. Oh, my brethren, this is the strongest delusion of sin! and for the love of God and your own souls, awake! You are indeed perishing: see! the waves are breaking in upon you; death is at hand, and will not your own safety induce you to shake off this lethargy? What a wonderful delusion is this! Satan and the world have been crying unto you, Peace! peace! when there is no peace; they have lulled conscience asleep, and probably have seared it with a hot iron, and rendered it past feeling. In this case you will not feel your danger, although you are just sinking; the waves will soon swallow you up; and then you will find a storm, when the wrath of the Almighty falls upon you, of which the greatest fury of winds and waves can give but a very faint and imperfect image. God grant you may escape it! and may his grace awaken all your consciences, who sleep in sin! May the infinite love of the blessed Jesus open your eyes, and show you your danger, that you may be led to cry unto him for deliverance! which is the Second remark I have to make. And this relates to those persons among you who find they are in a storm, and are willing to come to Christ, as these redeemed of the Lord did in the text, that he may command the winds and the waves, and there may be a calm. If you can but once see your danger, you are safe: for your distress cannot be greater than the Redeemer's mercy. Although you find yourselves sinking in the mighty waters, yet you have only to cry with Peter, on the same occasion, Lord, save me! and Jesus will certainly stretch forth his almighty arm, and you shall be saved. If you do but see your danger, and, out of the deep sense of it cry unto him for help, he will not cast out your prayer: for he is a God of love, and his love is almighty to save. Be your sins ever so great, ever so numerous, your danger from them ever so imminent, fly but to the altar of his mercy, and take hold of the merits of that most precious blood which was shed upon it, and then you are safe: for the blood of the Lamb of God was shed for sinners, and no sinner ever sought aright to partake of the merits of it, and was cast out. I came not, says the blessed Jesus, I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Sinners alone want a Saviour, and our God was therefore called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins; and he has promised, in the text, that as soon as they cry unto him out of the deep sense of their distress, he will hear and answer: for he is always more ready to save than they are to cry unto him for salvation. And may these considerations hasten you to seek this help: into whatever distress sin may have thrown you, if it has exposed you to all the storms and tempests of the world, yet here is an almighty deliverer. The winds and the waves know his voice; and when he commands, they obey. At his word the jarring elements are silent in the natural world; and they will be the same in the spiritual. If he speak peace unto your souls, there will be a calm indeed. The rage of conscience, agitated by the dark blasts of guilt, and by the horrible waves of misery, will presently subside, all the inconstant tempers and ruffled passions will be composed, and a serenity but little short of heaven will ensue.

Such is the God of our salvation. Whoever among you, then, sees your danger, and wishes for deliverance, come to our God, and he will save you. Come to the Lord Jesus with strong crying and tears, and you have his word for it, that you shall find in him an almighty deliverer. Oh ye poor distressed souls, whom conscience and guilt torment, here is your only remedy. Look up to your redeeming God; for his mercy is above your distresses. Your offences may be great against him; but they cannot be so great as you will find, by faith, his love is to you. He loved you even when you left him: how much more will he love you now you are returning? Remember what he suffered for you: for your sins he sweat drops of blood; for your sins he endured the torments of his bitter passion; for your sins he bled on the cross; and for your sins he died: his love to you was stronger than death: and therefore be not discouraged at the sight of your own wickedness. He will receive you, be ye ever so sinful: he will not shut you out, if ye have been ever so ungrateful. Only come to him this day, and let there be raised in your hearts a strong cry for his salvation. Now try the truth of what you have heard. Seek him with your most fervent desires and earnest prayers, and see whether he be not the almighty Saviour of sinners. And if you come believing, as these redeemed of the Lord did, in the text, who, when they saw no way left to escape, at last looked up to him, then he will as certainly save you as he did them. Oh may his blessed Spirit put it into all your hearts to seek his love, until he bring you to the haven where you would be; first to the holy haven of the church militant, and then to the happy haven of the church triumphant! And

After you have received his mighty deliverance—after he has brought you safe from the storms of the world, and has calmed the winds, and composed the waves which opposed your voyage to the desired haven—has made you a just and holy member of the ark of his church, and has placed you securely in it—after he has done these wonders for you, is it possible for you to be silent in your deliverer's praise? While you have a grateful sense of his benefits fresh in mind, you will certainly be celebrating them. You cannot refrain from the just tribute of thanks. And this is the third and last part of the beautiful painting in the text: "Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men." And they who have been in danger, and they who have been delivered, and now live in safety and joy, they must be telling of his salvation all the day long. Their hearts overflow with gratitude and praise. Redemption is their favourite subject; and the very name of their Redeemer is dear and precious. JESUS is a word that sounds exceeding sweet and pleasant in their ears: they find continual delight in speaking of their redeeming God, and in declaring the wonders which he hath done for their redemption. And they praise him with the gratitude of the heart, and with the thankfulness of all the affections, not only in private, but also in public; not only with their lips but with their lives: for the praises of a pure and holy life are the best sacrifices of thanksgiving which we can now offer. And may our almighty God and Saviour grant that every one of you may thus praise him! O blessed Jesus! let this scripture be fulfilled to-day in this whole congregation! Let not one of them depart until they see upon what a stormy ocean they are all embarked, and what dreadful winds and waves sin, and Satan, and the world, have raised against them. Show them their danger, that they may fly unto thee for help. And the moment they cry unto thee, be at hand, O God of love! to hear and answer; and bring them safe by thy good Spirit from the storms and tempests of this world unto the desired haven. Blessed Jesus! say unto our troubled souls, Peace, be still! Let thy grace calm all our passions, and so smooth all our ruffled tempers, that every one of us may go out of the church in perfect love with thee, and with one another. Hear us, most adorable Saviour, and answer us to the glory of the Father and to the honour of the eternal Spirit, three persons of one undivided Essence; whom we worship and adore now and for ever. Amen.

SERMON VII.

PSALM cvii. 33—39.

He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the water-springs into dry ground; a fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein: he turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water-springs. And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation; and sow the fields, and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase. He blesseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly; and suffereth not their cattle to decrease.

IN the former parts of this divine hymn we have seen the misery and distress of mankind in their fallen state, from which, so soon as they were made thoroughly sensible of it, and humbled under it, our gracious Redeemer delivered them. He came upon their first cry; and his almighty arm brought salvation. And his love was equal to his power: for he not only saved them from their misery and distress, which was indeed a most adorable act of free and unmerited grace, but he also enriched them with his divine and heavenly blessings, which, since they could never merit, they could therefore have no reason ever to expect. But mercy is the distinguishing attribute of our Lord Jesus. He is free to pardon—free to give. Whosoever cometh unto him, he will in nowise cast out, neither out of his love here, nor his glory hereafter. And shall not they, who have tasted of his redeeming love, comply with the prophet's request in this psalm? Shall not they be thankful? Consider from what a depth of misery his free grace has raised them, and then judge how it is possible for them to refuse their due tribute of thankfulness? You saw them first in the wilderness, lost and starving travellers, ready to perish: you beheld them falling into the pit, where the enemy found them, and put them in chains of misery and iron: and how greatly were you moved at the sight of their sickness, when they lay pining away through a total loss of appetite, and were grown so weak and feeble, that death was ready to take them into the prison of the grave, and to shut its gates upon them! and, what was the worst of all, the soul was never at rest; sin, which brought them into these miseries, made them still more miserable under them. Guilt would not suffer any of the faculties to be composed, and conscience never knew what it was to be in a calm. Indeed, the whole man, body and soul, were in such a continual ferment, and so distressed for fear of perishing every moment, that nothing in nature could so perfectly represent their situation as the distress of mariners at sea in a violent storm. These are the dark scenes in which the unconverted and unregenerate lay: you have beheld the shady part of their picture: now you are to look upon a more agreeable and pleasing prospect. Under the image which we are to view at present, the Holy Spirit has given us a beautiful painting of their deliverance; and we see the same persons who lay in the most exquisite distress, here placed in the most delightful and happy circumstances. They are brought out of the wilderness, and out of the pit, and are healed of all their infirmities; and their consciences are composed and calm—they are pardoned freely—made just and holy—admitted into the one true church of Christ—and blessed in it by him with all true, spiritual graces. Oh what an entire and happy change is this! God grant that every unconverted person here present may experience it! May he turn the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water-springs, &c. May the love of our almighty Deliverer exert his power this day, and fulfil every word of what is here said of the Gentile church in this whole congregation! while I am

First, Laying before you a comment upon the words, and Secondly, Bringing the doctrine contained in them home to your hearts, by way of spiritual application.

The Holy Spirit begins with a description of the rejecting of the Jewish church, and of the transferring of its privileges and graces to the Gentiles. "He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the water-springs into dry ground." This passage is here applied in a spiritual sense; it relates to redemption: and nothing more is necessary to the understanding of it than to remember that water is, in scripture, the known and established emblem of the Holy Spirit. What the one does in nature, the other does in grace. St. John puts the matter beyond all doubt, in his comment upon Christ's words, who had been speaking of the waters which should flow from believers: But this, says he, he spake of the Spirit. And the other scriptures speak of the Spirit under the same image. A church enriched with the graces of heaven is compared by the prophets to a well-watered garden, Isaiah lviii. 11, Jer. xxxi. 12, to the paradise of God, watered with its four fruitful rivers: for, as every thing useful and ornamental in the vegetable world is raised up by water, so is every thing in the spiritual world raised up by the Holy Spirit. And in the Jewish church he had caused every virtue abundantly to grow: it was nourished with the streams of his divine grace, enriched with the dew of heaven, and blessed with rivers of comfort, insomuch, that it wanted no manner of thing that is good. St. Paul thus enumerates the blessings of the Israelites: "To whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came," Rom. ix. 4. And when he came, this once favourite church would not receive him for the promised Messiah, but rejected and murdered him. For which crime the greatest part of the Jewish nation was cut off, and the rest, according to their own prophecies, were dispersed over the face of the earth, and they will continue dispersed, until they receive Jesus of Nazareth for their Saviour and their God. While they justify the horrid rebellion of their forefathers, who crucified the Lord of life, the veil must remain upon their hearts: and it is remarkably upon them at present; for they are the most stupidly infatuated of all people, living without either civil or ecclesiastical polity, without a temple, without a priest, without sacrifices, without an atonement, and, indeed, they are now without a God; because they have rejected the true God, the blessed Trinity of their fathers, and worship they know not what. They have set up some strange kind of an infinitely extended metaphysical being, whom they call the one supreme God, and who never had any existence but what the enemies of Christianity have been pleased to give him. Thus they have turned the once fruitful church into a wilderness And the Holy Spirit here describes them in this situation. The church of God, which he had blessed with his promises, and with his prophets, and had enriched with the continual streams of his grace, was now made barren. When it rejected that God and Saviour, on whom its whole economy was founded, then he took away all its privileges and blessings, and it has been ever since a poor, dead, barren wilderness. Deprived of his grace, it was reduced to the same state which the most fruitful country would soon be in if it should be deprived of the rain and dew of heaven: for then nothing could grow. It would become a barren desert. Apply this to the present state of the Jews, and you see how God turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the water-springs into dry ground—and, as it follows in the 34th verse, "He turneth a fruitful land into barrenness for the wickedness of them that dwell therein." This scripture is now fulfilled literally as well as spiritually. The Holy Land has been as remarkable for its fruitfulness, as it is now for its barrenness; for it was once the most fruitful country in the world. The sacred writers mention the particular blessings with which it was enriched. Moses speaks of it in these words: "The country which thou goest to possess is a land which the Lord thy God careth for; the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year, even unto the end of the year; and therefore it is a good land; a land of brooks of water, of fountains, and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of olive oil and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness: thou shalt not lack any thing in it." And it fully answered this description. It was once dressed and cultivated, and flourished like a fruitful vineyard; but at present it lays desolate and waste. The vineyard of the Lord of hosts was the house of Israel; and because, after all his cultivation, they brought forth no fruit, therefore he declares, "I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down. And I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned nor digged, but there shall come up briers and thorns. I will also command the clouds that they rain no more upon it," Isaiah v. 5, 6. This prophecy is now fulfilled. Judea is one entire wilderness, overrun with briers and thorns, as historians relate, and modern travellers testify. And the fruitful land was turned into barrenness for the wickedness of them who dwelt therein. Wickedness was the cause of its desolation. The prophets had foretold them of their utter extirpation from the promised land, if they should reject the Messiah when he came. And he came to his own, but his own received him not; they opposed, blasphemed, and crucified him, and therefore, according to his own predictions, they were cut off and dispersed over the face of the earth; and the fruitfulness of their country was taken from it, and given to the Gentiles, as it follows in the 35th verse: "He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water-springs." The heathen nations gladly received Jesus for their Saviour and their God, and therefore their wilderness was turned into a standing water, and their dry ground into water-springs; and this happened when the Spirit was poured upon them from on high: for then the wilderness became a fruitful field, and the desert rejoiced and blossomed like the rose; it blossomed abundantly, and rejoiced even with joy and singing. And he enriched the heathens thus abundantly with the streams of divine grace, after he had made them thirsty, and had disposed them to receive the water of life with thankfulness; "for when the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them; I the God of Israel will not forsake them; I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground—I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring; and they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water courses." The prophet Isaiah is full of these images: he frequently compares the heathens, before they received the gospel, to a desolate wilderness; but, after they embraced it, to a cultivated garden, enriched with beautiful flowers and useful fruits, covered at first with the most fragrant blossoms, and afterwards abounding with the richest products; and it received all its fruitfulness from the rain and dew of heaven. The grace of the Holy Spirit was the cause of their flourishing and bringing forth fruit under the gospel. His gracious operation is as necessary in the spiritual world as the genial influences of warm showers are in the natural. He does the same in grace which they do in vegetation.

The scripture teaches us to take our ideas of his operation from this image; and it is very familiar and well understood. You all know what are the effects of soft gentle rain: you have seen it cover the earth in a short time with a most agreeable verdure, after it had been parched and burnt up with a long drought. You have seen what plentiful harvests followed a mild dropping season; so that it might be said, without a figure, "the clouds drop fatness." And you may see the influence of the Holy Spirit equally fruitful in his province. Look into the early ages of the Christian church, and you will see how he blessed and enriched the first converts from heathenism: they put forth every blossom that is fair and fragrant, and were fruitful also in every good word and work: they had been like barren trees in a wilderness, without leaves, or blossom, or fruit; but, so soon as they were transplanted into the church, they began to flourish abundantly, and, watered with the continual streams of divine grace, they brought forth fruit unto eternal life. And thus the wilderness was turned into a standing water, and the dry ground into water-springs, verse 36; "and there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation." And in this fruitful soil he placeth the hungry. They wander no more, as they did in the wilderness; they are no more lost and ready to perish; but they here find an abiding city, and are securely settled within the pale of the church. "And they sow their lands," verse 37. Our blessed Lord has explained these words. The seed, he says, is the word—sowing the seed in the lands is sowing the word in the hearts of the hearers. And this was the office of the apostles, and of the succeeding ministers of the gospel. Indeed, the apostles were most eminent and blessed in this great work: for they carried the good seed into all lands, and their words unto the ends of the world. They converted whole provinces and kingdoms to the faith, and they went on sowing the word without ceasing, until they had planted it in every wilderness upon the face of the earth, and had there watered it with the dew of heaven. Oh that our Almighty Lord would raise up in this our day an army of apostolical ministers, who, like their predecessors, have the good seed sown abundantly in their own hearts, and are therefore best able to sow it in the hearts of others! And by the success of such men in sowing their lands, may many "vineyards be planted!" A vineyard is, in scripture, the established emblem of the church, where the true vine grows and flourishes. The Psalmist and the wise king apply it in this sense; and the prophet Isaiah puts it beyond doubt in the 5th chapter, where, explaining the parable of the vineyard, he says, "the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel." And our blessed Saviour makes this application of the same parable; indeed, the Jews themselves make it: for when he asked them what he should do to those husbandmen who had injured some, and slain others of the servants of the Lord of the vineyard, and at last murdered his own son, they reply, "He will miserably destroy these wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen." Accordingly, he let it out to us. When he destroyed the wicked men of the Jewish church, he then let out his vineyard to us Gentiles. The apostles came and planted churches among us, and the almighty arm of our God has thus far protected them. Oh may his grace and favour continue, that we "may bring forth fruits of increase," as the churches first brought out of the wilderness did. They brought forth all the fair blossoms of a holy life; and they were not like some early buds, which are apt to be cut off by cold winds and sharp frosts, but they had grace to withstand the severest storms of temptation, and both to set and to ripen their fruit—fruit of increase—growing still in grace—increasing from one degree to another—and persevering until they reaped the crown of eternal glory. And thus the last part of the beautiful image in the text was completed—He blessed them so that they are multiplied greatly, and suffereth not the cattle to decrease. By the particular blessing of the almighty God and Saviour, they multiplied greatly; the Lord adding to the church daily such as should be saved. His grace went out along with the first preachers of the gospel, as he still does with all his faithful ministers; and he gave them a fortitude, which no danger could intimidate, and a power of utterance, which the adversary could not withstand: insomuch, that when the poor fishermen had been toiling all the night and had taken nothing, yet, when the Lord gave the word, and accompanied it with his blessing, they enclosed a great number of fishes, even enough to fill both the ships—both the ark of the Jewish and the ark of the Gentile church. Then was his promise fulfilled: "I will make you fishers of men:" for they caught thousands at once. The first time they let down the net, they took three thousand, and the second time, five thousand. So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed. And though this be a day of small things, yet the Lord's hand is not shortened: he can still bless us, and make us multiply exceedingly. We see some happy instances of it; sufficient to convince us that if we had more apostolical ministers, who had a single eye to the glory of their adorable master, and were inflamed with a fervent love to the souls of men, he would still bless our labours abundantly. O almighty Jesus! we are here waiting for thy blessing: now bless us; and, since thou hast promised that the very cattle of thy household, the church, should not decrease, enable us, Lord, so to increase, that every part of this scripture may be fulfilled to-day in this whole congregation. And may his divine grace influence all your hearts, while I am endeavouring to speak unto them under the Second general head, Which was to apply what has been said.

The words contain a new argument for thankfulness, taken from the loving-kindness of our most gracious Redeemer, who found us in the dry barren deserts of heathenism, blind in ignorance, sunk in vice, and yet, wretched as we were, his mercy was moved at the sight of our misery, and his grace flew to our relief. When the Jewish church rejected him, and persecuted his apostles and followers, then he sent the Romans to destroy it. Upon which we were taken into his love and favour. We poor heathens, who lay in darkness and the shadow of death; we were admitted into his church, watered with his grace, enriched with his blessings, and protected by his almighty arm unto this very day. And ought we not to be thankful for such inestimable and eternal mercies? Should we not speak forth the praises of this most loving Redeemer, and endeavour to inspire all the world with gratitude to him? Certainly, this is a duty most right and equitable; and therefore I will make some short remarks upon the distinct parts of it, in the order they are placed in the text. And

First, The Holy Spirit here teaches us what a situation we were in before God turned away the streams of his grace from the Jewish church, and directed them to us. We were in a barren wilderness—barren of every thing spiritual and divine. Although the heathens flourished in arts and sciences, were polite and classical; although they could form the accomplished gentleman, and finish the character of the good moral man; although they had excellent systems of ethics, and knew all the moral and civil virtues; yet, if the word of God be true, they were in a wilderness. The most refined classical scholars, with all their knowledge, were in a vast desert; for they knew not Jesus Christ. And without him the most polished genius is no nearer salvation than the most barbarous savage; because, without him, they neither know the way to heaven nor, if known, can they take one step in it. There was a total ignorance among them concerning the divine nature, and concerning the atonement for sin: and our ancestors in this island were sunk as low in ignorance and vice as any of the heathens. They were in a wilderness, where no saving truth grew; but superstition and idolatry flourished. That we are not still in this situation is entirely owing to the free mercy of our blessed Redeemer, who sent the streams of his grace into our barren hearts. This is the Second point remarkable in the text. The Psalmist says, he sent waters into the wilderness to change its nature; that is, he sent his grace into our hearts to change their nature, to show them their dead and barren state, to make them sensible of it, distressed under it, and then cry to him for deliverance. And when grace has thus far disposed the heart aright, and it can pray for more grace, then will our Lord enrich it with abundant streams; for he is always disposed to give in the measure we are disposed to receive: and if we hunger and thirst for much, he has promised that we shall be filled. There is no doctrine of Christianity more opposed than this, nor any at present more ridiculed. And until men desire to have their barren hearts changed, it must sound strange to them to talk of the necessity of doing what they have no desire to do. They have found nothing of this barrenness in their own souls; they do not believe what we say of it; and therefore it appears to them like talking of a sixth sense. But the more insensible they are, the greater is their danger. And if there be any of you in this state, thus dozing and sleeping away your lives in carnal security, be assured that you are yet in the wilderness, and, the less you see it, the more barren you are. If you see not your hearts covered with sin and desolation, oh what blindness, what infatuation, has seized you! for until you see your natural barrenness, you will find no want of grace to amend and enrich the soil; and without grace nothing can grow. It is equally necessary towards changing and reforming the soul, as water is to change and reform the desolate wilderness. And as in its hot dry sand no vegetable can grow without moisture, so in your barren hearts no good thing can grow without the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ: "for without me," says he, "ye can do nothing." And therefore, my brethren, if you refuse to believe this doctrine, you must act against the evidence of your senses. And it will greatly increase your condemnation that the scriptures have set in so clear a light the necessity of grace; and yet you would not be convinced, but would still obstinately live and perish in your barren state, unfruitful and dead to every good word and work. May God show you, since argument cannot, your sinfulness and guilt! Oh that his blessed Spirit would now let you see your own hearts, that there may be raised in them a strong crying for grace! And if he does bring you to desire it, the love of our blessed God, who has it to give, cannot withhold it: he will bless and enrich you to such a degree, that you shall bring forth fruits of increase. This is the fore sent into the wilderness, that its nature might be changed, and might bring forth fruits of increase. And into whatever heart grace enters, it makes an entire change and reformation. A wilderness improved into a regular and beautiful garden is not so great a change: for grace makes the man a new creature. The dead faculties of his soul revive, the barren grow and shoot forth, the understanding bears the fairest blossoms, and the will and affections ripen and perfect the sweetest fruit. Under the genial influence of grace, the whole man is like a tree planted by the water side, always green and flourishing, that will bring forth its fruit in due season. And whatever fruit is brought to maturity by the mild and gentle operation of this divine agent, will be acceptable to God the Father. Good works, put forth and perfected by grace, are well pleasing to him. When grace has changed our barren hearts, and reformed them, by justifying us through the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ, then are we enabled to proceed in the work of sanctification; but not before: because an unjust person cannot bring forth justifying fruit, no more than a corrupt tree can bring forth good fruit. Our persons must be just and right before our works can be; and the scripture is positive, that we are created in Christ Jesus unto good works. Good works belong to a new creation; and before we can do them, we must be created anew; we must become new creatures in Christ Jesus, and be grafted into him by the living principle of grace, and draw our nourishment from him as much as a branch does from its stock, before we can bear the fruit of any one good work. This is scripture. This is the doctrine of our church. And whatever some proud self-righteous Pharisees may fancy, this is the doctrine of philosophy and nature. We have sensible demonstration of it. Take a branch off from the stock on which it grew, and let it lie in the open air; what will it produce? You see, it withers and dies. If any man be cut off from Christ, the stock upon which we must all grow or perish, for ever, what will he produce? Hear our Lord's judgment: "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine; ye are the branches. He that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing." This is the determination of our infallible God; and if you refuse to submit to it, after it has been confirmed by our church, and indeed by the whole Christian church, and by matter of fact, and sensible demonstration; if all this evidence cannot convince you, what will you object to the experience of all living Christians, who declare with one voice: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy free grace be all the praise." This is the language of every true believer; who confesses that he cannot so much as think a good thought without the influence of the Holy Spirit: for it is he who worketh in us, both to will and to do. If this still cannot convince you, may that grace which you oppose work upon your hearts, and convince you effectually! May the giver of all grace show you your barrenness without it, and dispose you to seek until you find a thorough change and reformation! and then you will join your grateful hearts with ours in returning praise and thanks to our God, who has so blessed us with his grace as to enable us to bring forth fruits of increase.

And this is the fourth and last remark, which belongs to believers who know by happy experience the truth of the scripture which we have been considering: for the love of our Lord Jesus Christ has brought them out of the wilderness, changed their barrenness by his grace, planted them in his church, watered them with the dew of heaven, and enriched them with all the sweet fruits of a holy life. In you, my Christian brethren, this scripture is fulfilled. And therefore you cannot but be thankful. To our dearest Redeemer you offer up your praises with joy and delight. When you consider what wonders Jesus hath done for your salvation, you cannot be silent in his praise; but, big with a lively sense of the numerous and eternal blessings of his free grace, you speak of him with the highest strains of gratitude, and yet you find you cannot put forth all his praise. You are unable to declare, in words, what your hearts feel; and therefore you let your lives speak forth his praise, as well as your lips. Oh may his blessed Spirit keep you always in this thankful temper! and may our gracious and most adorable Jesus increase daily the number of the thankful! May his grace change and reform the wilderness of sinners' hearts, that the good seed of the word may be sown in them, and they may grow and flourish in the vineyard of the Lord's church, there bringing forth abundantly the fruits of increase! O almighty Saviour, if there be any in this congregation still in the wilderness, now bring them out of it; now water their hearts with the plentiful streams of thy grace, and grant, most loving God, that some—oh! if it be but one soul—may be added this day to thy little flock; that, finding thy blessing and thy power present among us, we may go on multiplying exceedingly, until the earth be full of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the waters cover the sea: and may all redound to the glory of God the Father, and to the honour of the eternal Spirit, the Trinity in unity, whom we worship and adore now and for ever! Amen.

SERMON VIII.

PSALM cvii. 39—41.

Again, they are minished and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow. He poureth contempt upon princes, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way. Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock.

WE left the redeemed of the Lord in the most flourishing situation. After they had been brought out of the wilderness, and delivered from the pit, and healed of their infirmities, and saved from the storms of vice, they were placed under the tender care of their most loving Redeemer: and, upon the rejection of the Jewish church, he sent into the wilderness the abundant streams of his grace, and there he planted the Gentile church, watering it with his good Spirit, and cherishing it with the genial warmth of the light of life; by whose influence it grew and spread, and was so enriched and blessed, that it multiplied exceedingly, and became like a well cultivated and fertile country, where they sow their lands and plant vineyards, which yield them fruits of increase, some a hundred fold, some sixty fold, and some thirty fold. And this experience of their Redeemer's love is certainly sufficient to make every one of them thankful, and to excite in their hearts the warmest sentiments of praise and gratitude.

In the words which I have read, we have a new motive for thankfulness, taken from the decline and decay of the Christian church. Its fruitfulness is now turned into barrenness. The same country which you saw before adorned with the sweetest blossoms, bringing forth the richest fruits, and covered all over with plenty, is now degenerated again into a wilderness. Nothing grows in it but thorns and thistles, the fruits of the curse. This is a melancholy change of the church, and it should move us greatly to see it fall back again into the same desolate and wretched state, from which it had been raised. But it has been the invariable rule of the Redeemer's providence. He waters the church with his grace, and blesses it with the light of his fruitful rays, so long as men will receive their kind influence. But when they reject them, either by refusing to make any use of them, or by perverting them to a wrong use, then he withholds his blessings; he withdraws his grace and the light of his countenance: upon which, the same darkness and deadness ensue in the church as would be in the world if the sun were to withdraw his comfortable light and heat, and to arise no more with his reviving beams upon the earth. Thus he turned the fruitful land of the Jewish church into a wilderness for the wickedness of them who dwelled therein; and he transferred their fruitfulness to the wilderness of the Gentiles. And again, he turns our fruitful country into a wilderness for the wickedness of them who dwell in it. He began to fulfil this scripture by removing the grace and light of the gospel from the seven churches in Asia; and he has left us, in this treatment of them, a terrible example of his just vengeance upon every wicked infidel church. And he has since taken vengeance upon several other churches. When they refused to walk by the light of his gospel, he then removed the candlestick from them; and, deprived of his light, they could produce nothing but the works of darkness, and would certainly be sentenced to that outward darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth for ever. Our church has long refused to walk by the light of the gospel. God grant our candlestick may not be entirely removed! We do indeed deserve it. Our crying national sins, and our open insolent infidelity, call aloud for judgment. Oh! what mercy must dwell in his breast who hears daily multitudes of traitors plotting the destruction of his divinity, and yet, after repeated acts of treason, for any one of which, against the king's person, they would have been justly put to death, nevertheless spares them, and withholds the deserved punishment! But although he be a God of mercy, yet his Spirit may be grieved, and his long-suffering may be wearied out. Remember how he destroyed the seven churches; and behold in what a wilderness they now lie: and we shall perish after their example, unless we repent. And I hope the consideration of the scripture now before us may, by his blessing, be the means of persuading those among you, who are his enemies, now to sue to him for pardon, and to confirm those who have placed their whole trust and confidence in his merits. As to the former, their dreadful situation is described in these words: "Again they are minished and brought low, through oppression, affliction, and sorrow," &c. And as to the latter, they have a sweet promise of his loving protection, even in the greatest corruption of the church: "Yet setteth he the poor humble Christian on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock." While the rest of the world sits in darkness and in the shadow of death, the people of God have light in all their dwellings. While others are visited with his plagues and judgments, he sets his own people on high, out of the reach of affliction; and in the worst of times he watches over them with the care of the most tender shepherd, and makes them families like a flock. And these are the persons here called upon to be thankful: and if they, after such mercies, should be silent, the very stones would cry out, and call them ungrateful.

Let us then meditate upon these interesting words,

First, By considering their sense and meaning, and Secondly, By applying the doctrine contained in them to our spiritual use and improvement.

And may the blessed Spirit go along with us, and enable us to reap all the profit from this scripture, which he intended for the faithful by recording it! Let us, then, inquire into his guidance, by what means the church, which we saw before flourishing and fruitful, should now become a desolate wilderness, and were brought out of it, and placed in the fruitful garden of the church, are again diminished and brought as low as they were at first. They decrease in number, and are depressed in condition. They who multiplied exceedingly are again diminished, and they who were high in every respect are brought low. The faithful are diminished from among the children of men. Oh! dreadful change! to be turned from fruitfulness into barrenness—from a flourishing church into a desolate wilderness—from being cherished with the comfortable rays of divine light, and watered with the fertile dew of heaven, now to be deprived of both—are the greatest calamities which can befal a people in this world. To be thus driven into the wilderness again, is worse than to have been in at first; because, after God had visited them with the grace of his gospel, and has now withdrawn himself in displeasure, there is no reason to think that he will return in mercy to a people who have abused his grace and insulted his gospel. After he has long waited to reclaim them, and they still reject the offers of his pardoning love, and stand out against all his entreaties, obstinately rebellious, then it will be but just and equitable if he suffer them to be again diminished and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow. These three are the causes of the decay of the Christian church; and they contain a short history of that mystery of iniquity which now worketh in the children of disobedience. The first cause is, the oppressor; the second is, the evil of sin, into which he brings them; and the third is, the evil of sorrow and misery. And it is impossible that any church or society should flourish which is under the vile bondage of the cruel oppressor, and sin and misery. Under these tyrants it must be diminished and brought low.

The first, we render Oppression; but as there must be an agent to perform the action, I therefore chose to give him his term of office, and to call him the oppressor. Such a one was Pharaoh, who oppressed the children of God, and by his hard bondage tried to diminish them and to bring them low: and he holds forth to us, in his manner of treating the Israelites, a lively portraiture of a more cruel oppressor, who is a declared enemy to all the people of God, and who has been trying to murder them from the beginning. The oppression of this great adversary was represented in Pharaoh's bondage: for it was by his instigation that Pharaoh was such a tyrant over the bodies of the Israelites as he is over the souls of all his deluded followers. So that the oppressor is a just and expressive title of the great tyrant, the devil. Is not he the oppressor of God's people, who brought us all into slavery by the original transgression, and who leaves no temptation untried to keep us his slaves? Although he deals in nothing but lies and murder, yet he keeps the multitude under his infernal bondage, and oppresses them with the most heavy yoke of sin and misery. And when they begin to be uneasy, and to be galled with the yoke, he tempts and deceives them on with lies, using all his cunning wiles, and laying every bewitching snare for their destruction. And although they are assured that he has no wages to give them, but death, temporal and eternal, yet he deludes and leads them on, until he gets them fast bound with the chains of sin and misery. And is he not an oppressor? Is not such a lawless tyrant, who has an absolute dominion over sinners, and who executes it with hellish malice, is not he the great oppressor? And so far as his tyranny reaches, the church must be diminished and brought low. He keeps it under by means of evil, which is the second cause of its decline. We render the word Affliction, but it signifies evil, and, properly, the evil of sin. The evils of affliction and misery, which follow sin, are expressed in the third cause of the church's decay. The great oppressor overthrows the most flourishing church by sin. This is the successful battery he raises against it; by which he first gained and still keeps his dominion: for sin cuts off all the supplies of grace which the soul might receive from heaven, strips it of its armour, and leaves it quite naked and defenceless against the oppressor's stratagems; and a course of sin reconciles men to it: and although they know it must end in their eternal destruction, yet they never seek, nay they are offended when we press them to seek, that divine grace which alone can set them free. And is it not the strongest of all delusions, that the oppressor should make men choose eternal destruction, and should force them to work and labour for it—to take more pains to obtain a place in hell than are necessary to gain heaven? What bondage can be harder? Must it not wear them down and bring them low? For sin is the cause of all evil; and that which subjects us to all—evil of all kinds—certainly must be the vilest oppression. And it is impossible that any church should be in a flourishing condition which is under the bondage of Satan and sin, and thereby subject to sorrow, which is the third cause of the decay of the Christian church. The word Sorrow includes all the evil effects of sin upon the body and the soul, in time and to eternity: for no good can come wherever sin is. The prophet Isaiah gives the reason, lix. 1, 2: "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save, neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear: but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear." Evil is the cause of God's withholding good: "for your iniquities," says he, "have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you." And when the good things which God has to give are withholden, what can the sinner find but misery and sorrow? And must not misery and sorrow wear him down, and bring him low? Will they not affect his soul, as sickness does his body, bringing it first down to the grave, and then to the lowest place of the infernal pit? And thus the church decays. By these three causes it declines. Christ made it flourish—the oppressor makes it diminish. Grace rendered it fruitful—sin renders it desolate. Through Christ and his grace, it was happy—by the oppressor and sin, it is miserable. And it is one of the strongest proofs and evidences of its present low estate, that the offices of the church, which were formerly respectable, are now become contemptible—"he poureth contempt upon princes." The head of the church fulfils his promise—"them that honour me, I will honour: but they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed." Be their rank and station ever so great, yet, if they despise me and my laws, I will make them despicable; their highest honours shall not keep them from the lowest contempt, but shall expose them the more to it, and bring it upon them the sooner: for they were therefore raised to be princes, that they might have it in their power to prevent the decline of the church. Their great offices gave them authority, and their great revenues gave them interest, which they ought to have employed for the honour of their master; but as they suffered him to become contemptible, he therefore poured contempt upon them. "The priests' lips," says God, in the prophet Malachi, "should preserve knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts: but ye have departed out of the way: ye have caused many to stumble at the law; therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people." So long as the priest's lips preserve knowledge, he is respectable. So long as he has a zeal for his master's honour, he is in high esteem. But when he forgets whose servant he is, and pursues any one thing in preference to the salvation of men's souls, then God suffers him to fall in the opinion and esteem of mankind; for his sovereign Lord and Master poureth contempt upon him, and "causeth him to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way." He, who should teach others the right way, wanders from it; and even the princes are turned into the wilderness, where the gospel at first found them. And when the shepherds are thus lost and bewildered, what must become of their poor flocks? Can the teachers show the sheep how to keep out of that wilderness into which they themselves are fallen? How should it be that the blind should lead the blind, and yet neither of them should go astray? Doubtless the sheep must be unhappy, which have a blind shepherd over them: for the wolf may prey upon them unmolested, whenever he pleases, and may devour and disperse the whole flock.

This is a faithful account of the general decay of the Christian church. Sad experience proves the truth of it. The once flourishing church is now turned into a wilderness. We see it. The whole face of Christendom, compared to its former fruitfulness, is now a desert. The light of the gospel is almost extinguished for the wickedness of those men who take upon them the name of Christianity, but deny the power of it; for the European churches, Protestant and Roman, are already diminished and brought low by the great oppressor, and by sin, and by misery: they are so low that the princes have lost the respect due to their high offices, and are become contemptible, and are now got into that very wilderness from whence the gospel delivered them. In these times of general corruption, the Redeemer might in justice take away our candlestick, as he hath done from other churches. But here is the subject of praise and thanksgiving—that he still continues the light of the gospel to us. He is infinitely merciful to them who trust to him; and be they ever so few, ever so poor and mean, yet he has given them a most sweet and comfortable promise, that when he comes to visit a wicked infidel church, he will watch over them with the care of the most tender shepherd, and they shall lack nothing. Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction—the poor—the poor in spirit—the humble Christian—he setteth on high. He will exalt them of low degree, according to his invariable rule: He that humbleth himself shall be exalted. "And he will make them families like a flock:"—no flock can be more safe within the fold than they shall be: regarded by his infinite love, watched over by his all-seeing eye, and defended by his almighty arm, they shall be set on high, out of the reach of danger. Though they be few, yet they are as dear to their God as the apple of his eye. Though the world despise them, yet the Lord Jesus loves them. Though they be the scorn and ridicule of an infidel age, yet he esteems them more than his own life; for he shed his blood upon the cross to save them. Though they be the off-scouring of the earth, yet they are the riches of heaven. And when their Lord comes again in all his glory, he will take them into his family, and will admit them into the eternal joys of his heavenly kingdom. How happy then must these Christians be, who are thus blessed in those worst times of the church! And oh how thankful should they be, that they were not carried away with the torrent of vice and infidelity! The more wicked the age is the more are they indebted to the grace of their God, which kept them from the prevailing corruption. And seeing nothing but open profaneness around them, how can they refrain from the praises of their dearest Lord, who preserved them from it? Certainly they cannot avoid giving him thanks for this great blessing while their hearts feel it; and they will do all that lies in their power to make others partake of the same blessing, that they may join with us in the same thanks. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for the wonders that he hath done for the redemption of men!

This is, I think, the sense and meaning of the text: and it is a very awakening scripture, and ought to rouse up your particular attention: for it offers to your consideration a most interesting truth; viz. that the Christian church would decline from its flourishing fruitful state, and degenerate again into the wilderness, from whence the Redeemer had taken it. And has this scripture been fulfilled? Has the Christian church been, or is it at present, in a wilderness? Let us consider these points under the second general head, and endeavour to improve them to our spiritual use and benefit. And first, the flourishing church was to be diminished and brought low by the cruel oppressor, and by sin, and by misery. And, God knows, it is diminished and brought low indeed; so very low that it is of the Lord's mercy we are not consumed! And I hope his goodness in sparing us may be the means of converting some, and confirming others; if we take a short view of our present unhappy state, with respect to immorality and infidelity, and to consider how little we deserved to be spared.

As to morals, our people are entirely corrupt. They are, beyond the example of former ages, dissolute and dishonest; insomuch, that his majesty has more than once recommended it to the parliament to try to put a stop to the spreading of immorality. But nothing has been done. Nay the want of morals is so evident and glaring, that even the teachers of dry morality begin to find it, and have lately complained in public, that, after all their moral preaching for near a hundred years, the people are not in the least more moral. And is it not time, then, to have done with mere morality, since we have had so much preaching of it, that now we have no morality left? This moral preaching has made our people so immoral, that they are got to a pitch of wickedness beyond what the very heathens ever attained: for to boast of having no virtue or honesty, to make it a matter of merit to be able to act upon no principle, and to be guided by nothing but interest; these are the peculiar characteristics of the present age. And when men thus avow open and barefaced corruption, and, throwing off the very mask of honesty, dare appear publicly the rotten advocates for vice, then certainly the church can never be diminished and brought lower, as to morals. And it might reasonably be expected, that the common people would be thus immoral, since the great have set them the example, and have entirely cast off Christianity. Men of rank and politeness are become too refined and delicate in their notions to believe in Jesus Christ. And they have taken away all necessity of believing in him by utterly exploding his divinity: and yet they keep up the name of Christianity, which is the most stupid and idolatrous religion that ever was invented, if the author of it be not the true God. It rests entirely upon the divinity of Christ: this is its foundation. Nothing can stand without it. But where shall we find great and learned men who believe that Jesus Christ is self-existent, and equal with the Father in every perfection and attribute? Publicly from the press, privately in conversation, you hear this fundamental doctrine of Christianity ridiculed and insulted; and the disbelief has spread, and poisoned all orders and degrees of men; insomuch, that we have societies erected upon the principle of blasphemy, with liberty of free debate, as they call it; that is, with liberty to blaspheme the Godhead of Jesus Christ. And, what is the most melancholy point of all, the church and state look on unconcerned, while that God, whose servants they are, is treated with more insolent blasphemy in this city than the very Jews offered to him at his crucifixion. And are these things really so? Do immorality and infidelity flourish thus abundantly among us? If they do, immorality will soon pull down our church, and infidelity will dig up the very foundations of it; and then, certainly, it will be diminished and brought low. God grant it may not fall lower than it is; but that the few names which are left in it may be kept from falling, and others may daily be added to them! And this we pray for the more earnestly, that Christ may not pour contempt upon princes; which is the second remark.

The church must be fallen very low when its princes are become contemptible: for they were raised to great dignity, that they might stop the torrent of profaneness and unbelief. Their honours and revenues were to give them weight and influence in the support of their Master's cause: and when it was sinking and like to fall into disgrace, it was certainly their interest then to maintain it with all their might; because, if it fell, their disgrace would not be long after it. But they sat still and quiet, enjoying themselves, warm and snug in their opulent stations, while their Master was wounded with immorality and crucified afresh by unbelief. Although they eat of his bread, yet they saw him robbed of his divine glory, and neither used their tongues nor their pens in his defence: therefore justly did he pour contempt upon such princes. He made them base and mean in the eyes of the people. He took away the respect due to their high offices, and, because they refused to defend his divine honour, though they were well paid for it, he therefore made them dishonourable: for them that despise me, says our God, whatever their station be, shall be lightly esteemed. And has not this happened? Look around Christendom, and see in what church the princes of it are respectable. The bishop of Rome—how low is he sunk! and his brethren are falling fast into disgrace; and the latter part of this verse is fulfilling—"He causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way." Christianity at first found them in a wilderness, and brought them out of it; but now, by rejecting Christ, they are got into it again: for every church without him is desolation. The finest system of religion, that the wit of man can dress up and delineate, is a wilderness without Christ. Let it be ever so artfully put together, yet, unless it begin and end with him, it is but a mere desert. Lay the foundation of it ever so deep in the religion of nature, build it up ever so strong with morality, and adorn it ever so richly with metaphysics, yet it will be a mere delusive phantom, and of no use but to feed learned pride. As Christ is not in it, furnish it with what you please, it will want all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, of which the Christian church is full: for it is a building made of God; the foundation of it is laid upon the rock of ages, even upon Jesus Christ, and in him alone it is built up and supported. And it shall stand for ever, and be as beautiful as the paradise of God, when all human systems shall be in ruins; for this shall survive the flames of the great day, and all its members, with Christ at their head, shall ascend into the church triumphant with eternal glory. And then they who built a religion without Christ will be turned away into a wilderness indeed—even the wilderness of mere moralists, of the profane, and the infidel, unto the place appointed for their eternal reception and torment.

Oh what a melancholy and terrible state of things is this! And now let us consider, thirdly, how the prospect of it ought to affect us. And whatever our condition be, I think it must affect us greatly: for what grief of heart must it be to every true believer to see the church which once flourished and multiplied exceedingly, now thus diminished and brought low—to behold the interest of their sovereign Lord lost, and his princes contemptible; how afflicting is the thought! But it is indeed distressful when the danger comes nearer to us, and we see the once fruitful church become a wilderness. Such as the poor ignorant heathens were before Christ came, such are we like to be, with this heavy circumstance to add to our misery, that they wished and longed for what we reject. They saw their want of a Saviour, and embraced the good tidings of the gospel with great joy. But we want no Saviour. Natural religion is enough for us. And the gospel, in any other light than as a system of morality, is absolutely rejected. Thus we are in a worse condition, by refusing Christ's offers of mercy, than the poor heathens were; and consequently our wilderness will be more dismal and melancholy than theirs. And how soon our church may be turned into this wilderness, God only knows: but of this I am certain; that we deserve it, and we have lately had many loud calls to prepare us for it, and some of his judgments are still heavy upon us; and unless they lead us to repentance, we must perish. Our destruction is at hand. And while our national sins are crying aloud for vengeance, oh let every one of you, who have any interest in the Saviour of the world, call aloud unto him for mercy. Let us pray without ceasing for the continuance of his blessed gospel among us. And let this consideration inflame our hearts, and add zeal to our devotion, that our Lord has promised to set the poor Christians on high, out of the reach of affliction.

This is the fourth and last remark, which belongs only to believers who are of Christ's family and flock. Let the times be ever so bad and corrupt, they shall be safe; let the times be ever so tempestuous, they shall be set on high, out of the reach of the storm. His grace shall keep them from corruption, and his almighty power shall defend them from the distresses of the times. What a sweet promise is this! and how full is it of consolation! God grant you may all taste the comforts of it, and then you will be thankful indeed. You will see how gracious a Master we serve; and you will have reason to bless his holy name. He will pour down upon you, not contempt, but the riches of his free and unmerited graces; by which you will find that, though the Christians be few and poor and mean, though the church be diminished low, yet the head of it is still the almighty God. Jesus has all power in heaven and earth; and he can give his followers, however the world may despise them, such joys as the world has not to give, and such (thanks be to him for it) as the world cannot take away. And these joys he here promises to them who are of his family and flock. And we know that he is faithful who hath promised. We have experienced his faithfulness. God grant you may all experience it this day! that you may happily begin the new year! And though the weather be dull and cloudy, like the state of the church, and the sun has not appeared for many days, oh may the day-star arise, and supply his place in all your hearts with a better light! and then you will go away thankful. And may the mercy of our most adorable Saviour be extended to this whole church and kingdom, as well as to this congregation! Oh may he send out his grace to reform the morals, and his good Spirit to stop the infidelity, of our people! Blessed Jesus, spare them a little. Now the sound of the Gospel is heard in our land, be pleased to accompany it with thy blessing. And if they, to whose ears it is brought, still reject it, then indeed they will deserve destruction. But, in thy wrath, oh think upon mercy! Spare thy people, O Lord, spare them, and turn not thy once fruitful heritage entirely and finally into the wilderness. Hear us, thou God of love, and answer our prayers to the glory of the Father, and the eternal Spirit—the Trinity in unity—to whom be equal honour, and worship, and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

SERMON IX.

PSALM cvii. 42, 43.

The righteous shall see it, and rejoice: and all iniquity shall stop her mouth. Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord.

THE Holy Spirit finishes this divine hymn with these words. He here sums up the argument, and makes the application. His subject is thanksgiving. The argument used to inspire us with thankfulness is taken from redemption. And, since redemption is the greatest blessing which the Almighty has to bestow upon his creatures, it is consequently the strongest argument for their thankfulness. In order to show the greatness of the blessing, the all-wise Author of this psalm has painted, under several images, the exquisite distress and misery of mankind, before they were redeemed. And these images are just and expressive. They are founded in nature, and drawn to the life. And all the redeemed of the Lord have seen their lost estate by sin, which is represented under these images, and can bear their testimony to the truth of the representation: they remember when they wandered in the wilderness out of the way—when they fell into the bondage and prison of sin—and were there sore diseased with its plagues—and always uneasy and disturbed, like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, tossed and agitated with the storms of vice. The retrospect of these miseries now makes them thankful to their Redeemer, who showed them the way out of the wilderness, by enlightening their understanding; who delivered them from the prison and bondage of sin by justifying them with his most precious blood; and he sent his word, and healed them of all their plagues, by sanctifying them with the holy anointing of his good Spirit; and thus he calmed and composed all the storms of vice which had threatened their destruction. And then he placed them in the secure haven of the church, where they flourished and multiplied exceedingly. In the early ages of Christianity, this part of the psalm was fulfilled—when the first preachers carried the sound of the gospel into all lands, and their words unto the ends of the world. But in these latter days, the church is again diminished and brought low by the cruel oppressor, and by sin, and by misery. These are the three causes of its decay; and they have now reduced it into the same wretched state in which it lay before it had the knowledge of redemption. But in these times of reproach and blasphemy, the Redeemer has still a small flock left, over whom he watches with the care and affection of the most tender shepherd. And when he comes to destroy a wicked infidel church, he will set these poor humble Christians on high, out of the reach of affliction, and will make them families like a flock. "The righteous shall see it and rejoice, and all iniquity shall stop her mouth. Whoso is wise, and will observe those things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord." God grant that every one of us may be wise to observe those things, and that we may have the true experimental understanding of the loving-kindness of the Lord! and then we shall be able to join our thankful hearts and voices with the church militant and triumphant, and to ascribe praise, and honour, and glory to Jesus, our redeeming God. And may the eternal Spirit now be present among us, and direct our hearts by his grace, enabling us to finish our meditations upon this psalm, with that thankfulness and gratitude, with which he intended it should inspire us And may this be the happy effect of our considering,

First, The sense and meaning of the words, which contain the application of the whole psalm. The righteous shall see it. The word, here rendered righteous, is not what the scripture commonly uses to signify righteous or justified persons; but it is another word, and conveys another idea. It signifies to direct—to set right; and the righteous here mentioned are they who are directed in the right way, and walk, as Enoch did, with God in his way, and not in the way of the world. And these shall see the goodness and mercy of God's dealings with the fallen race of men. They shall have eyes to see the ways of his providence. The same grace which set them right will manifest to them the reasonableness of the plan of redemption. They shall see and admire, and be thankful for, the wonders of his redeeming love, which are recorded in this divine hymn. While they read it, their own hearts will bear testimony to its truth; for it is a lively picture of their own state and condition. They well remember the time when sin misled them, held them in bondage, and subjected them to all its diseases and storms: but so soon as they had a deep sense of their misery, and were disposed to seek the Redeemer's mercy, he was at hand—a God to save. When they cried unto the Lord Jesus in their trouble, he delivered them out of their distresses, and gave them a free and full redemption. Finding all this fulfilled in their own souls, have they not great reason to rejoice? The righteous shall see it, and rejoice. It shall be to them a matter of solid lasting joy; not like the crackling of thorns under a pot—a flashy transitory joy, which arises from a light vain mind, and which the world can give and take away—but the Christian joy is the fruit of the Spirit, produced by his gracious working upon the heart, showing it the dangers which it has escaped, and the happy state into which it is brought; from whence springs what the scripture calls joy in the Holy Ghost; because it is entirely his gift. Nothing but his grace can enable sinners to rejoice in the Lord always; which we find they can: for this is the happy state of every pardoned sinner—that he can rejoice in God. So soon as he is admitted into Christ's kingdom, he is filled with peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. The sense of Christ's redeeming love administers to him joy unspeakable and full of glory; as he told his apostles, "Ye shall be sorrowful; but your sorrow shall be turned into joy, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." Every believer has found the truth of this scripture. After they had seen their lost estate by nature, and their souls were filled with anguish and bitterness at the sight of their guilt and misery, they cried unto the Lord Jesus for deliverance, and he came. His infinite love brought him with haste to save them, and he turned their sorrow into joy, giving them reason to rejoice with a gladness of heart, which no man can take from them. Oh may the love of the almighty Jesus bestow this joy upon every one of you! and he will not withhold it from you if you seek it. If you can but desire it, you will find him more ready to give than you are to ask it. He shed his blood to purchase it for you: he bought it with an inestimable price; and the same love which disposed him to die, rather than you should be without this joy, still disposes him to bestow it. Go, therefore, to the throne of his grace. Ask, and ye shall have. And will you not go to him for it? Will you not receive it upon these easy terms? Have you no desire to attain that joy which Christ alone can give? no desire to be pardoned, to be made just and holy, and to be filled with the fruits of the Spirit—love, joy, and peace? If any one of you are in this wretched condition, stop—reflect a moment—and consider what enemies you are to your own enjoyments; for you cannot live without joy. And what is your constant subject of rejoicing? If it be any thing in this world, it is imperfect in its kind: you know it by experience. And it endures but a short time; and then it perishes, and you with it. And will you prefer this empty destructive joy to that fulness and perfection of joy which Jesus Christ has to give? Be ye assured, there is no true cause of rejoicing but in him, and nothing that deserves the name of joy but in the knowledge of what he hath done for our souls. And would to God I could inform you perfectly of this knowledge! for if you had clear ideas of it, you could not avoid seeking and praying for it: but it is indeed beyond description. Joy in the Holy Ghost is an earnest and a foretaste of heaven. Oh may you seek until you find it; and may the blessed Spirit bring you into the happy number of the righteous, who see the wonders which the Redeemer has done for their salvation, and therefore rejoice! And when their joy is full, then all iniquity shall stop her mouth: the ridiculer and the blasphemer shall be silent. They shall be struck dumb, and not able to open their mouths against the Lord and against his Christ. They will no longer be able to object to that gracious plan of redemption, by which our God decreed to bring many sons unto glory: but all iniquity —all—without exception—every infidel champion, every treasonable society, every congregation of rebels, shall stop their mouths. Lord, when are we to see this much desired day? Oh when shall the blasphemers of Jesus be silent? when shall it be no longer said, that God our Saviour is not self-existent, and equal in every perfection and attribute with the Father? When shall the infidel cease to tread under foot our most adorable God, and the wicked cease to crucify him afresh? Not, I fear, till the end: for while there are evil men, there will be railing and blasphemy. But there will be a day when iniquity shall stop her mouth; and it is not far off: when our Lord shall come again in all his glory, then they shall look upon him whom they have pierced, and they shall see that the crucified Jesus is a God indeed; the lustre of his divine glory, infinitely beyond the brightness of the sun, will be to them insufferable; and confounded, abashed, silenced, they shall lay their hands upon their mouths. And when he pronounces the dreadful sentence upon them, never, never to be reversed, "Go ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;" then they shall not have one word to object—all iniquity shall stop her mouth.

Until this great day come, it is every Christian's part and duty to defend his Redeemer's cause: but it is more particularly incumbent upon us, who have taken his commission, and are his ministers, to exert ourselves in his defence.

Actuated by zeal for his honour, and by love to these precious souls for whom he died, we should be unwearied in our labours. Every talent and gift with which we are blessed ought to be devoted to the promoting of his interest; and we should strive to bring as many as we possibly can over to it. And every person we gain is stopping one of the tongues of iniquity. And if we gain but few, yet we may bring such arguments in defence of the plan of redemption, that we may silence many. I hope the arguments in this psalm will silence some. If they were well considered, they would silence all. And therefore we must call upon men, and press them to consider what is here said: for the Holy Spirit, in the last words, requires it of us: "Whoso is wise, and will observe those things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord." "Whoso is wise," has the true wisdom that is from above, "will observe those things," will carefully note and remark what is here said of the fall and recovery of mankind, of our state by nature and by grace. True wisdom consists in observing these two things—what we are in ourselves, and what we are in Christ—in a deep sense of our misery by sin, stirring us up to seek our remedy in the Redeemer. This is wisdom. And whosoever is thus wise unto salvation "shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord," shall be able to apply what he understands of it to his own private use and benefit. The verb, in the original rendered "shall understand," is in the conjugation called Hithpael, which signifies "to act upon itself." Whoever observes those things properly, finds his own interest in them. He makes the understanding of them useful to himself. He does not study them as a science or theory, but as interesting points, in which he is nearly concerned, and which he therefore tries to bring home for his own private advantage. When he hears of the mercies of the Lord Jesus, recorded in this psalm, he desires to partake of them. When he hears of the great deliverances vouchsafed to sinful ruined man, he studies to have his own share in them. What is said of these persons, who wandered out of the way in the wilderness, and fell into the bondage of sin, and were afflicted with its diseases, and troubled like a stormy sea with its continual tempests—all this he knows was his own case; and therefore what follows, of their flourishing state after Christ delivered them, may be his also, if he cry unto the Lord, as they did, for help. And he never ceases praying and seeking until the blessed Jesus bring him to the haven of the church, where he would be. And if he find the church diminished and brought low, he is not discouraged, but relies on the promises of his God, who will set him on high out of the reach of public calamity, when he comes to destroy an infidel church. He observes what is said in this psalm concerning those things, and he knows it to be true, by his own experience: and therefore the loving-kindness of the Lord, here recorded, is to him a subject of exceeding great joy, because he has tasted of it. Whoso is wise, will bring his knowledge of this psalm home to his own heart, and he shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord—he shall be able to apply what he understands to his own benefit, and shall therefore be continually praising the Lord for his goodness, and declaring the wonders which he hath done for the salvation of men.

And here the Holy Spirit ends, recommending to us the observation of those things as the only wisdom, and exhorting us to apply what we understand of them to our own particular benefit, as the only use we can make of them. And if we can but observe and understand until we find our interest in them, then his design in recording this psalm will be answered, and we shall be thankful indeed: for thankfulness is only expressing with the mouth what the heart feels; and if the heart feels itself entitled to the blessings of redemption, it will be impossible to restrain the tongue from praising the almighty God and Redeemer of the world. The redeemed soul can no more forbear to praise its Redeemer, than the body can forbear to breathe so long as there is any life in it.

You may remember that I set out at first with a general plan of the whole psalm; and I need not here repeat it. You have heard each part explained, and have been shown how each tends to carry on the general plan. You have seen how regular and beautiful it is altogether, how important the subject, how strong and striking the arguments. It is indeed a masterly painting of our lost estate by sin, which is here represented in various lights, the more forcibly to affect us, that, finding our distress, and being disposed to cry out for deliverance, we may be the more thankful to the Redeemer when he comes and brings us free and full redemption. For this end the Holy Spirit inspired the psalm, and for the same good purpose we have been considering it. God grant we may not have considered it in vain! It is a very weighty and solemn scripture, and contains the most powerful motives, which infinite Wisdom itself could propose, both to convince us of our misery without a Redeemer and also of our happiness in him: and these most powerful motives ought certainly to produce the greatest effects: they ought to fill our hearts with gratitude, and to raise us to the highest pitch of thankfulness; but if we have no better dispositions to be thankful to our blessed Redeemer than we have had before we heard these motives, there must be some very bad cause in our own hearts. What it is, I will endeavour to find out by applying myself,

First, To them who disbelieve the state of the case, as it is laid down in this psalm. The subject is thanksgiving. The motives used to excite in us a thankful temper are taken from the distressed estate of mankind by nature, and from their perfect recovery by grace. And no man can be unthankful who has seen himself in this lost condition, out of which he was brought by the free grace and mercy of the Redeemer. Such a person, I say, cannot be unthankful: because, while he retains the sense of his former misery, and of his present happiness, his mind is always in a thankful temper, and he must lose this sense before he can be indisposed to give thanks and praise to his redeeming God. This is the clear and plain state of the case. And the Holy Spirit supposes that the proper consideration of it would be sufficient to inspire us all with thankfulness; for when he comes to sum up the argument, he says, "Whoso is wise," whosoever has the true wisdom, "will observe these things," will observe the great points treated of in this divine composition, and will endeavour to understand them in a practical way, by applying what he knows of them to the state of his own soul. And whenever he is thus wise, and has this right understanding, then he will be full of thanks and praise to the God of his salvation. Now, there are men among us who disbelieve all this, who deny the lost and fallen estate of mankind, and who talk of, I know not what, fancied dignity and rectitude in poor sinful worms: and although they see the whole face of the earth covered with sin, yet they will not allow that man is sinful. And thus they deny the very evidence of their senses when it makes against infidelity, and are therefore greater enthusiasts than mistaken religion ever did produce. A poor creature who believes without evidence is indeed an enthusiast; but the infidel, who disbelieves against evidence, is got to the very top of enthusiasm. All deists are rank enthusiasts, and of the worst kind, because they can refuse to believe their own senses when they give evidence for Christianity. If there be any of them in this place, I must call upon them to observe those things which are recorded in this psalm. Consider why you disbelieve them. What reason, what motive, have you? If you would submit to the authority of scripture, it has determined that we are altogether corrupt and abominable, and that there is none of us righteous—no, not one. And if the experience of all ages had any weight with you, it comes in confirmation of the scripture authority. If plain matter of fact would convince, if reason was heard, you could not deny the corruption and depravity of human nature: for nothing is more certain than that the man lives not who never sinned. And if you see not that you yourselves are sinners, you are in great darkness. The eyes of your understanding are as yet blind. For what else can be the cause why you should have no eyes to see those things which are certain, yea, self-evident, to every Christian? You have no desire to find the truth of them. I appeal to your own hearts whether this be not the true cause. It is not want of evidence to convince, but want of desire in you to be convinced. Though the sun shine ever so bright and clear, yet it can give no light to them who shut their eyes against it. None are more blind than they who will not see. Nothing is more difficult than to persuade a man to believe what he is unwilling to believe. Reason and argument are seldom successful against such strong prejudices, especially when these prejudices fall in with our natural corruptions, and flatter our sinful pride, and pay their court to the dignity of our base nature. In such a case something more powerful than reasoning is necessary. To convince such persons is a work too great for any agent but the grace of God; and if, after all that has been said, there are still men among us who see not sin and misery enough in their own hearts to want a Redeemer, may his good Spirit open their eyes before it be too late, and show them the truth of this psalm, and bring the doctrines contained in it home with power to their hearts, that they may find their lost estate by sin, and their perfect redemption through Jesus Christ. And, with my fervent prayers for them to our gracious God, I conclude for the present, and turn myself, in the Second place, to them who believe what the Holy Spirit has here recorded concerning the fall of man, and who desire to experience the truth of what is here said concerning his recovery. Go on, my beloved brethren, you have set out well; persevere in your desires and prayers; for you are not far from the kingdom of heaven: it is God who hath begun a good work in you; let him finish it. And as the proper means thereto, wait upon God in all his holy ordinances, and particularly observe those things: remark the great points treated of in this divine hymn: study to understand them, and to apply them to your own hearts: labour to find your interest in them, and be assured that God will accompany the devout meditation of this scripture with his grace and blessing. Whoso is wise, will observe those things, says the Holy Spirit; therefore, if you would be wise, observe them. Mark, learn, and inwardly digest them. Try to find in them spiritual nourishment and support; and if you consider them with humility and prayer, they will be greatly blessed unto your souls. Wait and persevere in these holy exercises, and in God's own good time you will find reason to join with all his redeemed people, and to declare that he is loving to every man—to you in particular—and that his mercy endureth for ever. And these are the happy persons to whom I address my

Third and last remark. You, my Christian brethren, are prepared to join with me in offering up our tribute of thanks. You know what the Redeemer has done for your salvation, and you are grateful; but you are not grateful enough; neither can you be! Our most adorable God condescended to do such miracles for your redemption, that he deserves far more thanks than you can pay. Your best service—what a poor return is it for the riches of his love! and your highest strains of praise—how far do they fall below his infinite deserts! Alas! what can we do in the way of return, since all we have is his free gift, and all we hope for comes from his free grace. The inestimable riches of earth and heaven, while they proclaim the love of Jesus to us, yet prove that we cannot praise him enough for them. And, indeed, we never praise him so well as when we strive to do the best we can; but yet find how little it is we can do, how empty and worthless our best praises are. God knows, our present adoration and praise, in their utmost fervour, are very imperfect. And the Redeemer is so great and infinite, and so eternal are the blessings which he has freely conferred upon us, that our praises must be infinite and eternal if they rise up to his merit: for eternity itself will acknowledge that Jesus is above all blessing and praise; and therefore we are to praise him for ever. And how, then, can we rise up to the greatness of his merit in time, since there is to be no end of giving him thanks? But though our praises be imperfect, yet our Lord requires them, and we must return him the best we can: and when we know his love, and taste of his mercy, the heart will feel more than the tongue can utter, and then our praises will be acceptable, and his grace will render them sweet and delightful to us, and we shall esteem these moments to be the pleasantest in our lives which we spend in giving thanks to the blessed Jesus, the author of all our joys. And this kind of praise is something like the praises of heaven. It has their sincerity, but not their perfection. May God enable us to increase in both! Oh that we could raise our hearts, and exalt our affections, to that heavenly frame with which the glorified spirits are now praising the Lamb who sitteth upon the throne. The Holy Spirit can tune our hearts to join in harmony with theirs, though in a humbler strain: and let us now seek his gracious influence, and beg of him to bless these lectures upon thankfulness, and to make them the means of rendering every one of us more thankful to our most adorable Redeemer. The means may be weak; but he who is to give them his blessing is almighty: and if we ask and seek it of him in humble prayer, he will supply all their defects by his grace. Let us, then, agree to request him to send his good Spirit into our hearts, that we may reap all the profit from the consideration of this divine hymn, which he intended it should administer to the faithful. And I know of no words more truly devout and pious, nor more proper wherewith to conclude these lectures, than the general thanksgiving of our church.

Almighty God, Father of all mercies, we thine unworthy servants do give thee most humble and hearty thanks for all thy goodness and loving-kindness to us and to all men. We bless thee for our creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life; but above all for thine inestimable love, in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, for the means of grace through him, and for the hope of glory. And we beseech thee, give us that due sense of all thy mercies, that our hearts may be unfeignedly thankful; and that we may show forth thy praise, not only with our lips, but in our lives, by giving up ourselves to thy service, and by walking before thee in holiness and righteousness all our days, through Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

DEDICATION.

To the Parishioners of St. Dunstan's in the West.

My dear Brethren,—I take this opportunity of acknowledging the many and great favours which I have received from you. My gratitude cannot better appear than in labouring, to the best of my power, in that station to which you have called me. Ever since you were pleased unanimously to choose me your Lecturer, I have endeavoured to discharge my duty as one who must give an account; and in what manner I discharge it, let these Sermons, which I now dedicate unto you, bear witness. There is a great and awful day at hand, in which the righteous scarcely shall be saved: and where then shall the wicked and ungodly appear? On this day, at the bar of the almighty Judge, I must stand, to give an account of my ministry among you: knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, I have not shunned to declare unto you the whole counsel of God. He knoweth my heart; and he has seen how honestly I have preached the word, and how earnest I have been with him in prayer for a blessing upon it. Oh that I may deliver my own soul! And God grant you may deliver yours. You have heard me for some years, and chiefly upon the same subject. I hope you are not tired of hearing of the love of Jesus to poor helpless sinners: I am sure I am not tired of speaking upon it. The first sermon I preached among you was upon this text, 1 Cor. ii. 1, 2: "And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God: for I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." What I then determined in God's strength, I have thus far been enabled to perform. The great subject of all my preaching, as ye know, is Christ Jesus the Lord, inviting and calling careless sinners from the error of their ways, and pressing them to come to Christ for the pardon of their sins, for strength to subdue sin, and for grace to do good works, pleasant and acceptable unto God. This pardon, strength, and grace, are not to be had but from Christ. He alone has them to give; and that you might see the necessity of applying to him for them, I have been continually setting forth the misery of fallen man until he receives Christ Jesus the Lord for his Saviour and his God, and the complete happiness he enjoys after he has received him. With what success I have preached, you must give an account at the same awful bar at which I am to be tried, and before a Judge who is no respecter of persons. Oh that I may not appear against any of you in that great day! I have good reason to believe that many of you will then be (I pray God you may all then be!) my joy and crown of rejoicing. Happy will it be for you and me if I should see the Judge place you all on his right hand. And whether you were brought to this blessedness by my ministry, or not, if you do but enjoy it, I shall have cause to glorify God on your behalf.

My brethren, the time is short. Work while it is day: for the night cometh, in which no man can work. It is but a short day in which you have to finish the work of eternity; therefore give all diligence to make your calling and election sure. Get possession and enjoyment of the present graces of salvation, without which you cannot have any well-grounded hope of eternal salvation. Jesus must save you from the guilt and save you from the dominion of sin; he must justify you by his righteousness, and sanctify you by his Spirit, before you can see the face of God with joy in his kingdom of glory. And have you then received these graces from him? This, my beloved brethren, is the most interesting question you can put to yourselves. Upon the decision of it depends an eternity of happiness or misery. Have you received these graces, or not? May he that teacheth man wisdom teach you to answer it to yourselves as you will answer it to him. May he lead you into all truth, save you from all sin, enable you to live to his glory, and make you happy in his love here, in time and in eternity!

God knoweth that this is the prayer of my heart. When that solemn day shall come, in which all secrets shall be laid open, then it will be known with what view I have written this Dedication. God grant my design in it may be answered! and may it then appear that you have reaped the profit from it which I most heartily desired! Having taken this occasion of thanking you for all temporal favours, my love to your souls would not let me lose an opportunity of speaking a word for Christ, although it was out of the pulpit. He has unsearchable, inestimable, and eternal riches in his power: and to persuade you to seek them has been and shall be the labour, and to entreat him to bestow them upon you shall be the prayer, of

Your faithful minister and servant in the Lord Jesus,

PREFACE TO THE DISCOURSES.

READER,—I here offer thee a volume of sermons upon some part of the Song of Songs. They were composed and preached at a time when I had some thoughts of treating the whole book in a plain practical way; but that design being laid aside, I have made some of the sermons public, hoping they may be the means of removing men's prejudices, and of reconciling their minds to this sweet portion of God's holy word.

It is a certain, but a melancholy matter of fact, that there has been more ridicule wasted upon the Song than upon any other portion of God's word. And we need not marvel at it. The devil has a particular spite against this book: he hates the subject, and he hates the composition. He cannot bear to hear of man's being restored to that fellowship and communion with God which himself once had, but can never hope for again: and therefore this treatise upon it is the object of his most devilish malice, and he is always stirring up his agents to write and to speak contemptibly of it. And he has been too successful in his temptation. Many persons fell into it because it flattered their pride. They set up themselves for judges of all subjects, divine as well as human, and made their reason the criterion of all truth. They tried this book by their reason, and they did not understand it; therefore they thought nobody did. Upon the force of this conclusion they took a general license to ridicule it; but the conclusion is not logical: for certainly the book may be intelligible, although they do not understand it. Modest reason would incline them to be of this opinion, because many learned men, in every age, have thought it intelligible, and many good men, without much learning, have understood it. The true cause of which was this: they understood the subject treated of in this book, which the enemies of it did not.

A deaf man is as good a judge of a fine piece of music, as a man who has no real heart-love for God is of a treatise upon the love of God; for, as he has no knowledge of the subject, how can he understand what is written upon it? If a man ignorant of mathematics were to take up Sir Isaac Newton's Principia, and to cry out, What stuff is this? Who can make any thing of these strange lines and figures, and these A's and B's? a great mathematician standing by would pity the poor man's ignorance. In like manner, when any person takes up a book upon communion with God, and either does not believe there is such a thing, or has had no experience of it, how can he understand what is written? It must appear to him mere jargon and gibberish; and if he has a talent at ridicule, here is a tempting occasion for him to display it: whereas the fault is not in the book, but in the man who reads it. It may be a perfect composition; and he may be no judge of it. The book is plain enough to them who are properly qualified to read it. If you understand the true genius of the tongue in which it was written, and have some insight into the subject of which it treats, it will then be as intelligible as any other portion of scripture; but the enemies of this book understand neither of these particulars. They are not qualified to judge, and yet they venture to condemn it: for

First, They are not acquainted with the nature of the Hebrew tongue, without which no man should pretend to be a critic upon the writings of the Old Testament. If any person should write professedly against Homer, and try to prove there was no genius, invention, or sublimity in his poems, with what contempt would the learned treat his performance, especially if they knew that this ignoramus did not understand one word of Greek, no nor one letter. If such an attack upon Homer appears ridiculous to men of learning, how much more ridiculous should an attack of the same nature appear upon a treatise in Hebrew! because the Hebrew is more difficult to be translated, word for word, than any Greek author can be. It has some peculiar properties and idioms, which no other language has, with which every critic should be acquainted, lest he should raise objections that would only betray his own ignorance. The Hebrew is a fixed language. It is not, like ours, arbitrary and changeable. We are continually gaining some new word, or dropping some obsolete one, or affixing some new idea to a word, which we have done remarkably in the word charity. When our Liturgy was compiled, and afterwards, when the present translation of the Bible was made, charity signified love; but now we use it for nothing but giving of alms. If you were to use it in its ancient sense, and to talk of the charity of God, you would not be understood. But the Hebrew is free from these imperfections. It is fixed in nature, and cannot change, unless nature should. Every word stands for some material and sensible object, which God created to represent and to give us ideas of some correspondent and spiritual object. Like as in parables there is an outward and literal sense, by which an inward and spiritual meaning is conveyed, so is it in every Hebrew word. And a critic should understand Hebrew upon this plan. He should be acquainted with the genius of the Hebrew tongue, and with its manner of expressing spiritual things under their appointed images in nature. And it is more necessary he should have this knowledge, in order to understand this book, because it is the worst translated of all scripture. Our translators have not failed more in any part of the Old Testament than they have here. Instead of giving us the spiritual meaning of the words, they have seldom given us any thing but the literal sense; and sometimes they have given us the Hebrew word without any translation at all. If they had translated the prophecy of Isaiah in the same injudicious manner, it would have been as abstruse as this book is. I hope to see it made as intelligible as the prophecy of Isaiah. There are several persons, at present in our church, of great leisure, and great abilities; and it is much to be wished they would employ them in explaining this book. The most proper method they could take seems to me to settle, first, the true literal sense of every word in the Song, and then, as it is entirely a spiritual book, treating of communion with God, to fix the spiritual idea to each word; and where we have not a proper word in English to express the full sense of a Hebrew word, they might give it in a short paraphrase.

Whenever this is done, the mouths of our ignorant mockers will be stopped, and it will appear that all their objections arose from their ignorance.

Thus the enemies of this book are ignorant of the true genius of the Hebrew tongue, in which it is written; and they borrow their arguments against it, not from the faults of the book itself, but from the faults in the translation; and they are also ignorant of the subject upon which it treats. It is one of the deep things of God, which the natural man cannot understand. He has none of this love to God which is here described; nor can he attain it by any means in his own power. It is a love that comes down from God. He is the giver of it; and it is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit, who bestows the comforts of it upon them that are pardoned and reconciled to the Father in the Son of his love, and that can therefore truly say, with the apostle John, "We know and have believed the love that God hath to us." Whoever sits down to read this Book, be he ever so learned in other matters, yet, if he has no knowledge of God's love to him, he cannot understand what he reads. The objectors of this Book are so far from pretending to have any of this experimental love of God, that they laugh at it, and ridicule it; whereby they plainly declare that they are not judges of the subject upon which this Book treats, and therefore they are not fit to sit in judgment upon it,

These are the two principal reasons why this Book is so little understood and so much ridiculed. I need not enlarge upon them here, because they are often taken notice of in the sermons; to which I refer the reader. When I first thought of making them public, I did not foresee how seasonable they would be. It appears to me quite providential that these sermons on the love of God should be published just at this time, when I am furiously attacked by a nameless writer, and charged with preaching nothing but hell and damnation. It would have been as true a charge if he had said I always preached in Hebrew. This volume shall answer for me. Here my doctrine is, Believe, and thou shalt be saved: love God, and thou shalt be happy. May He who has this saving belief, and this happy love to give, for his mercy's sake, bestow them upon this my bitter enemy and open persecutor!

I have nothing more to add, but to entreat the Blesser of all nations to accompany the reading of these sermons with his blessing. May he water them with the dew of his heavenly grace, and render them useful and profitable to every person into whose hands they may fall. Reader, if thou findest any unction from the Holy One in them, and reapest any benefit from them, give God the glory, and pray for the author. Thou canst not do me any service which I more want or value, than thy prayers. Pray that the grace of Christ may do more in me, and that I may do more for Christ: and in return I will pray for thee, that the Spirit of the living God may enable thee to understand this divine Song, and to experience the comforts of its doctrine; and then thou wilt be in possession of the greatest happiness thou canst enjoy on this side of heaven.

Upon revising these sheets for a new edition of the following sermons, I had great reason to bless the Lord God that my views of this subject were the same as they were several years ago—only confirmed by long experience. It is a good thing to be established in the truth, and by constant use to get into holy and happy practice. When the believer has received Christ, it is his privilege to be growing up into him in all things—flourishing like a palm-tree, and mounting up like the cedar in Lebanon. Certain doctrines are then not to be disputed. The essential glory of Immanuel—The absolute perfection of his saving work—The effectual application of it to the consciences, to the hearts, and to the lives of believers by the Holy Spirit—in these it is good and right that there should be no variableness nor shadow of turning. Jesus Christ, and his work, and his Spirit, and his fulness, being the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Much has been written and spoken against these sermons, as if I had therein made too much of Christ. I think it impossible. His person is above all blessing and praise. His salvation is infinitely perfect, and contains an eternal fulness of all graces and glories. His promises are exceeding great and exceeding precious—already made good to him, as the head, and by him made good to all his people. When the Spirit of life that is in him sets them free from the law of sin and of death, they are pardoned, and righteous, and holy, and blessed in the Beloved. Which of them can come up to the greatness of such a subject? Who can show forth all the praises of such a Jesus? I cannot. Instead of thinking that I have spoken too highly of him, I am very sensible of my many and great failings. May the Glorifier of Jesus enable me to speak more worthily of him in earth and heaven!

The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's.
